have been told of the condition of the country; that it is deplorable; and have been warned, inasmuch as there was a rising against the excise laws, to guard against the consequences arising from the embargo laws; and, in depicting the various distresses of the country, it is said (by Mr. RANDOLPH) that there is no sale for tobacco or cotton. What say the cotton planters, than whom none are more interested in foreign commerce? I may venture to assert that they are unanimously unwilling to place their bales of cotton in one scale and national honor in the other. They are unwilling to put interest, sordid interest, in competition with the national independence, which would be sacrificed by the payment of tribute. This tobacco business and insurrection among the planters, reminds me of the humorous letter of Samson to Lord Spencer, requesting him to send over an hundred thousand pounds, for the purpose of exciting a civil war, ravaging the tobacco country, and destroying the plantations with fire and tow, to be called the Segar war, and, if he did not succeed, it would end in smoke. This idea is not more ridiculous than that the tobacco planters will rise in insurrection on account of the low price of that article, when they know that their whole market, to any extent, is cut off by the Orders in Council. Will gentlemen say that we shall carry our tobacco to England, there pay a duty, and then carry it to France, and fight the legions of Bonaparte to compel him to receive it? If we are to have a war with France, I hope it will not be a war of that kind.

A doubt has been raised as to the constitutionality of the measure; the power of Congress to interdict trade is denied, because it is alleged that our form of Government grew out of commerce. I have always understood that the Constitution was adopted for the purpose, as it imports, of establishing Union, for promoting the commerce, defence, and general welfare, and if, for these nobler purposes, foreign commerce be suspended for a season, I trust that it will not be considered as violating the principles of that Constitution.

A charge has been uttered in anonymous publications in newspapers, as well as in the famous letter of Pickering, to which I have alluded, of a hostility to commerce in the Southern States. I, for one, protest against this declaration. I do not know where that individual is that is opposed to foreign commerce? Where are the Southern or Western people who are opposed to commerce or navigation in our own vessels, navigated by our own seamen, and owned wholly by our own citizens? The insinuation is unjust. There never was a question brought before this House affecting the commercial rights, in which the Southern and Western people have not strenuously supported them. It has never been objected to me by my constituents, that I voted for building seventy-fours and frigates, and for fortifying our seaport towns; and this has afforded me an opportunity of ascertaining that my constituents are not hostile to commerce.

But we are told that the Eastern people are peculiarly affected by our measures, and that they will not submit to them. What, sir, is the present subject of dispute, which has involved the United States in difficulties? Foreign commerce altogether. Who has it? The Eastern people—they have it all. The Southern people have but little navigation, and care for little more in relation to it than the raising their staple commodities, permitting their brethren of the East to carry them to market. And because we would not give up their commercial rights, and have adopted measures for asserting them, we are charged with an hostility to, and abandonment of, commerce. The charge comes with very little grace indeed from gentlemen who say that our present difficulties have grown out of a pertinacious adherence to every principle of commercial right. If principle were not concerned, we, the Southern people, might say it is immaterial to us who carries our tobacco, cotton, &c.; but we are contending for principle, for the interest of our brethren of the East, and we will not desert them, though we are threatened with being deserted by them. We will disbelieve the assertions of the leaders of faction, and hope that the disposition does not exist, although attempts are made to excite it, as manifested by handbills published there. Were it not for principle we would not care anything about it; but acquiescence would resemble the case of a farmer's stealing his neighbor's wagon and destroying his team, and saying no one but himself should carry his produce to market. We grow—they carry. Who is injured most by the suspension of commerce, the grower or the carrier? The former. It is true that as their ships are lying at the wharves, rotting as we are told, and our farms do not rot, they feel it a little more severely than we do. But it is a time when all should sacrifice a little for the public good.

But if we are wrong, what shall we do? All who condemn the course are silent as to what ought to be done. Every quack condemns the prescriptions of the physician, and tells you all is wrong. When pressed for his projet, he shrugs up his shoulders and is silent. Is this the course of patriotism? The patient he tells you is treated improperly. All is wrong, but he will not tell you what is right. If that patriotism pervades their breasts, which one would suppose from hearing their language, we expect from them as Americans and friends, in the plenitude of their wisdom, to tell us what is to be done. We say our measures are right, and as they condemn them, they should tell us what they will do. Surely they do not mean to submit. Gentlemen escape by saying all is wrong, and they have an advantage in so doing. If measures prove abortive, they may say I told you so; if they prove right they are silent; their admonitions did no harm. This conduct may be politic, but it is not patriotic.

But, say gentlemen, will you abandon commerce? The refusal of the House to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) may be represented to the people as evidence of an intention to abandon commerce. I will not abandon commerce. I will only suspend it for a time; I will make our laws operate uniformly, and not permit a few worthless individuals to make fortunes at the expense of the community, by the evasions of them. Cut off all intercourse; increase our force. It would be madness to rush into the contest unarmed, unprepared, and vulnerable at all points. Take every step short of war, march up to the threshold, and if possible accomplish our purpose by pacific means, before we pass it. We need not fear the legions of Bonaparte, or the minions of George III. We are not now subject to the temptations of exclusive privileges offered to his Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, or the proscriptions exempting our patriots from the pardon offered. When convinced that everything has been done that can be done, the people will rally around us as one man; and whether for defence or offence, will present a phalanx irresistible and unconquerable. I will consent to withdraw the embargo as to either, on a withdrawal of his decrees, and to issue letters of marque and reprisal against the other. Arming our merchant vessels would be war in disguise. I would not wage war and then declare it. If we are to have war, I wish to have it openly in the face of day, and not secretly, and in the night, assailing the enemy without notice, when he suspects no danger. I would not make war except it were declared, according to the provisions of the Constitution.

But a gentleman asks why do not we act, and not spend our time in talking. I know, sir, that much time has been occupied to-day to little purpose; the remark made by the gentleman from Virginia, yesterday, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that he has done but little good, may apply to me. But this observation of the waste of time comes with an ill grace from him, after having occupied two or three days of your time this session, with motions, to violate the confidence reposed in us by the President, and two or three hours more on a question of order. The gentleman says he has done no good; but he has done much harm, sir, by a condemnation of the measures adopted, and throwing all the blame on our own Government, instead of considering what the good of the country now requires.

Gentlemen have protested against the invocation of the spirit of '76. I wish it would appear and purge the body politic of tories and British influence. I wish the line of demarcation to be drawn, that we may ascertain who is for his country, and who is against his country; and I regret that the noble spirit which operated like enchantment, and conjured up a pretence for plunging us into a war with France, after the famous X Y Z negotiation, does not exist, when just cause excites it, and give efficacy and sanction to the principle contended for then, which I hope will be our motto now.—Millions for defence, and not a cent for tribute.

Mr. LYON spoke about ten minutes in reply; when a motion was made to adjourn, and carried, at about four o'clock.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The unfinished business of yesterday being under consideration; and the question pending on the first resolution reported by the committee on our foreign relations—

Mr. DAWSON said, during the very lengthy discussion, which took place in the Committee of the Whole, on this resolution, and which, very unexpectedly to me, has been renewed in the House, I have indulged that disposition which I generally feel, to be silent; and have attended to the observations of other gentlemen with patience—I wish I could add with pleasure. Many of them have been pertinent, pointed, and ingenious, but, I think, ill-timed.

Sir, at a time like this, when danger threatens our country from various quarters; when our rights and independence have been violated, and our demands for justice answered by new insults and injuries; and when it is admitted by most gentlemen, who have spoken, that the crisis has arrived when we should act as well as speak, and prepare efficient measures to meet impending dangers,—at such a time, I say, I did little expect that we should have spent a whole week in discussing a declaratory resolution, in support of which I did believe that every American voice, heart, and hand, would have united; that, forgetting local and personal prejudices, we should have come forward with a solemn and unanimous declaration, “that we will not submit to the unlawful edicts of France or Great Britain,” or any other earthly Power.

Sir, had I been on the select committee who made the report on the table, I do not know that I should have recommended that resolution, because I might have thought it unnecessary; but, as it has been brought forward, and as it gives testimony to foreign nations of our determination to maintain and to vindicate our rights, which have been too often violated, and appears to me to be an invitation to us all to join in the support of those measures, which a majority shall think proper to adopt, it has my hearty concurrence. What those measures shall be, I will not now determine; when they shall be presented, I shall, by the permission of the House, give my sentiments on each, and all of them collectively. At present, I will say, that my impressions are in favor of adhering to the system which we adopted at the last session, for enforcing it with the utmost rigor, and for backing it with measures of a stronger character. If, however, on candid investigation, I shall be convinced that these impressions are wrong, I shall most readily relinquish them, and advocate that system best calculated to secure the honor, interest, and independence of the country; at all events, I shall be found among the foremost in “placing the country in a more complete state of defence,” and, if necessary, of offence. This has been my policy for the last five years, and God knows I have no cause to change it.

At present, I hope that we shall take the question on this declaration, and proceed to do something.

I have another reason for wishing this resolution to pass without delay. The question, and the only question, before the House is, “whether we can submit to the edicts of Great Britain and France;” (for the embargo, about which we have heard so much, is not even recommended by the select committee;) and on this question the Representatives of the people have been deliberating for a whole week. What effect, I ask you, sir, is this calculated to have on those who do not see or hear what course our debates have taken? and what effect is it calculated to have on foreign nations, when our deeds are frequently misunderstood, and more frequently misrepresented? A very bad one, I fear. I have another and third reason for wishing this resolution to pass. A rumor has gone abroad, unfounded I hope, that there are two parties in this country, the one under French, the other under British influence. This resolution is calculated to do away that impression, and, backed by the measures which I expect it will be, totally annihilate it, and convince the world that we are a united people, determined and able to oppose any nation which dares to violate our rights; that, while we respect the rights of others, we will defend our own.

If other gentlemen view this resolution as I do, I hope they will permit the question to be taken, and the several resolutions to be referred, whereby we may be able to do something; and action, in my judgment, will have more effect than all our tardy negotiations, declarations, or all the eloquence of this House.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said, he could have wished very much that no discussion should have taken place on the first resolution. He considered it a declaration by this House, in behalf of the United States, that the edicts were prostrations of national rights, honor, and independence, and a solemn pledge of resistance. His own idea had been that it would have comported more with the respect due to the nation, that a silent vote should have been taken upon it; but, as discussion had been provoked, it must be met. Being a member of the committee which brought in the report, he could not, under the circumstances, reconcile it to his feelings to give a silent vote.

The proposition before the House, said he, is called, and may by many be considered as an abstract proposition. In general, I am averse to abstract legislation, because it leaves the House in precisely the same situation as it found it. But there are instances in which the urgency of the case requires a departure from the general rule. And if there ever was an occasion in which this was proper, the present furnishes an example, France, applied to for redress of grievances committed on you, scorns you, and gives no answer. England has given an answer, and in it utterly refuses to do you justice. We may be considered now as on the very verge of war. Is not this, then, one of the occasions which loudly calls for such a declaration as this? Again, an abstract proposition may contain a great leading principle which shall mark the character of the times. We find, in 1774, when our ancestors were oppressed and attempted to be reduced to slavery, that they came forward before the people, and it was not considered, at that time, improper to make a declaration similar to the present. In page 78 of the Journals of the Congress of 1774, we find this declaration:

[Mr. M. here quoted the declaration of our rights made at that time.]

Thus we find when our ancestors were oppressed by England, and on the verge of a war, they thought it proper and expedient, and not derogatory to the dignity of the nation, that there should be a declaration marking the character of the times. It is important in another view, that there should be something of this kind. Misrepresentations of the most atrocious sort have gone abroad, and it is important that they should be put down. To prove that such misrepresentations exist here, and in England, it is only necessary to mention that a libellous pamphlet, Pickering's letter, went through eight editions in England, one in Scotland, and one in Ireland. From these circumstances, it is highly proper that these things should be met and put down by a plain statement of facts.

But, sir, we have been accused of wasting public time. This accusation comes ungraciously from a quarter, which, it will be recollected, last week occupied the House three days—on what? On a question which involved in it a violation of national confidence. If we divide the waste of time among us all, we shall find that that gentleman has had his full proportion.

This report has been said to consist of episode, prologue, and epilogue; and the committee have been attacked from various quarters. It ought to be recollected by gentlemen that others in the House have feelings as well as themselves. The gentleman from Virginia tells us, that the report contains nothing, and has sagaciously discovered that no bill can be bottomed on the first resolution; and another gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) styles the report loathsome and disgraceful. When the subject was referred to the committee they acted on it in the manner which their duty required, and made such a report as they thought proper, to which no ill language can attach disgrace. I therefore hope and expect that the gentleman will not persist in the words he has used, but retract them, from the respect which he owes to the House and to the committee. If the expression be persisted in, however, I must say, as one of the committee, that such language is indecorous and unmanly, and does not comport with the manners of a gentleman.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, a few days ago, by his magic powers, transported us to British ground, and told us the embargo must be repealed; that the people would not submit to it; that it was impossible to continue it longer. He stated, too, and went into a long calculation to prove it, that the people of the United States had not firmness to bear the embargo. Is this language novel? Look at British Ministerial papers and pamphlets, and it is no more a novelty;

it is the very language of British papers ingrafted into Tory papers here. But the gentleman and the English nation, too, will be satisfied that the people of the United States will bear any state of things rather than slavery and submission. The Ministry of Britain also will know it.

But, says the gentleman, there was no such word in all the year 1776 as embargo. What do we find, sir, when we examine the Journals of Congress in 1774, as was done by my worthy friend from Massachusetts? We find that Congress did adopt a non-importation and a non-exportation law in 1774; in 1775 they were not repealed; and in 1776 they were in full force and operation; and no exportation took place unless by special grant of Congress. The gentleman says there was no such word as embargo in 1776. There was not, sir; but still the embargo system was in full operation.

But, the gentleman warns us not to invoke the spirit of 1776. He says, it is to be put out of the debate, together with the word tribute. What may be called the spirit of 1776, sir? The spirit of a WASHINGTON. What is the spirit of which the gentleman talked so much, the other day, as existing in the Eastern States? It may be called a Pickering spirit. The former was that which animated the heroes of 1774, 1775, 1776—which inspired the Councils of the nation with zeal in their country's service, and achieved our independence. What is this spurious Pickering spirit? It is a spirit emanating from delusion, dissimulation, disappointed ambition, and gross, palpable, and execrable misrepresentations. What does it lead to? Patriotism? I deny it. To regular government, or union? I deny it.

[Mr. MONTGOMERY was here called to order by Mr. BLACKLEDGE; and the SPEAKER observed that it was desirable that the gentleman should avoid personal applications of his remarks.]

Mr. M. continued.—I am under the direction of the Chair; the situation of the country, the situation in which we are placed by the operation of this pernicious spirit must be ray apology for transgressing the rules of the House. But the spirit of 1776 is that which I hope at this particular crisis every man will feel; it creates unanimity and harmony. We ought to scout everything which looks like disunion and dismemberment. The gentleman warns us against calling up the spirit of 1776. As I understood the language which fell from him, it amounted simply to this: In the times preceding 1776, England passed certain statutes, which were considered oppressive, and encroaching on our rights, and the people resisted them. In 1807 a law was passed by the Government of the Union, which the people of the Eastern States, by the agency of misrepresentation and falsehood, have been taught to believe oppressive on them, and that they will, therefore, resist it. The spirit which these misrepresentations have produced may be settled disaffection, which, in fact, is Toryism, sir; and the disaffected are Tories. Gentlemen who say that the embargo is a violation of their rights, and that they will resist it, are styled abroad as the partisans of that spirit, which I am forbidden by the Speaker to name; and, it is considered in England, that in this country there are but the two parties, that which now supports the Administration, and that which I have named.

It is to be regretted that such a state of things exists, but that it does exist appears from the avowed sentiments of gentlemen on this floor. Why are you told that if you continue the embargo the people will resist it? Why are you told that it cannot be enforced? Why is this language used? In terror, I suppose; and insurrection is predicted as the consequence. But we live under a Government of laws, sir, and the laws are our sovereigns. If those persons, then, are the wealthy class of citizens, which it is given us to understand they are, will it not be highly important for these gentlemen, before they violate the laws of their country and create a state of anarchy, to pause? But, if they persist in a violation of the laws, if their sails are bent, or their anchor atrip, they must go, but they must abide by the consequences.

But, says the gentlemen, you must not name the word tribute; you must put that, too, out of the argument. Why? Because it is impracticable that you should pay tribute; because you must first go to England, and the very going there prohibits you from going to France. Facts speak louder than forty thousand such declarations as these. Is it not ascertained that there are American vessels now in the very act of infamously paying tribute to England? The fact is incontrovertible. An instance has lately occurred of enforcing this tribute: The brig Sophia, pursuing a fair voyage. She was met and forced, by a British frigate, to go to some port in England—for what? For trial for evading the British edicts? No; she was carried by force into England, and compelled to pay tribute, and for no other purpose. She then pursued her voyage to the town of Baltimore, and thousands of the patriotic inhabitants, indignant at the disgrace, got the cargo, on which the tribute had been paid, and consigned it to the flames. This was not the act of a lawless mob, but of freemen indignant at paying tribute, and among them were intermingled a great number of Revolutionary patriots.

From the communications from the Executive, during the past and present session, it appears that everything to be expected from England is at an end. Opposed to redress of any kind, the only wish of France is, that we should declare war against England. What is the intimation which we have received from England? Simply this: She says, we have obtained the conquest of the ocean, and we have a right to it, and everything which you enjoy there shall be through special favor. Again, England says that her decrees are retaliatory, and being so, she cannot recede from them, because if she does, it would be a concession to France. Here, then, is our exact situation: France will not repeal her edicts, and England will not repeal hers unless France sets the example. We are brought to a crisis. Negotiation is at an end. When the embargo was laid, negotiation was still pending, there was still some glimmering of hope of accommodation, which is now all but extinguished. We have acted a fair, candid, and upright part to both; we have offered to both to withdraw our embargo, as related to them, and keeping it on as related to the enemy, if they would withdraw their orders. Both have rejected the offer. It is incumbent on the nation, then, now to pursue a firm, decided, and steady course, having partialities neither for the one nor the other; and we must not be driven from our course by any language held out here to awe us.

In conclusion, I will only observe, with respect to the proposition before us, that it had my hearty assent in the committee, and shall receive my decided voice when I am called upon to vote on it.

Mr. MUMFORD said, he agreed most cordially with the gentleman from Maryland, who had just sat down; he was decidedly in favor of real American measures. He hoped the time had now arrived when all would unite in defence of those principles of independence, and assert our rights; he coincided in sentiment with that gentleman in taking real American ground. He said that having been born in this land of liberty, and having early learned to appreciate its value, under the auspices of a man whom his country delighted to honor—who was one of the brightest ornaments of human nature, and whose name would be held in grateful remembrance as long as the art of printing shall endure—he was accustomed to act and think for himself; he ever had and would freely express his humble opinions and maintain those independent Republican principles, he had uniformly avowed. He had no predilections for either Great Britain or France; his predilections were in favor of his own country, in preference to all others. He could not have any for either of the belligerents; the rulers of the ocean had caused his father to be burned out of house and home, for his attachment to Revolutionary principles, and had since robbed his children of ninety thousand dollars. How does the account stand, said he, with the ruler of the land? I hold in my hand documents from France, certified by the American Consul, which will show that he has sequestered of my property upward of fifty thousand dollars; and, on a late application to the Emperor, to have that property as well as a very large amount belonging to other Americans, in a like predicament, restored, we were informed that the decision of that question was put off for the present; and, on comparing notes with the merchants, in different parts of the United States, it will appear that the sequestration of American property by the Governments, under the control of the French Emperor, would likely exceed twelve millions of dollars; and all the merchants' correspondents in France agree in stating that the restoration of their property depends upon what course our Government will pursue. They say, if you will join them, your property will be restored to you. For my part, sir, I will not only sacrifice my fifty thousand dollars, but my all, sooner than submit to the mandates of any foreign Power on earth.

Mr. M. said, that the whole catalogue of wrongs and aggressions from the two great belligerents, which had been officially communicated to them, and which had been since so emphatically described by the gentleman from Kentucky, on his left, (Mr. JOHNSON,) had filled his mind with indignation; and, if he knew the character of his countrymen, and he thought he did, they would all say, sooner perish the United States than submit to the mandates of any foreign Government on earth. But, while he would take a decided stand as it regarded those two great belligerents, he could not see any good reason why we should not cultivate a friendship with those who had shown a disposition to receive us on friendly terms. He had not heard it said that such a measure would compromise the nation's honor, and he was incapable of advocating any measure that he thought would derogate in the least from the honor of his country. Then, why not relieve our citizens? And, if it should be deemed advisable, authorize them to arm in defence of their commerce as our ancestors did in 1776, and leave it to their ingenuity, and they will find a market for the whole surplus productions of our soil?

He had no objections to the first, nor to the last resolutions of the committee; they had in Committee, and did here, meet his entire concurrence, as well as the first member of the second resolution, excluding from our waters all armed ships of the belligerents having decrees or orders against our commerce; but, he was not so well satisfied with the last member of the second resolution; it was, in his humble opinion, approaching closely upon a declaration of war, and he doubted whether it was now the proper time for it. Whenever that time shall come when we have no other alternative and must have recourse to the dernier resort of nations, he now repeated what he had before said, that he would not shrink from the contest; and he hoped, in the meanwhile, all the vulnerable points in every part of the Union would be placed in a complete posture of defence.

I have, said he, long entertained doubts about the policy of entangling ourselves in alliances with the Old World. France and Great Britain have, for ages, waged a war of extermination. It is very true they have, every now and then, made a truce, but such are their prejudices and irreconcilable enmity toward each other, that, among the variety of their contradictions, they even invite the winds of the heavens to grind their food in opposite directions. And shall we enlist not only our passions and prejudices but those of our posterity in their disputes and quarrels whenever they choose to go to war? He hoped not, and he was inclined to let them fight their own battles in their own way, and we would assert our just rights in our own way.

We represent a thinking nation, slow to anger, but jealous of their rights. Let us take care not to infringe upon their inestimable privileges. This is a Government of laws, and they must be obeyed; our very existence depends upon the faithful execution of those laws, but they should be reasonable. If they bear hard upon any of our citizens, they have the undoubted Constitutional right to petition against their grievances. The laws can only be repealed or amended in a Constitutional manner, and, from the virtue already displayed by the American people, I doubt not that they will persevere unto the end.

Mr. NELSON said, he had long remained silent on this question, and had intended still to remain so; but arguments had been used so extremely improper, in his opinion, that he considered it a duty which he owed to himself and to his constituents to make a reply to them.

It has been said, observed Mr. N., that the first resolution is an abstract proposition, and totally unnecessary to be acted on. I deny the assertion, and maintain this doctrine—that it is necessary, if we mean to preserve our rights and liberties, that we should, from time to time, recur back to first principles. Since the year '76 great changes have taken place in this country. A spirit of commerce, of self-aggrandizement—a spirit of avarice, has seized upon the great body of the people of this country; so much so, that the original principle on which the Government is founded, is, in a great measure, neglected; and, therefore, I say, that there should be some public expression of the sentiments of the nation. In this country we have now no other mode of expressing our sentiments on any subject than by resolution. In England and other countries under a monarchical Government, whenever a communication is made by the King, an answer is returned by the Parliament, in which a general expression of the public sentiment is contained. Here we receive all communications from the Executive in writing; no answer is returned; the subjects embraced by the Message are divided between the different committees; and no expression of the opinion of the Legislature can be obtained but in this way—by resolution. I therefore contend that it is not only proper and correct, but highly necessary that this resolution, the first, should be passed.

I am extremely sorry to find in different parts of this House so much warmth of expression, when the times call for a very different course of proceeding. To me it seems highly improper, because my opinion differs from that of another gentleman, that I should make use of harsh if not indecorous language toward him. How are we situated at this time, sir? We are said to be on the very verge of a war. Nay it is doubtful whether we are not at war. With whom? With two of the greatest nations in the world. Is this, then, a time for violent language? Far from it. I wish there was a spirit of conciliation in the House. I would permit to others the free exercise and expression of, their opinion, and I hope they will have the same charity for me. I wish that irritating language should be done away. This is not a question whether one party or another should be uppermost, but it is a great national question, in which I hope every party will unite; and, with these wishes, I could not help regretting when a gentleman from the Eastern country told us that our laws could not be executed. I do not believe that the gentleman is correct. I trust in God that the laws can be executed, that there is patriotism enough to insure their execution. And if doses of warm water will not bring the opponents of the execution of the laws to their senses, the other part of Sangrado's prescription must be tried. I should be sorry to see blood spilt in this way, sir; but it is necessary that the laws should be executed; and if they cannot be enforced in one way they must be in another. When, however, I hear one gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) say that the laws cannot be executed, and another (Mr. BACON) say differently, my opinion is in an equilibrium, balanced between the two; and I fancy that it would be the best way to say that both are a little mistaken. I believe that the Eastern people have as much patriotism as the Southern; that they can support their rights I well know, and have not a doubt that they will. If any portion of the people should attempt to prevent the execution of the laws, I trust there is power enough to put them down. The people of their own neighborhood will take care and see the laws properly executed.

This question has been strangely argued, and in discussing it gentlemen have strayed widely from the point, and myself as much as any; but I considered myself justifiable from the example set me by others. I have not wisdom enough to say what is the wisest course to pursue. I am not attached to any particular course, although the embargo has always appeared to me to be the best. If any gentleman will propose any other course, which he can satisfy me will be more beneficial to the people at large, I shall be willing to adopt it; and I do not think that the gentlemen show much patriotism, when they undertake, because, they say they are in the minority, to carp at the plans of the majority, and refuse to offer one themselves. I think, at this time, they should come forward with a plan; and I declare to God if any gentleman brings forward a plan, which will properly supersede this, I will adopt it without looking from what quarter it comes. As to nice calculation, we have had it over and over again, and I think it as useless for a man to get up and recapitulate for two or three hours, what had been so often said, as it is to spend the same time in argument to prove the truth of a proposition which no man denies.

Mr. MACON said, before the question was taken, he wished to make a few observations, in doing which he would endeavor to follow the advice of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NELSON) who had just sat down; neither to repeat what others had said, nor to make a long speech. He felt no disposition to fatigue the House or to tire himself.

Mr. M. said he had, stated when he introduced several resolutions some days past, that there were but three alternatives—submission to the edicts of the two belligerents who had injured us—war —or a continuance of the embargo. If there were any other he had not discovered it, nor had any one yet told the House of another; but if any other productive of the same end should be offered, that would be more satisfactory to others, he was not so much attached to the embargo as to prevent his voting for that.

Do we know, said Mr. M., that we have a single friend in the civilized world? We have not Hannibal at the gate; but Rome and Carthage have both declared against us. Upon our own means alone we must depend, and if properly managed, they are equal to the crisis.

The second resolution reported by the committee, Mr. M. said, was in substance the same with two that he had moved. On this subject he had reflected much, not only since his arrival here, but while at home. On the subject of the embargo, he had endeavored to ascertain the opinion of well informed merchants and navigators, not of one political party, but of both. The result of the inquiry was that the embargo was a wise measure, and it was considered by some to have saved to the United States fifty thousand sailors and fifty millions of property. This was the smallest number of either which had been mentioned to him, and was not considered too high.

If you raise the embargo, said Mr. M., what will you do? Submission is out of the question; and there is no proposition for war on your table. This is a proof that all consider our present situation better than actual war; and in my opinion, the embargo, aided by the second resolution which proposes a non-intercourse, will produce all the effects which can be desired by us on the two great belligerent nations. The second resolution proposes to put both these nations on the same footing. In their conduct to us there is not much, if any difference. Great Britain impresses our seamen and attacked the Chesapeake frigate, and France pays no regard to the treaty which now exists between the two countries. In everything else I consider them as acting towards us alike, and at all times on the same principles. At this moment we have a law prohibiting the importation of certain goods from Great Britain, and the armed ships of that nation are prohibited by proclamation from coming into our waters. Adopt the resolution and you place the two nations on the same footing, and if one or both shall not like the situation, they know how to get out of it. We only want them to act justly towards us, and nothing more.

When gentlemen talk of trading to this or that place under present circumstances, they seem to forget the omnipotence of the English fleet, and that to carry on their desired trade, they must fight their way through that fleet. Permit me, sir, to add a few words as to war with both nations. Both have long endeavored to get us into the war on their side, and if we now go to war with both, it will be only a nominal war with France, while it will be an actual war with England; and so long as the British fleet prevents a French vessel from sailing on the ocean, so long the war will be only nominal with France, because we shall never meet. This to my mind is an additional reason, to induce us to try the embargo some time longer. To me it is clear as noon-day, that you cannot trade except to Great Britain and her dependencies without fighting your way through her fleet. I have another reason for wishing to try the embargo some time longer, and to have it amended in such manner as to prevent evasion. It is this; that from the earliest age of our country, we have believed that by withholding our supplies and withdrawing from the ocean for a while, we could bring the most powerful European nation to fair terms. The experiment is now making, and I am desirous that it should be fairly made; that if it succeed we shall know the value of the measure and if it fail, hereafter we may not depend on it.

Some gentlemen, living not very far from me, have advanced opinions on the subject of the carrying trade, against which I now, as I always have done, whenever I have heard them advanced, protest. I am now willing, and always was willing to go as far as any member of the House in the protection of the trade which fairly grew out of the agriculture and fisheries of the United States. I never will consent to risk the best interest of the nation, for a trade which we can carry on, only when Europe is at war. I do not hesitate to maintain this at this time, notwithstanding the cry, that a part of the United States are not only willing to cramp trade but to destroy it. A recurrence to the laws will show the great encouragement which has been given to it. Is the drawback nothing? Are the discriminating duties nothing? Besides these, many other things have been done for trade. Attempt to repeal only one of them, and you will immediately produce a ferment among the merchants. Ask the sailor too, who is brought home by the Government, if nothing has been done for him?

The uncommon state, in which Europe has been placed by the last and the present war, ought to make us at least cautious, not to enter into war with France and England, provided we can by just means keep out of it. There is no visible object for which they are contending, unless it be for the mastery of Europe. They have by some means or other involved every nation in Europe in their wars and quarrels, and have nearly ruined and destroyed all of them. When gentlemen speak of the evils which we suffer, not I say in consequence of the embargo, but of their wicked orders and decrees, let them compare our situation, and that too as bad as they declare it, with that of any nation which has gone into the war, and they will find that we have cause to rejoice. Compare it with that of Sweden, who has not suffered so much as many others, and they must be satisfied that our situation is far better than that of the Swedes. We have enough of the necessities of life to make us content, and there is no nation in the world, at this time, that enjoys more of the luxuries of Europe and of the East and West Indies than we do; in a word, none that enjoys more of the good things of this world.

We have heard as much said about the possibility of a trade to Spain, to Portugal, to the West Indies, and to South America, as if that trade was fairly open to us and perfectly secure. But when you compare this with what the gentleman from New York (Mr. MUMFORD) told us about the French officer, and the dispositions of the people of Orleans (and I regret he mentioned them, because they have no delegate here,) your attention will be drawn from this possible trade, to the troops in Nova Scotia and Jamaica; I will not hazard a conjecture as to their destination, but I will say we ought not to forget them. When I was up before I mentioned the spirit of '76. A gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) has since made many remarks on that spirit, but as he has already been satisfactorily answered by others, I shall only add, that it was a spirit of firmness, a spirit of perseverance, a spirit determined not to surrender the rights of the nation, and further, that it was a pacific spirit; having told the world, that the United States were independent, it only required of Great Britain to withdraw her troops and do us justice.

Gentlemen seem from their arguments to suppose, that only one part of the Union is interested on this subject. It is a subject, sir, in which the whole nation has a common interest. Foreign nations undertake to dictate to you, and to tax you, and yet only one part of the people interested! The same gentleman from Massachusetts seemed to consider it a question of trade. Be it so, for the sake of argument. Then he fully proved to my mind, that if the embargo was off, we should have little or no trade, because he says there is no danger of your paying tribute to England, for this plain reason, that if you go there, you cannot go thence to France or her dependencies, without your property being confiscated. Then, sir, carry all the produce of this nation to England, without the right to go elsewhere for a market, and you instantly glut that market; and experience has taught us, that under such circumstances, the price would scarcely pay the charges and duties. Let it not be forgotten that when we had a sort of war with France, the price of tobacco fell to almost nothing, compared to that which it bore before.

I speak of tobacco, because I am better acquainted with the price of that than any other article which we export. Before the war it was ten dollars per hundred at Petersburg, in Virginia, and in great demand; and before the war ended, it was not more than three dollars at the same place, and not in demand. The true cause of this fall in the price, was understood to be, that all the British markets were completely glutted, and that there was great difficulty in getting it to a market on the Continent of Europe. How has this same article been affected at the same place by the embargo? When it was laid, the price there did not exceed four and a half dollars, and it has not been less than three since. This, to my mind fully proves, that the embargo has not injured the price of it, whatever the orders and decrees of France and England may have done. No one can doubt, that if you were to raise the embargo, the first cargoes to Great Britain would command a good price; but the moment the market was glutted, it would scarcely pay the charges.

If I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts rightly, he said, that when I introduced the resolutions, I spoke with uncommon zeal, [Mr. QUINCY explained. He had said the gentleman had spoken with a zeal which did him honor.] Sir, permit me to assure that gentleman, that it was with no other zeal than for the welfare of our common country.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) used an argument against the embargo, and the plan now proposed, which to my mind was conclusive in favor of both. I thank him for it, because it is a better one than had occurred to me. He asked, who could have supposed that the two great conflicting interests of the nation, the agricultural and the commercial, would have united to suppress all trade? Can there be a stronger evidence of the correctness of the measure, than the union of these great conflicting interests in support of it? Would they join to support a measure which injured them both? No, sir, it was the interest of both that united them. An attempt has been made to compare the plan before you to the Chinese policy. No man in the nation can, it seems to me, seriously believe that we intend to introduce such a system; but, I will ask, would not a Chinese policy have been better for some of the nations of Europe, than the policy which they have pursued? Would it not have been better for Prussia?

In the part which I have taken in the whole of this business, if I know my own heart, there has been nothing of party in it. I have been willing from the first to discuss the question in any shape, in which any member might wish to have it discussed; and I differ very much from the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. DAWSON,) who has expressed a desire to have the question immediately taken. I hope that every member who wishes to give his sentiments, will be heard patiently; and if any one should be desirous of speaking more than once, he will have my consent to speak twenty times, if he desires it. If the embargo has produced no good, and is now only producing evil, it ought to be repealed. But I firmly believe that it has produced much good, and if the laws be properly amended, that it will produce all the good that ever was expected from it; for I cannot believe, notwithstanding the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that any respectable man will be found violating the laws of his country.

If you raise the embargo, where will you trade? You cannot calculate on trading with Spain and Portugal, and their dependencies, without the consent of Great Britain? For, notwithstanding they are contending for their independence, it is with the aid of England; and without that aid, they could not do much, because they could not get all the supplies that they stand in need of. It is not material to me, in the present question, for what Spain and Portugal are contending; but so far as they are contending for self-government, I wish them success. It is not in their power, with France on one side and Great Britain on the other, to afford us commerce on any just terms.

I agree with the gentleman that in a state of war, some of the seaport towns will suffer more than the interior country; but it is equally true that they will have all the advantages resulting from the expenditure of the public money, by which they will be enabled to speculate with profit on the country.

There is but one way when bad laws are passed, to have them altered, and that is by elections. They are the only correctives not only against them, but against every abuse of power. These have lately taken place, and so far as I am acquainted they terminated favorably to the embargo; in some districts it was made a question but without effect, in others, where a change had taken place, it is not pretended that the embargo had much effect, probably none.

It appears to me that there never was a time in which it was more necessary than the present, practically to observe one of the admonitions printed on the old Continental money—United we stand, divided we fall. Nothing but a strict attention to this can secure our rights; it will, as formerly, secure to us all that we ought in justice to expect. If, on a fair experiment, the proposed plan does not produce the desired effect, and I then have a seat in the National Legislature, I will go as far as any member in adopting such measures, as shall be best calculated to enforce our national rights.

I have nothing more to say; I have expressed my ideas in a very desultory manner, just as they have occurred. I did not expect to address you to day. I have endeavored to do that which I promised; not to repeat what others have said, and though I have tired myself, I hope I have not fatigued the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—It has been considered by every member, I believe, who has spoken on this subject, that the great question of our foreign relations is now before the House; not, sir, that this or that particular resolution is the subject-matter of our discussion, but that the ultimate course to be pursued by this country with respect to foreign Powers, is the point to be debated. It is, I conceive, not an unfavorable circumstance that this view of the question should have been taken; because, if not taken here and now, where, I beseech you, could it have been taken at all? The subject of our foreign relations has been referred to a committee, who have brought in a report. If we were to confine the discussion to the minute details of this report, to the mere naked question presented to us, where is the subject of our foreign relations to be discussed generally? So far as this particular question (which is but of little magnitude, though made a matter of much importance by gentlemen calling for the previous question and raising questions of order on it) is concerned, I feel myself scarcely interested in the decision. But I do feel myself interested to a degree which it is impossible for me to express, as to the course which this House will take on the subject ultimately. I think we are standing on the brink and verge of ruin. I address myself to this House; my observations are not intended for persons without these walls; they are addressed to the sober understanding of gentlemen who may chance to hear them.

In the few desultory observations which I threw out the other day, (more in the nature of heads of discourse, than regular connected argument,) I touched on one question on which I ask the patience of the House to hear me again. It is this: Wherefore was the Constitution of the United States created? Out of what did it grow? From what stock does the great mass of powers possessed by the Federal Government spring? From relations of peace and of war; from intercourse with foreign States; from commerce. It was more immediately the regulation of commerce which gave birth to this Constitution. It was not contemplated at that time that this nation should ever pursue that which, in my opinion, has been properly called a Chinese policy. It was as well known to the nation then as it is now, that by the revenue derived from commerce alone could the General Government be enabled to perfect its engagements, to keep the public faith, to provide for the general welfare and public safety. For this purpose the Constitution was adopted. I cannot help casting back my mind to the time when the adoption of that Constitution was agitated in the Convention of Virginia. I at this time tremble at the recollection of the predictions made in that body, when I think I can see their fulfilment near at hand. It was at that time foretold by the greatest statesman—if not the greatest statesman, the greatest orator that America ever knew, that if the time should ever come when the State and Federal Governments should have to be supported by revenue derived from direct taxation, the existence of the one or the other must be destroyed. An attempt to feel the public pulse on this subject, a mere attempt at experiment to collect a beggarly revenue of one or two millions, has already put down a former Administration. We are now called upon to resolve that we will have no connexion of import or export with the rest of mankind; to substitute this measure for war, for defence, for offence. What will be the inevitable result? Are we prepared to violate the public faith; to issue continental money again to pay the expenses of the Government? I know the case is provided for by the Constitution—but what are Constitutions themselves in the mighty convulsions of parties? Are we prepared for this state of things? I have the honor to belong to an important committee raised on the question, what shall we do with our surplus revenue; with the surplus revenue of a nation which neither buys nor sells; of a nation whose revenue is derived from duties on tonnage and imposts, and which is without import and without export. Sir, I hope to be excused, if, in the course of the observations which I make to you, I should not follow the example set me by my worthy friend from North Carolina, (Mr. Macon.) I feel myself too deeply interested to express myself with that method and precision, which is much to be desired, but cannot be attained at least by me. It does appear to me, sir, that the final extinction of the governments of these States is at hand. If we are to have no connexion with foreign nations, no Ministers abroad, none from other Powers residing with us, no trade, no relations of peace or of war, (for this state of non-intercourse contemplates neither the one nor the other,) where was the use of the General Government? It will no longer answer the purposes for which it was instituted. I hope I may not be misunderstood; nothing is further from my anticipation than the destruction of the General Government. My fear is that it will swallow up the governments of the States. I see by a late publication that the person who is perhaps to wield the destinies of this nation, has long thought that the governments of the States ought not to exist. Take this fact with another fact: that a question is pending before a committee of this House whether the powers of the General Government shall not be enlarged so as to narrow down still further the powers of the governments of the States. My fear is that the strength, grandeur, and magnificence of this Government will swallow up the power of the States. I have no hesitation in saying that the State which I represent cannot, by all the taxes which can be so squeezed out of her, yield her quota to the support of the General Government by direct taxation. What do you infer from this, sir? Is the General Government going to take the attitude of a State in the interior? Ask your greatest statesmen; ask the Secretary of the Treasury, out of what this Government grows. He will tell you, out of our foreign relations. It grows out of our power to supervise the concerns of this, with the Sovereigns of other nations. The moment we disrobe ourselves of this general power, and the Government of the United States employs itself in matters of mere local and interior regulation; in laying out and cutting canals; and building bridges, the governments of the States are extinguished—from that moment they cease to exist. The people will ask themselves this question: Since the Government of the United States has nothing to do with foreign relations, and we have no money to pay for the support of two Governments, where is the necessity of having two separate Governments directed to the same objects? This is my fear, and it is a fear which I feel it my duty to express.

No, sir; two Governments, each of them depending for support on one and the same people, and that support derived from direct taxation, cannot exist in this country. It is as much as the people of the country in which I live can do; I will go further, and say, it is more than they can now do to pay their contributions to the State treasury. They look forward to something like a restoration of the ancient state of things for their ability to do that, and to fulfil their engagements with one another.

My friend from North Carolina (Mr. Macon)

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

has said that this idea of coercing the nations of Europe by refusing to have intercourse with them, is as old as the Revolution. I wish to ask my friend from North Carolina, and other gentlemen who hear me, if the course to be pursued by us, a free, sovereign, and independent nation, for the purpose of coercing all the rest of the world, is that which it became the Colonies to take in order to coerce the mother country, possessing the monopoly of their commerce. Sir, I feel that it is impossible for me; the intimations which I have from within of my own weakness convince me that it is impossible for me to go over the ground which I intended to occupy in this discussion. I must throw out my ideas rather by way of inuendo than in any regular system. Is this nation, I ask, to pursue that course, in order to coerce all the nations of the world, which might have been a proper weapon for the coercion of the mother country who held the exclusive monopoly of our commerce? There is no analogy between the state of the rest of the world then and now, or between that of these United States then and now—between the relative situations of the parties, one of which undertakes to act on the other by this new-invented political machine. What is now the state of Spanish and Portuguese America, and what was it then? Totally changed. What is our condition? Entirely altered. We have now to fulfil the engagements which we have made—to pay the price of our independence. We were then free from debt, at least from public debt; and we freed ourselves from private debt by a confiscation of what we owed across the water. We might then do without revenue, because we had not the purposes to which revenue must necessarily be applied. With your marine, with your army, with your palaces on this hill and on that, a profuse expenditure of money in at least every civil department of the Government—and here let me not be understood as making charges against those who have now the conduct of the public affairs; it is an excrescence, an abuse growing out of such Governments as this—will you, with all these objects of expenditure, dispense with your revenue? If not, whence is it to be derived, if you declare that you will not suffer your produce to go abroad, nor hold any intercourse with the rest of the world? You must look at home for it; there is nothing left but direct taxation and excise duties.

I confess for one that I was mortified at seeing the proceedings of the first Continental Congress resorted to, to justify the proceedings of independent America. In the year 1774, when we were provinces, loyal and submissive petitions were addressed to His Majesty, and addresses made to the people of Great Britain, Ireland, and Jamaica, one of which was read by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) in his place. There the old Congress say to the people of Jamaica, you have nothing more to do than to convert a little sugar land into provision ground, and our measures will not hurt you in the least; and this, sir, was introduced to show our power of affecting the West India islands, by withholding our supplies. We know that the West India planters have already profited of the advice we gave them in 1774. [Here Mr. BACON asked leave to explain]—Mr. RANDOLPH said that he yielded the floor with pleasure to the gentleman from Massachusetts, for he found himself scarce able to proceed, and but that he thought he perceived in the House a disposition to force the question—[Here Mr. RANDOLPH was interrupted by Mr. LOVE, who said that with the consent of the gentleman from Virginia he would move to adjourn, which was agreed to.]

The consideration of the unfinished business being resumed, on Monday, the SPEAKER said that the gentleman from Virginia was entitled to the floor. After a short pause—

Mr. RANDOLPH rose and observed that it would argue a decree of insensibility, which he trusted was wholly foreign from his nature, were he not penetrated with the polite deference paid to him by the House on Saturday last. He was sincerely grateful for that instance of their liberal and generous attention, but he feared he had exposed them to needless trouble—that the same incapacity which prevented him from going on then, still existed in a degree that would disable him from doing to the subject even that feeble justice which his powers in their best state might have enabled him to render it.

He entered into a recapitulation of some of his former remarks, he considered the country as standing in an awful and momentous condition; that we were about to make a virtual sacrifice of that very independence, which in words we propose to assert, and stood on the verge of a mighty revolution in our own political institutions. In this apprehension he might be mistaken, he hoped in God he was; but if he did not conscientiously entertain it, he would not obtrude himself upon their attention. The powers of the General Government growing out of foreign relations and out of commerce, when these were cut off, and the source from which alone revenue was derived, dried up, the General Government must act on the citizen through the medium of excise and direct taxation. The burden of this Government and that of the State Governments would be beyond the capacity of our citizens to bear. The necessary effect must be the doing away the State Governments, and directing the operation of the General Government to matters of municipal and local concern. Was he not justified in drawing these conclusions from past experience and from circumstances within the knowledge of every man who heard him? Was it not proposed at that very moment to extend the sphere of action of the General Government at the expense of the State Governments; was it not then a question whether the power of the State Governments should be materially diminished and that of the General Government proportionably augmented? Unquestionably it was. The Federal Government might be (he did not aver that it was not) eminently calculated for Federal purposes, but considered as a consolidated Government it was highly objectionable. He could not but feel alarmed when he saw that the person who was to preside over our future destinies had been from the very beginning of the Federal Constitution inimical to the existence of the State Governments. He was impressed with the deepest apprehension for the existence of these institutions. His fears might be unfounded, but they were sincere.

He must again repeat his regret, that the only system of coercion upon Europe, generally, which the wisdom of that House had been able to discover, was that system which, in a state of colonial weakness and dependence thirty-four years ago, we were obliged to have recourse to in order to obtain a boon from the mother country. They had heard much in that debate of the spirit of '76. What was that spirit. It was this—"touch the soil and you touch the life-blood of every man upon it." And yet, sir, this soil has been violated without exciting scarcely a sensation in the heart which pulsates here and distributes life and heat to every extremity of the body politic. Let us not talk of the spirit of '76, if this be the only demonstration which we can give of that spirit being alive. We were not up to the colonial spirit of 1774-5. The old Congress at the very moment when they asked for justice had taken more vigorous measures to enforce and secure it, than the United States had yet done. Long before their Declaration of Independence, Montgomery had bled under the walls of Quebec.

But what was our present system of coercion? One which told Europe in the plainest language, attested by solemn public acts of the individual States, that its first operation on ourselves was such as obliged us to shut up our courts of justice. That sort of popularity derived to a great national measure from suspending the execution of justice between man and man, from the virtual exoneration of men from the payment of their just and lawful debts, was a species of popularity which he never wished to see in this country. A system which was compelled to resort to such means for its support might well be said, in the new-fangled language of the times, to go to the demoralization of society, to strike at the very root of common honesty. This new-invented system of coercion which was to bring all Europe to our feet, had gone across the Atlantic accompanied with declarations of Georgia and Virginia, (and their example promised to be generally followed,) that the distress occasioned by it among ourselves was such as to render it immediately necessary to obstruct the natural course of the great stream of justice. What kind of respect would the belligerents pay to a measure whose operation we confessed to be thus destructive to ourselves? It would, if persevered in, end not only in shutting up the courts of justice, but the exchequer also. It was not possible to derive from any source but commerce, a revenue adequate to the support of the General Government. The State Governments were supported generally by direct taxes, but if the supply from commerce be taken away, the General Government must resort to the same mode of taxation; and what would be the consequence? A conflict between the sheriff and the marshal for the property of the citizen, and when that was exhausted, for his person; which, he supposed, like the child in the judgment of Solomon, must be divided between the two claimants. This was a state of things which could not long exist. He asked gentlemen to calculate the indispensable annual revenue required for the support of this Government, and then say whether they can derive it from direct taxation and excises, to say nothing of the sums necessary for the support of the State institutions. If the operation of our embargo abroad was such as it had been at home, it might well have been boasted of as a measure of coercion. He would have been the last man to have denied its efficacy, or to have wished its repeal, if he could see it bringing such distress on Great Britain, as that the Court of King's Bench should be compelled to suspend its proceedings, whilst her every source of revenue was at the same time cut off. But when he saw its actual operation upon us, and its operation on our enemies, on France and Great Britain, at least questionable, if not altogether imaginary, he could not consent to continue it at such an expense of privation as the people must incur in consequence of it.

It had unfortunately happened that during the whole course of the discussion there had been an extreme want of precision with respect to the object in view. They had had enough, and more than enough, of the aggressions of foreign Powers. They did not want a history of the disease, but the remedy to be indicated. Not a word had been uttered that went to show that a suspension of intercourse with the belligerents, would have any effectual operation on them. His friend from North Carolina (Mr. MAÇON) had indeed told them that if we ventured to sea, if we meant to have any sort of foreign commerce, we must be prepared to contend with the British navy—that our foreign commerce was dependent on the will of England, and therefore we must do it away altogether. To what would this lead? Suppose the belligerents to interrupt our coasting trade—to capture our vessels bound from Charleston to New York. Must we therefore prohibit it? Suppose a British fleet lying in Hampton Roads, and the communication between Norfolk and Baltimore enjoyed purely by sufferance. Should we pass a law to prevent Deagle's packet from clearing out for Baltimore, by way of remedy for the mischief, and style it a system of coercion and retaliation. Would any man dream of coercing the enemy by such a device? This mode of cutting our throats to save our lives, Mr. R. could not understand. To what extent did the argument go? Fully to this—that in proportion as the belligerents pressed upon us we must recede—and so promptly and rapidly too as never to come in contact with them. This was certainly an admirable recipe for avoiding war; one by which the swiftfooted Achilles himself might have kept out of the combat, since he had only to take his distance from the enemy and keep it.

DECEMBER, 1808.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

He did not expect to have heard, because any branch of our commerce was annoyed by the belligerents, that we should therefore annoy it ourselves to a yet greater degree; that because it was liable to partial attack, we should annihilate it.

With his friend from Georgia (Mr. TROUP) he was not willing to kneel at the footstool of the throne of the Gallic or British Sovereign and beg for commerce. He considered this observation as rather unfortunate for the argument of his friend from Georgia. If it applied anywhere it must be to our own proposition to raise the embargo if Great Britain would withdraw her Orders in Council. It was somewhat curious that gentlemen should have exhausted their lungs, as well as their ingenuity, in portraying the humiliating situation in which commerce was placed previous to the embargo, when we had offered to raise the embargo, and put the trade of the United States on that very footing which it had been said no American would accept. There appeared to have been a very gross mistake amongst the members of that body in relation to the causes out of which the embargo grew. In order to ascertain the point, he would call for the reading of the President's Message recommending the measure. [It was read by the Clerk—as follows.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The communications now made showing the great and increasing dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, are threatened on the high seas and elsewhere, from the belligerent Powers of Europe, and it being of the greatest importance to keep in safety these essential resources, I deem it my duty to recommend the subject to the consideration of Congress, who will doubtless perceive all the advantages which may be expected from an inhibition of the departure of our own vessels from the ports of the United States. Their wisdom will also see the necessity of making every preparation for whatever events may grow out of the present crisis.

TH. JEFFERSON.

Mr. R. proceeded—The House could not fail to recollect that “the communications then made” consisted of information from Paris that the Berlin decree was executed to the full extent of the letter of it, and the proclamation of the British King calling home his native subjects, of which we had not an official copy, but one cut out of a newspaper. The Orders of Council, although in existence, were not known even unofficially, or the House would have been apprized of them. To offer to withdraw the embargo, then, on the withdrawal of the Orders in Council, was to acknowledge, if not that the measure was laid without cause, at least that that state of commerce was desirable on our part, which had been described on that floor as the most degrading and injurious that could be conceived. It was to leave our resources (our seamen, especially, about whom so much had been said) exposed to the very dangers against which the embargo had been adopted to guard.

felt a physical incapacity to present his ideas on the subject in a condensed, and he feared he might add an intelligible form. He had never when attempting to address the Chair labored under it in an equal degree. He asked the indulgence of the House for the length and want of connexion of his remarks.]

But it had been said since the belligerents would not consent to give their aid in ridding us of the embargo, we must pass stronger laws to enforce it, and cut off all intercourse with them. There was a wide difference between an open and hostile resistance to a law, and a clandestine evasion of it. The powers of the Government were unquestionably adequate to suppress the first, and he would be among the foremost to direct the sword of justice against that man, who should openly put the laws of his country at defiance—but it was not in the power of the Government to prevent clandestine evasions, and when he heard intimations of an intention to cut off the coasting trade, and river navigation, by way of enforcing the embargo, he was seized with horror and consternation. But the embargo had kept up the price of produce. This one of its merits was matter of very late and prodigious discovery. To what was the embargo price of tobacco owing? To the home consumption?—Certainly not. To men of capital investing their money in it by way of speculation, calculating on a great profit when the embargo shall be raised. As to the embargo price of flour—to what was that to be ascribed? Not to the consumption at home, but to the fact that the flour, the embargo laws to the contrary notwithstanding, had found its way out of the country—and for whose benefit? The growers were choused out of fifty per cent. of the produce of their land and labor to make fortunes for dishonest daring mercantile adventurers, who bought at home at half price and sold abroad for three or four prices. Was such a state of things desirable? That our sole measure of action against the belligerents should only react upon ourselves and amongst ourselves with peculiar, nay, almost exclusive severity on the honest part of the community, while the dishonest were reaping enormous profit from it? Was it to be expected that the honest men of the country would bear such a system when they should come to understand it? They would not—they would (as they had done before) change their Representatives, if they would not change the law. It was not the Shylocks of this country (as his friend from Georgia supposed) who were opposed to the embargo. As far as his knowledge went, men of that character were among its most distinguished advocates—and wherefore? The nominal market price of almost every article, except those from which the lauded interest drew their supplies, had either remained stationary or had increased. Produce was down, land and slaves fallen—everything except the product of the land and labor of the country was either up to the old rate, or has risen to an alarming height. What was the consequence? That Shylock, with one dollar, with a single ducat, can now make as great a profit out of the suffering planter, can purchase as much actual property, as before he could with two. The value of his commodity—money—was doubled, that of his neighbor sunk in the same proportion; could that be displeasing to him? And accordingly in Virginia the dealers in deeds of trust and mortgages and your five per cent. per month men were warm advocates of the embargo. They either had money, or could get it by bank accommodation, and thus (to use a vulgar but expressive phrase) could shave their neighbors on their own terms, and get rich to an incalculable extent.

There was another and important view of this subject. No sooner did the resolution for cutting off all intercourse with the two great belligerents pass through the Committee of the whole House, than the vast capital which exists principally to the North and East, set itself in motion. This fluid, which in a healthy state of the system had been employed in the great and salutary work of circulation, had been pent up in the body politic until it had acquired an acrimonious quality. It had hitherto been active in carrying off our redundant products and bringing back such as we wanted in exchange; but the embargo denying it a free vent it had become morbid by stagnation and was corroding the system which it had once nourished and exhilarated. Immediately on the passage of that resolution the spirit of monopoly stalked abroad—the great capitalists had dashed into the market and purchased up every article which nature and habit have rendered necessary to us—they had bought up salt, dry goods, everything that they could lay their hands upon, gutting the very shops of the petty retailers. At whose cost are they to be reimbursed? At the cost of the public—of the great consuming body. If things were restored to the old channel, the loss, if any, would fall upon those best able to bear it, upon the men of great capital; although it would not be difficult to show that, in such a case, they might re-export their purchases at a profit. If the system were continued it must grind the people down to a state of the most abject poverty and depression. It was a system which might suit Asiatics, but was never adapted to the American spirit. It might do for the Chinese; but, even granting it to be the best policy eventually for us, no man who pretended to the character of a practical statesman would attempt to make a total change of the habits of a nation in one night. Great changes to be beneficial must be gradual, not forced upon the people. Nature might be coaxed, but she would not be coerced with impunity.

His friend and colleague (Mr. BURWELL) had said that to express the pressure of the embargo on ourselves was to encourage the enemy, inciting him as it were to persevere in his measure. He had compared our situation to that of a besieged town, and asked, if we ought to apprise the besiegers that we were nearly out of provisions, that we could not hold out another week? Mr. RANDOLPH accepted the comparison. Under such circumstances suppose a council of war to be held, he would not hesitate to say to his compatriots and fellow-soldiers that it was better to perish in a glorious sally, than die by inches in the trenches of disease and famine. He should not be deterred by the fear that the enemy would take advantage of their deliberations. In the present case they had the most authentic intelligence of our real situation—it was upon record in acts of assembly of States the most zealous in support of Administration, and in the proposals of Government itself. He feared that without some change the public spirit would become so completely broken, so entirely paralyzed, that we might almost as well be overrun by an enemy as reduced to so torpid and degraded a condition.

The capital, which we would not suffer to employ itself in a natural and salutary direction, had, to use the expression, turned its arms against the State. It was engaged in monopolizing salt and every article of the first necessity, to be resold at the most exorbitant advance, because we would not suffer it to take our cotton, tobacco, fish, &c. abroad, and bring us returns for it at the most reasonable rate. During the whole discussion it appeared, that gentlemen had indulged themselves in begging the question. As a planter he could not conceive how he husbanded his own resources by suffering his crop to perish on his hands, instead of paying his debts or purchasing necessities with its proceeds; nor how he assisted the belligerents by exchanging one superfluity for another—for the wines and brandies of France, for example. How did we impair the resources of the European Powers or aid our own by the destruction of the whole product of our country? But to return to the effect of the embargo on the price of produce, which had nearly escaped him. His friend from Carolina (Mr. MACON) had said, that if all our produce were pent up in England, the price would be lower even than it then was. Was there any necessity for its being pent up in Great Britain? Could gentlemen devise no other vent for it? Was it not notorious that Sweden, an independent Kingdom; having no orders or decrees against us, was open to its reception? and was it not equally well known that if we could get our produce to Gottenburg, that it would find its way to the rest of the Continent, as heretofore it had done from Hamburg and Bremen? There was a common sense view of this subject, that settled the question. When it is understood out of the House that the embargo is to be continued, produce falls—with a whisper that it is to be taken off, produce rises. The mere motion of a colleague (Mr. SAWYER) of his friend from Carolina to open a trade to the West Indies, had a sensible effect on the Baltimore market. There was not a merchant who would not give more for a barrel of flour, or a hogshead of tobacco, on condition that the embargo was to be raised. To contend, then, that the embargo kept up the price of produce was absurd. Go into the market, and the theory vanished when you come to purchase. It was in vain to oppose argument, however ingenious, against fact and experience. It was matter of notoriety—let us not attempt to cheat ourselves in this thing. Produce was bought with no other view than to its exportation. Prohibition of export could not enhance its price. If this position be not true words had lost their meaning.

During the course of the debate, recurrence had been had to past transactions. For one he could have wished that they might have been passed over in silence, but the state of affairs at present seemed to render it almost impossible. He begged gentlemen to carry back their minds to the time when the right of deposit at New Orleans was arbitrarily suspended. It was a time of general peace in Europe. The nation committing the wrong was the known ally of France—identified, he might say, with her. What did we do? Did we declare independence? Did we assert our rights in one resolution, and in another immediately forbid their exercise? No—we declared in a prompt and spirited manner that we were willing to view the aggression as the unauthorized act of an individual, that we would apply to his Government for redress; but we pledged ourselves to maintain at every hazard our right of navigation through the Mississippi, as established by existing treaties and the laws of nations and of nature. With this declaration in his hand our Minister went abroad. It was made when Europe was at peace, and when, for aught we knew, the whole combined force of France and Spain, unshackled by the British navy, would be brought to bear upon us. We gained our point, and more than gained it. If we had met with a denial of justice, no doubt remained of the alternative. He knew too well the temper of the House at that day not to feel assured that we should have taken redress into our own hands; and had we spent fifteen millions of money to acquire the possession of both banks of the Mississippi, but five short years ago, and shall we now be the first to shut it up? Even the Spaniards had not carried their audacity so far. They did not require us to come to, and give bond and security that our property should not be carried out of the river—they only disputed our right to deposit it on their own territory; and had we spent fifteen millions for the sovereignty of that river merely to deprive our citizens of the right to use it, when we would not submit for a moment to its suspension by those who rightfully held both banks of it? It was to our vigorous proceedings at that day, that we were indebted for the possession of Louisiana. It was in that fatal session of 1805-'6, that the policy of yielding to anything that might come in the shape of insult and aggression was commenced. The result was then foretold. It has happened. What was then prophecy is now history. We are completely entangled in the web of our own irresolute, hesitating policy. The Gordian knot cannot be untied. It must be cut. We must cut the Lilliputian fetters which have so long bound us to the earth.

Mr. R. hoped his friend from North Carolina would consider the notice which he had taken of his arguments only as an evidence of the profound respect and veneration in which he held the qualities of his heart and understanding. His friend had requested the House to take warning by the fate of the Powers of Europe, and, with an infelicity which he could not have expected from a man of his sagacity, had held up Prussia as an example—herself the victim of a short-sighted, timid, temporizing policy. She might have saved Europe. She consented to become the pander of French ambition and she has received her reward; that reward which awaits all who descend to act the same ignoble, loathsome and detestable part. No more of Prussia, sir—veluti in speculo—in the fate of Prussia, as in a mirror, we may see our own, if once we consent to be governed by Prussian Councils.

On the subject of our trade there was one plain and obvious answer to every man who objected to raising the embargo as the commencement of a struggle for our indubitable maritime rights. It was this; that those who were most to be affected by it—the merchants, excepting a few—for example, those who have vessels out and take care that they shall never come in, and who, whilst the great mass of our tonnage is rotting in our ports, are themselves receiving an enormous premium, which the competition of that tonnage would deprive them of; and those who have in the country an immense stock of foreign goods, the price of which they now must raise three or four hundred per cent., and thus make them nabobs at the expense of the community; excepting these, the merchants are willing to run the risk; and if we do not choose to protect them, at least we may leave them and the insurance offices to settle the business between themselves. If we will not engage to protect them, let us not incapacitate them by way of apology for not protecting them. They tell us that they can find ways and means to get rid of our produce and get a better price for it, if we will permit them. It is then their affair. But gentlemen say that by the captures at sea we shall be immediately involved in war. Well—do not gentlemen tell us that we are now at war? Was not this one of their war measures—part of their great system of coercion? And yet to avoid this war, in which we are actually involved, we are to do—What? Show our heels to the enemy and our indignant fronts to our own helpless citizens. It was high time that the vigor of this Government (if any it have; and he believed it had more than any in the world) should be displayed on some other theatre than our own country, and on some other objects than our own citizens. It was indeed time that this vigor should be husbanded for the aggressors on our rights, and not that the whole vial of our wrath should be poured out on the heads of our own offending people. Let gentlemen take into consideration the condition of the country—the Eastern States particularly. Had they no pity? No compassion upon the distresses of those people, and in fact upon the privations and sufferings of the whole mass of our society? Was all their force and energy to be exerted only upon ourselves? Or shall we determine that, inasmuch as foreign nations will not do us justice, to the best of our ability, so help us God! we will do justice to ourselves?

His friend from Virginia (Mr. BURWELL) had told the House that there was a very strong interest in Great Britain in favor of making war upon us. We know that the naval, the West India, and East India interests are, so disposed—that would have been a good reason for treating when it was in our power—but shall we therefore now give up the ground? Because a portion of her subjects are hostilely disposed towards us, shall we put on an aspect precisely pacific in proportion to the airs which they may assume? We knew that France was disposed to make war upon us; that nothing but the ocean, interposed as a non-conductor between us, prevented her—that she had injured us to the extent of her ability. Should we therefore propitiate the resentment of her monarch by a sacrifice of our rights? It was a doctrine which he never expected to have heard on the floor of the American House of Representatives. The cup of patience was exhausted. We had drained the chalice of humiliation to the dregs. If instead of asserting our rights against the aggressors we were determined to forego them forever, instead of re-enacting the Declaration of Independence, let us expunge it from the statute book, and agree to hold a middle rank in the scale of beings between the nations of Europe and the aboriginal savages. Indeed there was not an Indian tribe, however reduced, that would unresistingly suffer what we had endured. There was not a man that ever wore a string of wampum, even if he were the last of his tribe, who would not consider himself disgraced by such submission. The time for temporizing had gone by—this is the time for acting. If we would not act, let us not in one breath assert our rights and in the next resign them, and punish whosoever shall trespass against that determination. The nation was undone. It could not exist under such a system. Shall we come out with a fine, vaporing, flourishing resolution about honor and independence, and sneak out of it by forbidding our citizens to do that which we declare every man of them is entitled of right to do? Shall we turn our face from the enemy, and put on the angry frown of vindictive cowardice towards our own people? Show him the man who dare not resent an insult, who shrinks from his adversary in public, and he would show you a tyrant in his family. In proportion as his courage sinks where there is danger, so does it rise where there is none—in every respect the reverse of the man of real honor and real spirit. Such he hoped they would not make their model. But why did he thus idly waste his strength in a vain attempt to express the few confused and scattered ideas floating in his mind. He would recall the attention of the House to matter of sober and melancholy fact—the condition of the people. What was it? In Virginia the September frost had destroyed nearly half the crop, and the embargo half the value of the remainder; debts pressing on the planter and taxes to pay. But perhaps gentlemen might ask, will you go to war—will you lay a land tax? He would not, for one, add to the burden on the citizen—but he would scuffle for commerce as the only means of relieving him, the only chance for revenue. He would make the struggle, and if we could not maintain our rights, in the worst event, we would but resort to what was now proposed to be done in the first instance.

Mr. R. approved the first member of the second resolution which went to exclude ships of war from our ports. It wore an aspect of impartiality, although one of the belligerents, it was well known, would be little affected by it. The second member of the resolution was objectionable to him, not only as operating exclusively on one of them, and in a manner meeting the views of the other, but because he was for opening our ports to the products of both, and of the whole world, at once to supply ourselves with necessities, and the means of revenue. Our merchants believe that, if let alone, they could by their enterprise carry on a lucrative trade, and get us a better price for our produce. He was at least willing to indulge them in the experiment. He could not see the grounds upon which gentlemen refused their assent. If it failed, they were not obliged to be answerable for its failure; but so long as Government tied their hands, it was responsible for the consequences. Let them go. In short, if we would not maintain them in the exercise of their indisputable rights, at least let us not forbid them from attempting to use them. If the law will not protect your person when you pass your foot over your threshold, let it not therefore confine you close prisoner in your own house.

MONDAY, December 5.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The unfinished business of Saturday last being the report of the committee on our foreign relations, was taken up.

Mr. RANDOLPH spoke about an hour and a half, in continuation of his observations of Saturday, as given entire in preceding pages.

Mr. LOVE addressed the Chair as follows: I rise under circumstances of extreme discouragement to address you, sir, while the sound of a voice which never fails to interest in a superior degree still vibrates on my ear.

Any man whom I have ever yet seen stand on the floor of a deliberative body, who should be compelled to follow the gentlemen last up would, I confess, sir, have occasion for a great share of the politeness and condescension of his audience: It is because I so highly honor that disposition to indulgence, which this body has so often manifested, that I have now determined to obey the impulse of duty, at the hazard of, and while I feel myself transported beyond the restraint of personal considerations.

In the observations which I contemplate offering to the House, it shall be my endeavor to limit myself as much as possible to those important topics of discussion actually before us; and while I cannot consent to consider anything properly admissible in argument, which does not relate to the great questions presented us by the report and resolution, I shall be excused in expressing my regret that the members of the committee which has led us to the view of this vast and extensive field of political survey, have hitherto refrained from a presentation of their statements in support of the measures which they recommend to our adoption.

The report must ever be acknowledged on all sides as a most able and correct exposition of the real situation in which the United States stand in relation to foreign nations; nor do I, sir, consider the conclusions drawn by the committee as less entitled to the unqualified approbation of every American. I lament that it has not been the pleasure of the House to consider them both in a connected point of view, the latter as the natural and apt consequence of the former; and that a disposition has been evidenced even in the friends of this connected system still more effectually to disjoint it, by dividing the question on the first resolution. This seems indeed to be a kind of parliamentary mode, too fashionable with some gentlemen of this House. It has certainly however relieved the debate from some embarrassment, when gentlemen who argue in opposition to the measures recommended have at length given some character to their arguments; for although the gentleman last up, did a few days ago very much insist on the entire futility of the first resolution then, as now, the subject of debate, he to-day is willing to admit that he discerns in the measure consequences of the utmost and most substantial importance to our country.

The leading position stated in the report has certainly a strong claim, if true, on the serious attention of this House, and of the nation; it is, that those principles recognised by the civilized world under the name of laws of nations, which heretofore controlled belligerent Powers, regulated the duties of neutrals, and protected their rights, are now avowedly disregarded or forgotten by Great Britain and France. Each of these two nations capture and condemn all American vessels trading with her enemies or her enemies' allies, and every European Power having become a party in the contest, the whole of our commerce with Europe and European colonies becomes liable to capture by either one or the other. Is this statement founded in fact, sir? Has the able illustration which follows it been contradicted? No sir, no part of the vast accumulation of injury exhibited in support of this assertion of the committee, has any gentleman ventured to deny. Sir, it is a fact, that the Milan decree of December 17, 1807, was, as in its terms it purports to be, a complete rejoinder to the orders of the British Government, closing every point of commercial right contended for by neutrals; in technical language it tendered an issue, which, for us it seems, has been too fatally accepted by the opposite party.

Permit me, sir, to occupy a small portion of the time of this House, in placing in as obvious a point of view as I am able, the effects upon our prosperity of those injurious violations of rights. This has indeed been already done by other gentlemen most ably, and I shall now only so far concisely notice the subject, as may be necessary to the introduction of my argument. It was true, indeed, that antecedent to the late blockade of some of the West India islands, which we have seen advertised by a British admiral, there was left to us a few of the crumbs of commerce, not, however, worth picking up; but in the present complete state of exclusion, either positive or virtual, there is nothing left for the commercial enterprise of this country, but certain loss and destruction, should it be permitted to venture on the seas. France, as active as the crippled state of her marine will allow her to be, consigns to the flames our vessels if met with on the ocean, and truly, in the spirit of that retaliation which both nations avow as the rule of their conduct, thus destroys our vessels lest they should fall into the hands of her enemy. Even as the Briton served the Dane, so has the American to a lesser extent suffered under the most outrageous and aggravating system of violence which has ever disgraced the annals of civilization. It is admitted on all hands, that unless the produce of our soil can find its way to the continent of Europe, it is in vain that the raisers of it may expect a price adequate even to its freight across the ocean. It is therefore only urged, sir, either from a want of consideration, or from a disposition to delude and deceive the people of the United States (that part of them I mean who are not conversant in commercial affairs) that it is insisted that the tobacco, and other heavy articles of our produce, may still be transported with any chance of profit to any part of Europe. If to England, it has been ably shown that the superabundant supply would so far overstock that market as to reduce it below the price of its freight, even if it could be insured against French risks; but if bound directly to France, it is proved to us, sir, not by speeches in Parliament, or ministerial pamphlets, but by the examination on oath of men all their lives conversant in trade, that the risk is considered as equal to ninety per cent. since the emanation of the British orders of blockade of November the 11th, 1807. To go directly to France or the ports of the Continent under her control, is out of the question. England has forbidden it, and she has the physical means, the mechanical force which carries her orders against us into effect to almost an absolute certainty.

The only practical course left open for our commerce is a transportation of its articles in the first place to England, and then, sir, we are condescendingly told, and it is said to be yielded, as a mitigated measure of strict justice on the part of His Britannic Majesty, that we may, on the payment of a tax and an acknowledgment of his right to tribute, proceed to a nation where we might find a demand for our products. Let us suppose then, that there is an American who could be found base enough, in the pursuit of gain, thus to make a formal unqualified surrender of everything which pertains to the honor and dignity of his country. He pays a tax to England, and under the royal license he departs from the British port into which he has been forced. No difficulty will follow with such men, I know, sir, in using the arts of fraud, perjury, and corruption, to put on the false show of having made a direct voyage. Indeed, the mean spirit which could stoop to dishonor the flag of its country, is in my opinion past other censure. He arrives in a continental port, and under the mask of deception, puts off his polluted wares; he receives in return a cargo of the products of the country which has afforded a high price for his tobacco, or other article of American growth; he takes a clearance for the United States, but again when at sea, upon the calculation of ninety per cent. against his safe return to America, he is compelled again to visit and pay his tribute to England; independent of the disgraceful surrender of the sovereignty of his nation. Where are the profits, which under such circumstances could insure to the agriculturist a price equal to the freight even of the article? The estimate of taxes has been already made by other gentlemen, who have had the patience or curiosity to make a calculation on the subject, and it has been proved, that on the score of profit, no inducement would be offered for such a prostitution of character.

Thus, sir, we find that such has been the actual state of all our commerce in the products of our country, ever since the British and French decrees have been in operation, that neither the fair and honorable conduct of the American merchant, nor yet the mean and corrupt submission of those who would barter for gain all sense of the independence and dignity of their country, would secure a price for our commodities. No doubt can exist on the mind of any man who will take a candid view of the real situation in which our external commerce was placed by the conduct of the belligerents, but that the embargo has from a particular operation, and the state of sentiment among our merchants, had the effect of keeping up the prices of our produce, beyond what they would have been, had we permitted our commerce to be exposed to the capture of foreign nations.

I have been compelled to take this short notice of the situation of things produced by the British orders of November 11, 1807. And, before I proceed, give me leave to say that to my astonishment I have heard the gentleman from Virginia, last up (Mr. RANDOLPH,) assert more than once on this floor, that this state of things was not known to us, and that we were not informed of the British Orders in Council at the time the embargo was laid. It is a fact, sir, that those orders were understood at that time, or might have been so by every gentleman in Congress; for, by a recurrence to a newspaper (the National Intelligencer) printed in this city, on the 18th of December—the day I believe on which we received the President's Message—it will be found, that in no less than three extracts from British papers, two I think from London, and one from Liverpool, those orders were said to have issued on the day they are now found to bear date, and their import and effect are as well defined in those publications as I believe they have since any where been. The paper I allude to was read by gentlemen of every description of political opinion, and indeed by those of no description, if we have such in Congress, and I recollect some gentleman did in debate urge the weight of this intelligence. I well remember, that many, and myself among others, did insist on the probability of those retaliatory measures on the part of England, as soon as it was known there that France meant to act on the decree of November, 1806, against American commerce; but I do not pretend to say that the gentleman heard this, or any other argument used on that occasion.

It appears to me, sir, far from improbable that our Government might have information at that time, although not of so authentic a nature, or perhaps of too delicate a one to disclose it, that the British orders would certainly issue; when we recollect that our Minister who had been resident at London, and at his own request had returned, did actually leave England from the 10th to the 14th, I believe, of November, and was on the 18th of December, either at this place, or somewhere in the United States; where he had an opportunity of corresponding with the members of the Government, I think the probability of a pretty certain intimation of their existence, very much enhanced.

The debate on the subject of the embargo, I have always considered, sir, as disorderly in the present discussion. The time will come when it will probably not be so; it will then be in time to see whether this measure has had its expected effect; but I have felt myself compelled to notice so much of the statement of the gentleman last up, lest false impressions might be made on the minds of others, as to the whole ground which influenced the measure. The Message, and so much of the documents accompanying it, as the reading of has been called for, I also admit were important in forming a decision, but I do not acquiesce under the charges so often here and elsewhere repeated, that this House was solely governed by the reasons assigned in the Message for the measure.

I beg the pardon of the House for having suffered myself to be led from the subject of discussion before us. I shall now proceed to consider the system of measures recommended by the committee; it is time indeed, I admit, to adopt some course which shall be strongly calculated to produce an effect on our enemies; and whatever may be the construction put by different persons on the character of the embargo, and whether that was a measure of coercion or otherwise, I do not hesitate to avow that we should now pursue a course of policy avowedly retaliatory, having reprisal for its direct object. Neither our interests nor our honor permit us longer to hesitate. The measures indicated by the second resolution, are in my opinion wisely designed, and eminently calculated for this purpose. Even the gentleman from Virginia sees in them a strong and energetic character; they are indeed of a distinct description from the embargo. That was perhaps a measure of a mixed character, intended for immediate self-preservation, and with a probable ulterior design of coercion on our enemies. The one of those effects has been realized to a most salutary extent. The other I believe, sir, would have been so, had not the means of counteraction, which have been so painfully and so often dwelt on, been resorted to, by the unprincipled part of the mercantile community, often in combination, I believe, with a foreign Power.

Foreign Relations.

If Mr. Canning is correct in the assertion contained in his letter of the 23d September, that the ruin of the commercial prosperity of Great Britain must annihilate her existence, the contemplated inhibition of commerce with that kingdom will have a direct effect, and act coercively upon her. When we reflect upon the situation of Europe, and find that there remains no place of importance to which England can export the articles of her manufactures, upon which her people depend for subsistence and life; and when we recollect that from the estimates before us, since the occlusion of British goods from the European continent, the importations to this country have increased in one year fifty per cent., the effect of a total non-importation cannot be misapprehended. It must, it will, retort upon her the most aggravating part of her system of outrage on this country; it will affect her interior relations, as she has attempted to affect ours.

I hazard nothing, sir, by asserting that whatever may be the result, the measure is calculated to have a most powerful effect, on both France and England.

But, were it not a call which the honor and independence of our country has made on us, to offer some means of retaliation and reprisal, it must be notorious to every man of reflection; that the safety of our own country; and its real resources call for an immediate suspension of intercourse. I have shown that so long as the present state of things continues in Europe, it is impossible the heavy articles of our produce can find a competent market. If the manufactures, however, of those countries are continued to be imported, our merchants will continue to make remittances. Those remittances can be in nothing but money, and thus we shall be drained of the little specie which, under the disadvantages of our commerce, has yet been left among us; our own safety, therefore, not less than the desire which must actuate the bosom of every American, prompts the contemplated measure.

It is not to principles of reasoning alone, however strong and imposing they are, that we may resort for the support of the course recommended. There is an example, sir, an illustrious one, one which I trust will ever be of high authority on this floor; it is the example of the House of Representatives of the session of 1793-4. Then, as now, harassed by a superior naval Power, and our produce alike intercepted by the hostile grasp of an European nation, a non-importation law was determined on by a great majority of the popular branch of the Government; the resolution of Mr. Clark was introduced and supported by names of the highest authority in this country. We find among them a Madison, a Dearborn, and others, some of whom I have now the honor to stand on this floor with, and to think, and, I trust, to act with, on this subject. Had the measure, at that day, been carried into effect, as was the wish of this branch of the Government, we should not now be obliged to detail the humiliating insults and injuries we have received. The adherence to that system of policy would have taught our enemies that we did not prize their gold more than our own independence—another course was, however, pursued which has never failed to produce vexation and loss upon the community.

Sir, in recurring to transactions of former times, would it not have been more profitable to us, as well as more laudable for the gentleman last up, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) to have searched for an example, somewhat applicable to the present great crisis, rather than industriously hunting up fanciful charges against the man who has so lately triumphed in the hearts of the people? I had hoped the occasion had now passed by, when a resort to such attempts would be thought necessary. Indeed, sir, it was little to be expected that any gentleman would, at a period even less ominous than the present, have made before this body another charge against a man, high in office, unless it was grounded on something better than a production ushered on the community under an anonymous authority, and the strongest suspicion of falsehood. The source of this production is supposed to be understood, and give me leave to ask of gentlemen who act upon it, as the ground of crimination, whether it is intended by the author that he should have another appeal to the people? Sir, the people have at this day decided. What is next to be done? And how many cruisers against reputation are we now to have fitted out in this House?

The gentleman has indulged himself by repeating to this House some of the predictions of a very great man who was a member of the Virginia Convention, which ratified the United States Constitution. Great, sir, as were the talents of the deceased patriot alluded to, his foresight had not enabled him to look forward to a crisis like the present. He has indeed expressed an opinion, that America would never have anything to fear from Europe; that as to dangers from that quarter, we might go to sleep, were the emphatic expressions of this most eloquent man. Had his capacious mind comprehended a state of things like the present, it is obvious, we should not have seen him so zealous in opposing the new system of Union. Had he been able to foretell that in twenty years from the time he urged this argument, against the increase of power in the federative Government, the state of Europe could be so completely changed, that a single monarch was to wield the empire of the Continent, while Great Britain was at the same time to command an entire and undisputed sovereignty over all the seas of the world—he would not willingly have afforded an argument to be used, when these evils are realized against America, in order to destroy the union of her councils, or impair the confidence in her rulers, much less indeed for the purposes of deterring, by the fear of pecuniary expenditure, this nation from submitting again to be taxed by Great Britain. If I have truly learned the character of that great man, he was among the first to resist the right of taxation from England. Could he have lived to behold this day, when his arguments are quoted for the purpose of paralyzing our resistance against her renewed attempts of taxation, by forcing our vessels into British ports, there to pay a tax on the products of our soil, how extreme would have been his anguish!

But, sir, to return to the subject of discussion. Considering the course recommended by the committee as it must be, and ought to be avowed to be, adopted for the direct purposes of coercion and serious action upon the interests of our commercial enemies, I would not determine to carry it into immediate and unconditional effect, if any hope still remained of amicable adjustment; but where can such a hope be supposed to exist? The two great belligerents, each propose a relaxation only in case their enemy should do so. Let us examine, then, what are the hopes of relaxation from either?

As to France, if the doctrine of the British Minister be correct, and England is vitally dependent on commerce, this is the very state of things most to be desired by France; the campaigns of 1805 and 1806, were not more fatal to the Governments of the coalition, than the maritime campaign Great Britain is now waging against commercial rights is fatal to herself, and must be ultimately triumphant to her enemy.

As to England, such has been her conduct, and so many impediments has she heaped in the way of adjustment, that although ruin and destruction should be yawning to receive her, it seems extravagant to hope for a voluntary restoration of our rights.

The considerations which forbid the hope of a change as to England, independent of her positive refusal, are numerous. In the first place, sir, it is proven by the conduct and declarations of her own Cabinet, that the evils we now suffer from her are the result of a system, long meditated and now matured, for the monopoly of the commerce of the world. We need no other proof of this than the incautious mode of reasoning adopted by Mr. Canning, in defence of the conduct of his Government, on the ground of French aggressions. In his letter to Mr. Pinkney of the 23d September, 1808, he tells us, that "the mitigated measure of retaliation announced by His Majesty in the Orders in Council of the seventh of January, and the further extension of that measure, (by the Orders in Council of November, which he calls an extension in operation, but not in principle, of the orders of 7th of January) are founded on the right of retaliation." If this be the case, sir, and those two orders are indeed of such kindred principle, I would ask of the British Minister, how the order of May, 1806, is to be applied? The order of blockade of the Continent from Brest to the Elbe, from the Bay of Biscay to the North Sea, of which our Minister resident at London was notified on the 16th of May, 1806, is in its terms and principles precisely similar to that of January 7th, 1807. It has in it these words, "and the said coasts, rivers, and ports, are, and must be considered as blockaded." An exception is then extended to neutral vessels, not laden with goods, the property of the enemies of Britain; subject however to the following provision: "Provided, the said ships and vessels so approaching and entering," (except as to the ports from Ostend to the river Seine, which are declared in a rigorous state of blockade,) "shall not have been laden at any port belonging to or in the possession of any of His Majesty's enemies, and that the said ships so sailing from the said rivers and ports (except as aforesaid) shall not be destined to any port belonging to, or in the possession of any of His Majesty's enemies." Here then, sir, we find the commencement of the principle now said to have been adopted, in retaliation of the Orders of France of the 21st November following. The proclamation of May, 1806, and the Orders of January, 1807, are the same in terms, both but parts of that system of monopoly which Great Britain has so obviously determined to enforce. Let us hear no more then, sir, of His Majesty's retaliation in his just defence. It is not pretended by Mr. Canning, or any one for him on this side the water, that France had commenced her present career of aggression by blockade, prior to May 1806. The truth is, sir, and it did not require a warning voice from the other side of the water to inform us of it, that Great Britain is determined to make, if she can, all nations tributary to her maritime greatness. From the time of the Revolution, this policy has been decided on by the British Cabinet, and it has accordingly made itself appear, whenever an apt occasion has called for it. Let us attend for a moment to the course she has pursued. The doctrines of Sheffield were about to be enforced upon us, and were indeed in actual operation, when the renovated union of the States, under the new Constitution, gave us sufficient strength, and enabled us to afford sufficient security to mercantile enterprise to counteract them, and to defeat the hopes of supplanting us, in our natural share of commerce. But soon an occasion offered, when America might, in the opinion of the British Cabinet, be again reduced to a colonial system of commerce; and in March, 1793, we find, from the collection of State papers of that date, that Great Britain had entered into a confederation with Russia, to prohibit the exports of neutral produce to France. This determination was followed up by the British orders of June and November, 1793. I do not wish, sir, by tracing so far back the system of aggression on the part of England, to go in pursuit of an inquiry, futile indeed at this day, as to the priority of aggression from France or England; but I mean, by noting at different periods the same appearance of hostility to the maritime rights of this country, to show that it has been the effect of system and design, and not of accident or justifiable necessity, as now contended.

DECEMBER, 1808.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

We have already seen how the system of aggression of 1793 was checked; in 1799 the same disposition we find renewed in the British Cabinet; and by authority emanating from the King, a principle is attempted to be enforced, which was to destroy the neutral rights of America. Several condemnations had taken place in her maritime courts, when on the representation of our Minister the attempt was again relinquished, and in April, 1801, the most formal recognition of our rights officially made.

Sir, it may be useful to pause, and compare those times with the present. In 1798 and 1799, differences as now existing between the French and American Governments, Great Britain is anxious to force us into the war, by distressing our commerce and sowing the seeds of discontent among our citizens. In 1801, when there was a most decisive expression of the public will in favor of the independent rights of this country, when an Administration was introduced into this Government which it was known would neither be driven or persuaded to compromise its interests, the hopes which were raised of success in the British Cabinet were again dissipated, and they hasten to renounce the principles they acted on. Let the history of that time be now a useful lesson to us; if hopes of a division and a strong British interest in this country have been falsely cherished, let them now be dissipated by the vast preponderancy which has not ceased to increase, and has so lately, on so warmly contested an occasion, been amply manifested to the world. In 1805, Britain resumed the maritime principles she had formerly abdicated in 1801. The cases of the Essex, the Enoch, and the Mars, were signals to their cruisers; as the correspondence laid on our tables last Spring informs us, our commerce was swept from the ocean in the little space of a few weeks. When the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) tells us of the effects of an embargo for twelve months, and goes on to estimate the cost, why has he forgotten that in one fortnight our commerce suffered more from the injuries of a foreign Power than, by a measure calculated to prevent a repetition of that injury, it could suffer from many years operation?

But, sir, we have reason to fear, that not even the renewed evidences of union which have lately been exhibited in this country, can now have the effect of averting the evils of this threatened maritime tyranny. And another cause to destroy our hopes of accommodation exists in what we hear of the necessities of England. Great indeed they must be, if the accounts of her own writers are correct, and more perhaps than the plunder of the world can satisfy. If instead of twenty millions of annual supply, as was required at the commencement of the war of 1793, she now requires an annual supply of about fifty millions to carry on her contest with the Continent, and if instead of a permanent debt requiring the payment of an annual interest of fourteen or sixteen millions of pounds sterling, her permanent debt is so magnified as to require an annual supply for the discharge of interest alone, of thirty-five or forty millions of pounds sterling, we may indeed conceive something of the necessities of that Kingdom, and find in other considerations, independent of a natural jealousy and hatred towards us, sufficient ground for her piratical exactions. If the commerce of all the nations of the world is to be made to pay tribute to her superior naval strength, and thus feed the monster that devours them; if America is indignantly to subscribe her quota of immense taxation to support entire the vast expense of this dominion claimed over all the waters of the earth, I confess it is possible the grand plan of universal monopoly may succeed, and the countless accumulation of the British national debt will form no obstacle to her grandeur, or the ease and happiness of her people. But this is a question which addresses itself to the honor, to the patriotism, and the virtue of every American. On this question, I believe, sir, there is no division among us; we all profess to emulate the genuine spirit of 1776.

I fear, indeed, there are other obstacles to fair and honorable adjustment with England, which will be difficult to overcome. Many are the items of injury which we have been baffled in all our attempts to obtain redress for.

The article of impressment stands in importance at the head of the list; it is a claim too degrading to freemen, too insulting to the sovereignty of this nation, ever to lose sight of. I hope for the honor of our country that we shall never yield the right of civility to a nation who attempts to enforce it on us; it was properly made the condition precedent to any treaty our agents at the British Court were authorized to form; nor, sir, should we be content with a supposed relaxation of the practice so long as the principle is claimed. We have, indeed, a noted evidence of relaxation in this practice in the famous note of November 8, 1806, so much relied on by our Ministers in London, but in which experience has shown no faith could be placed; for by a recurrence to the document with which we have been furnished very lately on the subject of impressments, we find that from the date of that note to the time when it was probable the rejection of the treaty was known in England, a number of our citizens, equal to any number in the like length of time in any former period, were subjected to impressment into the British service. Indeed, for my own part, sir, I never could construe that note to mean even an insinuation that the practice was to be desisted from, but rather a new avowal of the principles of it.

Another item in our accounts, which must have an honorable adjustment before a pacific understanding can ever return, is the outrage committed on our sovereignty by the attack on the Chesapeake. Whatever the apologists of England may say, no American will venture to pronounce, in the candor of his mind, that our claims to satisfaction have not been completely sustained on our part, and most shamefully and dishonorably evaded by England. Sir, it is no secret now, and dare say it has been avowed at St. James's, that the person sent here for the purpose of making satisfaction to this nation, was neither authorized or intended to heal the wound the feelings of America had sustained. Who is there, on this or the other side of the Atlantic, who has ever heard what were the specific propositions of redress intended to be made? There may be some who hear me, who know more of the secrets of foreign Governments than I do, who could tell us what that person came to this country for. From everything I have seen or heard, if I was asked to-day what he had come for, I know of no answer I dare give. Perhaps he came, sir, to learn us the art of bowing, to teach us kindly something of the etiquette of a European Court. He has, indeed, attended our national levee, and, after presenting himself to the presiding personage, turned upon the surrounding crowd, has taken this man by the elbow, to that he has whispered, and with a third may perhaps have transacted some little matter of business, and in due time, seeming to protest, with an honi soit qui mal y pense, has taken his leave.

There are other subjects of minor importance, for the settlement of which we have a right to look. Neither the fair principles of our commerce, as connected with the colonial trade, have been adjusted, or compensation for the losses we have sustained by depredations on our property on the seas, been made.

But, were these questions of claim settled, or did they not exist, we have, I fear, too satisfactory evidence of the determined hostility of the British King, to permit us to hope that we can longer avoid measures of a strong character and quality, such as I admit those under consideration to be. For this ground of support to the measures recommended, I refer, with indignation, to the proclamation of the British King issued some time in the last Spring. Sir, in my estimation, it is scarcely possible to conceive of an act of hostility more insulting, or of a character more obviously inimical than that instruction published in our gazettes, in which the British King has proclaimed immunity to the violators of our embargo laws. Has he not thus, in open, flagrant, and the most undistinguished terms, offered rewards for insurrection among the people of the United States, erected the standard of rebellion for them? Has he not appointed, as the rendezvous of American treason, the quarter-decks of his navy? And is it, sir, for George III, or his minions, to encourage in the people of the United States a disobedience of the laws they themselves have made? For him who once endeavored to command obedience to laws, in making which they had no participation? It might, indeed, have been expected that, before His Majesty had attempted this insidious act against our interior peace, he would have recollected his cause, or only ostensible cause, of the war of 1793, against France. France, he said, had attempted to alienate the obedience of his people, and stir up insurrection; if this was true, it would have been certainly a just and indispensable cause of war. Where a man is attacked by conspiracies and combinations, carried on with his own domestics, it is time to defend himself; and, sir, if ever there was a time, in my opinion, when a call of this body would have justified an order to repel insult and injury, it was when our Government was informed of this insidious attempt upon our internal peace and safety.

The conduct of the Court party in Great Britain, however evincive of hatred to us, is what we have no right to complain of. Let them stimulate their own nation by what false means their Ministry may think fit, either in or out of Parliament, to a spirit of hostility against us; they have a right to do so; and it is for us to watch the working of that sort of machinery, and be prepared to meet its stroke. Of hostilities, so strongly indicated in that way, I therefore say nothing, except that, as a new evidence of a determined spirit of war, they ought to warn us of our situation.

Among the last, and surely not the least of the indignities offered to the Government and people of this country, Mr. Canning's letter to Mr. Pinkney, of the 23d of September, is certainly to be ranked. It could not, indeed, have been expected, sir, in candor, after the earnest and honorable endeavors of our Government to reconcile our disputes with England, that we should be told, by an official character of that kingdom, that we had entered into the universal combination against His Majesty. That this echo of a miserable party, I do not mean that party composed of a respectable body of American politicians, (of them I will not doubt the integrity, nor can their patriotism be questioned:) but, sir, I speak of a party—an unprincipled foreign faction—which had fixed a mercenary interest among us. It is the spirit of this poor, contemptible, and already dreadfully appalled set of miserable miscreants, on whom the patriotism of the country is frowning indignantly at this moment, of which I speak, when I say a British Minister has dared to return the echo of French influence upon our Government itself; and has told us, in a tone of insolent exultation over what he falsely supposed a state of division among us, that there was a universal combination against His Majesty, and that our embargo did come in aid of France, when, if her measures could have succeeded at all, this interposition of the American Government would have most effectually contributed to its success.

I have thus, sir, in the most concise manner I was able, without taking the wide range the subject would have justified, endeavored to show the little probability that exists, without resorting to the strong measures contained in the resolutions before us, ever to effect an adjustment of our differences. The interest of France, perhaps her disposition—the disposition of the King of England, and a false calculation of his interests—the systems in which both these Governments seem to be unchangeably fixed, require the measures proposed. I believe those measures to be ten times better calculated, for all the purposes of any annoyance we are capable of, than war would be, if formally declared, and at the same time, however inconvenient to ourselves, less so than war.

DECEMBER, 1808.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

I therefore am willing to consider the second resolution as proper to be adopted in its broadest terms, and as intended for a retaliation of injury, we ought to adopt a part of the measures of reprisal.

At the same time, sir, let it be understood, by the modification which a select committee may make on the subject of importation, what is to be the permanent, as well as the temporary plan. Let it be understood to what articles prohibitions or prohibitory duties are, as an ultimate regulation, to extend. Nor, sir, would I hesitate to discourage the immense importations in times of pacific intercourse which have, and ever will, so long as they remain unrestricted, drain our country of its real riches, and make an unprofitable barter of our valuable exports, for the luxuries which enervate, while they impoverish us by throwing an immense balance of trade against America.

These, sir, are the ideas which appeared to me to be applicable to this subject. When we come to consider the question of the embargo alone, it will then be in time to make the inquiry, whether the barren kingdom of Sweden, which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had said, was open to our commerce, would form a sufficient vent for our vast products, to authorize a hope of benefit to us, from permitting our vessels to go there. I believe, however, it will be found, that so small is the consumption of the produce of our agriculturists, hunters, or fishermen, that a single warehouse of an American exporter would be more than sufficient to glut her; and as to the idea of the gentleman, that through Sweden we can get to the Continent with our freights, I ask if he has not heard that the navy of Great Britain infests the seas of the north as well as the south of Europe; that her ships cover the Baltic, and surround the coast of Sweden and Denmark? Will England allow us to go to the Continent, and thus directly and effectually evade her blockade? No, sir; nor is there a hole or corner of the waters of the earth, through which we can now creep to a competent market. Sir, whatever may be the views of aggrandizement which merchants might have on this subject, they would find themselves mistaken. They may, indeed, in the vast labyrinth of orders, decrees, and regulations, perceive some crooked course to steal along with a disgraceful smuggled trade, but I can, with confidence, tell the gentleman from New York (Mr. MUMFORD) that, if once we open our ports by a general regulation, while the orders of France and England continue, this commerce will no longer enjoy immunity from the permission even of a foreign nation; when our property shall again be fully exposed upon the sea, a general grasp will be made at it; is not the enemy now hovering round you, the hungry birds of prey? Let, then, the gentleman send again his vessels to sea, and he will find only an addition to his great and heavy losses, already stated to be sustained, by the tyranny of France and England. The scene will again shift when our property is put afloat to so great an amount as it would be, and capture and condemnation would succeed to fraud and connivance. Sir, it is time to think more of resistance, and less of refinements in the acts of submission. I hope we shall have the question, and that I shall have the pardon of the House for having contributed to-day to delay it. The House adjourned, without taking a question, at 3 o'clock.

TUESDAY, December 6.

Ordered, That the Message from the President of the United States, communicating a report from the Surveyor of the Public Buildings in the City of Washington, which was read and ordered to lie on the table on the second instant, be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH presented a petition of Edward Livingston, of the Territory of Orleans, stating his claim to the lots or parcels of land called the "Batture," in the vicinity of the city of New Orleans and praying that the title in fee simple to the said lots or parcels of land, may be confirmed to the petitioner, or such other relief afforded in the premises as to the wisdom and justice of Congress shall seem meet.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL presented petitions from sundry citizens of the Territory of Orleans, in opposition to the prayer of the foregoing petition, and suggesting that the right to the said lots or parcels of land hath not been relinquished by the former Sovereigns of the country, but is now vested by the act of cession in the Government of the United States, and that it would contribute to the benefit of the petitioners and others, to preserve the Batture as a common, open and unbuilt upon by any person or persons claiming the same.

The said petitions were read, and severally referred to the Attorney General, with instructions to examine the same; and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The report of the Committee on Foreign Relations being again before the House, and the question still on the first resolution—

Mr. GHOLSON said: Mr. Speaker, were I to yield to my embarrassment on the present occasion, I should not trespass on your indulgence. But when I reflect upon the great national importance of the question now before the House, and upon the high responsibility which its decision must attach to me as one of the Representatives of the people; I am impelled, from considerations of duty, to assign to you the reasons by which I am influenced.

It has been said, sir, with great truth, that the present is an extraordinary crisis. It seems indeed to have been reserved for the age in which we live, to witness a combination of political events unparalleled in the annals of time. Almost the whole civilized world has been within a few years convulsed by wars, battles, and conquests. Kingdoms and empires have been revolutionized; and we behold a vast continent assuming a new aspect under a new dynasty. Those laws which from time immemorial have prescribed and limited the conduct of nations, are now contemptuously prostrated, innocent neutrality is banished from the ocean, and we hear a grim tyrant asserting himself the sovereign of the seas. Thus the most essential part of the globe is attempted to be partitioned between two domineering rival belligerents. Sir, it would have been a subject of the sincerest felicitation if our happy country could have been exempt from this universal concussion. But we are fated to share evils in the production of which we have had no participation. In inquiring, Mr. Speaker, into the causes of these evils and the policy by which we are to be extricated from them, I am conscious of two things—of my utter incompetency to the elucidation of so great, a subject, and of the unavoidable necessity of touching upon ground already occupied by gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate.

When, sir, I recur to the resolutions reported by the Committee of Exterior Relations, I find one which proposes resistance to the edicts of Great Britain and France; and another which recommends a system of non-intercourse between the United States and those countries.

In hearing the first resolution treated as an abstract proposition, my astonishment has been not a little excited. I have always understood an abstract proposition to be the assertion of some general principle without any specific application. Here is a distinct position with a direct reference to particular orders and decrees. The resolution therefore is itself specific and appropriate, to use the apt terms of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA.) But before we can determine upon the propriety or impropriety of the resolutions, to me it appears indispensable that we should examine attentively and minutely, not only the situation of this country in relation to France and Britain, but also the injuries and aggressions they have committed upon our neutral rights.

In doing this I regret extremely that I shall wound the delicate taste and exquisite sensibility of my learned colleague (Mr. RANDOLPH) who addressed you yesterday. I shall take no pleasure in the retrospection which seems so much to disgust that gentleman; but I do not know how else to find justification for the measures we, I trust, shall pursue, and to expose the profligacy of our enemies. The regular discussion of the first resolution would seem naturally to lead us to a review of the edicts of Great Britain and France. When we say, we will not submit to their edicts, it cannot be amiss, although I acknowledge, sir, the undertaking is an unpleasant one, to inquire into the nature and extent of those edicts. I therefore will endeavor, within as narrow limits as possible, to exhibit to the view of the indignant American, the various wanton aggressions which have been committed by both these Powers upon his commercial rights. And, sir, whenever we look for the chief source of our difficulties, we must turn towards Great Britain. Then let us examine the principal items in her account.

On 8th June, 1793, the British Government issued an Order of Council to stop and detain for condemnation, vessels laden with corn, flour, or meal, and bound to France, whose people were then almost in the act of starving, and of course we were deprived of an excellent market for those articles.

On 6th November, 1793, an order issued to stop and detain ships laden with the produce of, or carrying provisions to, the colonies of France.

On 21st March, 1799, she issued a proclamation declaring the United Provinces in a state of blockade, and thereby excluding neutral commerce without any actual investment.

On 16th May, 1806, a proclamation declaring the blockade of the coast from the Elbe to Brest, inclusive.

On 7th January, 1807, an order prohibiting neutral vessels from trading from one port to another of the enemy or his allies.

On 11th May, 1807, a proclamation declaring the blockade of the coast between the Elbe, Weser, and Ems.

On 11th May, 1807, a proclamation declaring the blockade of the Dardanelles and Smyrna.

In October, 1807, a proclamation, ordering British officers to impress from American vessels all such of their crews as might be taken or mistaken for British subjects.

On 11th November, 1807, Orders in Council were issued interdicting all neutral commerce to any port of Europe from which the British flag was excluded; directing that neutrals should trade to such ports only, under British license and with British clearances—that all ships destined before the issuing of the orders to any of the said ports, should go into a British port, and that all vessels having "certificates of origin" should be lawful prize.

On 11th November, 1807, an Order in Council was issued, declaring void the legal transfer of vessels from the enemies of Britain, to neutrals or others.

In 1808, various acts of Parliament have been passed, carrying the orders of the 11th of November, 1807, into execution. They impose a specific tax on a variety of articles of American merchandise allowed to be re-exported to the continent of Europe, for example, on tobacco, 12s. 6d. sterling per cwt.; on indigo, 2s. per lb.; pork, 17s. 6d. per cwt.; cotton, 9d. per lb.; and on all other articles not enumerated in the act, a duty of forty per cent. is exacted on re-exportation.

On 8th January, 1808, a proclamation issued declaring the blockade of Carthage, Cadiz, and St. Lucar, and all the ports between the first and last of these places.

In the Autumn of 1808, in order that plunder might commence from the very moment of the expected repeal of the embargo, the French West India islands were declared in a state of blockade.

I will forbear, sir, at this time from commenting on the habitual impressment of American citizens, by Great Britain; the illegal condemnation of American vessels under what they call the rule of 1756; the spurious blockades of British commanders, and the consequent spoiliations on our commerce. Nor will I detain the House by relating the story of Captain Bradley, commander of the Cambrian, who in the face of the city of New York, and in contempt of the civil authority of the United States, dragged your citizens into slavish captivity. The case too of the British ship Leander may remain untold—the enormity of that transaction is written in indelible characters, with the blood of our countrymen. The invitation of the British Ministry to your merchants to violate the embargo, and the burning of a friendly ship of war (the Impetueux) in your own waters, are circumstances too light to be noticed. I feel no disposition, either, to portray the affair of the Chesapeake. The ghost of the murdered are yet unavenged for that horrid and perfidious deed!

DECEMBER, 1808.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

I will now advert, sir, to the principal injuries committed by France on the neutral commerce of the United States. They consist in the execution of three decrees, to wit:

The Berlin decree of the 21st November, 1806, declaring the British islands in a state of blockade, and that no vessel having been at or coming directly from England or her colonies, shall enter at a French port.

The Milan decree of the 17th December, 1807, declaring lawful prize every vessel that has suffered the visit of an English vessel, submitted to an English voyage, or paid duty to the English Government; and also, every vessel coming from the ports of England and her colonies.

The Bayonne decree of April, 1808, which subjects, as it is said, and I believe not doubted, all American vessels found upon the high seas since the embargo, to capture and confiscation.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I will end the black catalogue of iniquitous outrages and restrictions upon neutral commerce—restrictions which are acknowledged to depend for their support upon no other ground than that of retaliation. Whilst I protest against the principle of retaliating upon an enemy through the medium of a friend, yet these orders and decrees have no claim even to that principle. Because France and Britain both agree that the right of retaliation does not accrue before the neutral has acquiesced in the aggressions of the enemy. We have never acquiesced in the aggressions of either, and therefore, upon their own reasoning, ought not to be liable to the operation of the principle for which they unjustly contend. But, sir, can we quit this subject without looking more particularly at the consequences which result from this series of injuries?

In reviewing the conduct of Great Britain towards this country, we perceive a continuation of encroachments, designed only for the utter destruction of our commerce. This disposition is manifest in every order and proclamation she has issued since the year 1793. If this were not her object, why such a continued system of illegitimate blockades? Why so many vexatious restrictions upon neutral trade, tending to destroy competition on our part in the continental markets? I might trace the scheme a little further back and ask, whence the outrages? the orders of June and November, 1793, which produced Jay's treaty? A treaty which I am sorry to say, did not guarantee to us mutual and reciprocal rights, and which was no sooner ratified than violated by British perfidy. But, sir, I will not speak of trivial matters like these; they are of no consequence when we reflect upon other topics. The pretended blockade of almost every port upon the Baltic; the blockade of the eastern and southern coasts of the North Sea, unaccompanied by any naval force; the nominal investment of the ports on the south of the British channel, and on the European coast of the Mediterranean sea; the occlusion of the Black Sea, by the blockade of the Dardanelles and Smyrna, and in fine the blockade of all the places from the Straits of Gibraltar to the Arctic Ocean, are acts which, notwithstanding their unexampled enormity in themselves, sink into perfect insignificance, when we consider the base attempts meditated by the orders of November, 1807, and the consequent statutes of Parliament, to reduce this country again to a state of colonial slavery! Sir, at the very thought of these infamous orders and acts of the British Government, I feel emotions of indignation and contempt, to repress which would be dishonorable. What, sir? American vessels to be arrested in a lawful commerce, upon "the highway of nations;" to be forcibly carried into British ports and there either condemned, or else compelled before they can prosecute their voyage to take British clearances and pay a British tax! And if the owner of the cargo shall be unable to pay the amount of tax, he has the consolation left him of seeing his property burnt! Sooner would I see every vessel and every atom of our surplus produce make one general conflagration in our own country. For what purpose was the Revolution, in which the blood and treasure of our ancestors were the price of independence, if we are now to be taxed by Britain? The highest authority in the Union cannot constitutionally tax the exports, which are in part the products of the labor of the American people; yet the British Government has presumptuously undertaken to do it. I, sir, for one must protest against anything like submission to this conduct. But let us see what we should get by submission. So far from gaining, it will be easy to demonstrate, that if we were to submit, we should be only remunerated with disgrace and ruin.

I will take the ground of the gentlemen in the opposition. The embargo shall be repealed and our trade renewed, subject to the existing orders and decrees of Great Britain and France. What will be the consequences? We are told that we need not trade to France and Britain, and thereby involve ourselves in a disgraceful acquiescence in their edicts; and it seems admitted that on account of the ascendancy of the British navy, we cannot visit the ports of that part of Europe which is under the dominion of Napoleon. But, say gentlemen, we may trade to Sweden, and our produce will find its way to the rest of the Continent. This doctrine is chimerical in the extreme. What amount have you heretofore annually exported to Sweden? To the value only of about $50,000; and the truth is, that there is very little market in that country for American articles. Can it, therefore, be seriously believed that there is to be such an instantaneous translation of capital to Sweden, and that she is suddenly to become so commercial as to afford an entrepot for the whole of our commerce? Will Stockholm and Gottenburg furnish you a market for more than one hundred millions of merchandise? The idea is entirely delusive. Admitting, however, we were to carry on a commerce of this sort, I will ask if it would not be complete submission so Great Britain? Would it not be confining ourselves to the humble, pitiful course she has been pleased to chalk out for us? It certainly would. No, sir, if we trade at all (unless we were to trade in armed ships, the propriety whereof it is not my present purpose to examine) we must go through British ports, and subject to the orders and acts of Britain. Her navy is sufficient either to capture vessels going to the Continent contrary to the Orders of Council, or otherwise to compel such vessels to pass through her ports. Then it seems clear, if the embargo were at this time removed, we should be compelled to trade with or through Great Britain, or else our vessels and property would be subject to confiscation. I will, therefore, proceed to count the effects of such an intercourse.

In the first place, that a commerce of this sort would be a complete abandonment of every principle of national honor, cannot be denied; unless it be contended that to obey the mandates of, and pay tribute to, another Government would not be dishonorable. But we will for a while dispense with the question of national disgrace, and calculate the profit and loss. In this estimate it will be easy to prove, that by a commerce subject to the Orders of Council, and such as is contemplated by some gentlemen, we should annually pay an actual and unconstitutional tax into the British treasury, of more than twice the amount of our own revenue. Upon the articles of cotton and tobacco only, we should be compelled to pay a tax of upwards of seven millions of dollars, according to the rates imposed by the late acts of Parliament. We export annually, 62,000,000 lbs. of cotton, all of which would go to or through Britain for a market, because our cotton is not wanted at any of the uninterdicted places. It appears from documents published in Great Britain (and the correctness of which, I believe, cannot be questioned) that she does not consume more than one half of our cotton. She is stated to have manufactured, per annum, before the orders of November, American cotton to the value of about 3,900,000*l.* sterling, which sum would purchase at the English prices, but one half of our exports of that article. Hence, the residue of 32,000,000 lbs., in passing through England to some other market, would be subject to the tax levied by Parliament of 9*d.* sterling, per pound. This duty on 32,000,000 lbs. will amount to $5,333,333 33 cents.

We export 85,000 hogsheads of tobacco. Admit, what is a large allowance, that 10,000 hogsheads would be sent to Sweden and other uninterdicted ports, and that 13,000 hogsheads, one-fifth of the remaining 75,000, will be consumed in Britain; then we should by the Orders of the Council, and acts of Parliament, pay a tax at the rate of 12*s.* 6*d.* sterling per cwt. on 60,000 hogsheads which would pass through England to a market. This tax, admitting each hogshead to weigh only 1,200 lbs., would amount to $2,000,000, which added to the cotton tax, will give you the sum of $7,333,333 33.

Upon recurring to the act of Parliament carrying into effect the orders of November, it will be found that all such articles as are specified in the act and subjected to particular stated taxation per lb., cwt., bbl., &c., pay about forty per cent. on their value. This position is confirmed by the fact that on all articles not enumerated, forty per cent. is the duty imposed. Now let us see what this duty of forty per cent. will produce on the remainder of our exports, tobacco and cotton being excepted.

From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1807, it seems that the total amount of our exports for that year was $108,343,150. From this amount I will deduct the exports to Great Britain, the exports to places not interdicted by the Orders in Council, and the value of the cotton and tobacco, the tax on which is already calculated, and then the balance will be the sum on which the transit duty of forty per cent. will be paid.

Total amount of exports	-	-	$108,343,150

Thus, Mr. Speaker, it most manifestly appears that in the prosecution of a trade subject to the existing restrictions we should be compelled to pay a tax of upwards of $30,000,000 per annum to England, for the exercise of our natural and unequivocal right to navigate the ocean. But can any one believe that a commerce oppressed in this manner would be profitable. What is the opinion of the most eminent and respectable merchants in both Britain and America on this point? They tell you that after the cargo has paid import duty, a tax for clearance, export duty, the expenses of separate shipments, first to England, and then to the place of consumption, together with all the charges attending such circuitry, the exporter will be found in debt, and that such a trade will not pay costs. No, sir, if you resume your trade upon these conditions you will barter national honor for inevitable bankruptcy and ruin.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, I have succeeded in showing that a commerce of this sort would involve in it the basest submission, mercantile ruin, and the payment of millions of tribute. I will now proceed to inquire what effects a system of non-intercourse with the two great belligerents would produce on them and on ourselves.

As to France, since the embargo, has already cut off communication from this country to that, and inasmuch as the superiority of the British navy prohibits adventures from France to America, it is true a non-intercourse-law in its operation will be but little more than nominal so far as it respects France. But as France has injured us, although I acknowledge her aggressions bear no parallelism with those of England, yet I am in favor of expressing, either by a suspension of intercourse or in any other way, the resentment of the nation for such aggressions; and when the injuries of France shall equal the injuries of Britain, I will go the same length for redress against the one as against the other.

But, sir, a non-intercourse measure will be attended with very different consequences, in relation to Great Britain. If such a measure were rigorously executed in this country, what effects would it produce in the first place upon the British manufactures? Five-eighths of the cotton manufactured in Britain, both for home consumption and for exportation, are carried from America. This important fact is proved by the import and export statements published in that country. How then is Britain to be supplied with that necessary article, without which her cotton manufactures must cease? The remaining three-eighths of cotton which she gets from other countries will not, I presume, more than clothe her own people, and of course there will be nothing left for exportation. It is idle to talk of supplies from Africa and South America, where there is scarcely any cotton raised.

From whence is Great Britain supplied with the essential articles of grain and meal, pot and pearl ashes, pitch, tar, turpentine, flax and linseed, and wool? More than two-thirds of the total amount of these articles consumed by her, she receives from the United States.

The loss of revenue, sir, which England must experience by non-intercourse with this country will be enormous, and would be felt by her at this time with peculiar severity. She would also dislike to see London no more the banking place for American merchants, and would feel the loss of a balance of trade in her favor, of upwards of five millions sterling annually; and which is so much boasted of by her merchants upon the exchange. But, Mr. Speaker, the greatest injury to which Britain will be subjected is that which will result from the non-importation part of the system, from the entire exclusion of all her surplus manufactures from the American market. She is at this time almost shut out from the continent of Europe; and if her dealings with her customers in this country are cut off, what sale will she be able to make of her merchandise? Such a state of things, sir, must inevitably tend to the universal impoverishment of Great Britain, and may bring her perhaps to a sense of justice.

The evils and privations which we ourselves shall experience from a system of non-intercourse are, I acknowledge, much to be regretted, but from the nature of the times they are unavoidable. That there is now and will be a diminution of circulating medium, I am ready to admit. That the sources of the revenue will likewise be in a great measure dried up is equally true. But, sir, I contend that these inconveniences are alike inevitable whether we have embargo or not. Would war have bettered our situation in these respects? Would such a trade as has been mentioned by gentlemen, or a trade trammelled by the existing belligerent restrictions, fill your public coffers and enrich your citizens? It has been shown clearly it would only reward you with dishonor.

But, Mr. Speaker, if we have privations to encounter, we have already received incalculable benefits from the embargo, and shall, I have no doubt, derive many advantages in a political point of view from a suspension of imports. The embargo has saved from seizure and confiscation more than one hundred millions of American property, and has rescued from foreign imprisonment thousands of American citizens. Non-intercourse will still protect our property and citizens until we can acquire other means of protection. It will render the country more independent by encouraging internal manufactures. We have ample means of support at home, and should therefore avoid an habitual dependence on others for many of the comforts of life. Non-intercourse will moreover promote frugality and economy by banishing foreign superfluities—and here Mr. Speaker, I will notice one circumstance, which is entitled to great weight. We export necessities to Great Britain, we get in return, from that country, but little else than luxuries.

But, sir, if we should be compelled by the injustice of our adversaries to persevere for any time in this policy; our fellow-citizens of the East, who have been accustomed to employment at sea, may become manufacturers for their agricultural brethren of the South, and in return may procure such necessary supplies as they may wish. Thus that traffic which has been carried on between New and Old England may be converted into a new channel of beneficial commerce between the Eastern and Southern States. Our own manufactures will by these means soon fill our storehouses, give activity to capital, and restore the circulation of money. The grower of cotton too will be benefited by finding a market for that article.

By prohibiting, sir, the importation of all foreign liquors, the corn and wheat farmer might also be greatly relieved, notwithstanding the embargo. We import annually $16,096,613 worth of liquors, to make which, or their substitutes, would require the distillation of five millions of bushels of grain ; we only export about seven millions of bushels, so that we should find at home by a disuse of foreign spirits, a market for five-sevenths of our surplus grain.

It is asked, Mr. Speaker, whether the embargo is to be perpetual ? and the General Government is charged with the design of annihilating commerce. I wish, sir, to give to the embargo, or rather to a non-intercourse policy, which I should have preferred in the first instance to an embargo, a fair experiment ; and if, after the rigid enforcement of its provisions, for a reasonable time, it be found ineffectual, then the magnanimity of Congress will require that some other expedient be adopted in its stead. So far from a perpetual embargo, which I believe is not thought of by any one, I would resume the commerce of the country the very moment it can be done with safety or credit to ourselves, or as soon as we can acquire strength to protect our rights upon the ocean. But I am opposed to having any course of conduct dictated by the avarice and cupidity of merchants ; but for whose shameful violations of the embargo that measure would, in all probability before this, have produced the end for which it was intended. If there are merchants who suffer more than the rest of the community, I am sorry for it. There is, however, one consolation left them ; they can, while prevented by the exigencies of the country from pursuing their ordinary profession, betake themselves to the loom or plough—occupations as respectable as they do now, or can follow. And, sir, if many of those powder-headed gentry who infest your towns, and sap their very existence out of the honest planter, were under the necessity of resorting to some laborious avocation for a livelihood, society would sustain no injury from it.

To the charge that Congress or the Government meditate the destruction of commerce, I answer that such an accusation is totally unfounded, and therefore I positively deny it—I deny it, because it is contradicted by the whole course and tenor of Congressional and Executive proceedings. Congress have uniformly devoted more attention and given more encouragement to commerce alone than to every other object of national jurisdiction collectively.

It has been said that the Eastern States only suffer by the embargo ; and the tonnage of Massachusetts has been compared to that of Virginia as five to one. When we look at the estimates of domestic exports, we find that the principal amount is composed of articles the exclusive production of the Southern States. The proper and actual exports of all New England do not equal those of Virginia alone. I wish to make no comparisons ; they have not been introduced by me. If, notwithstanding, we are driven into acts of this sort, the Eastern people, in a commercial point of view, are principally the carriers for the Southern ; and the present suspension is only a suspension of their carrying trade. But, sir, we are all one political family, and no matter what part enjoys most the benefits of commerce. I am willing to go any length, within the resources of the nation, for its maintenance and protection. If embargo and non-intercourse shall be found inefficient restraints on our adversaries, to insure us justice, I will unite in making the last appeal of nations.

Permit me, now, Mr. Speaker, to occupy a few moments of your attention in noticing some of the arguments advanced by my colleague, (Mr. RANDOLPH)—a gentleman of whose talents and patriotism I have long entertained the most exalted opinion, but with whom it is my lot to differ. That gentleman has asked, for what purposes was the General Government created ? He has told us that commercial regulations were the objects of its organization. The authors of the Constitution inform us that that instrument was ordained “in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.” The regulation of commerce is not stated as a specific object of the compact of the States ; and, although it is very justly enumerated amongst the powers of Congress, and is certainly highly entitled to their consideration, yet there are other duties enjoined on Congress which are paramount even to the protection of commerce.

The gentleman has discovered great solicitude about State rights, and affirms that the man who is likely to wield the destinies of the United States has long thought the State sovereignties ought not to exist. He asks, also, if it is not now proposed to extend the powers of the General Government, at the expense of the State governments ?

What connexion can exist between this latter question and the subject now before us, I am unable to perceive. I shall have no objection to meet the question, when that part of the President's Message to which the gentleman alludes shall come fairly before the House. Were I, however, to express an opinion, it would be, that, instead of attempting to excite distrust and apprehensions respecting the present Executive, sentiments of gratitude should be inculcated for the innumerable political blessings which the people of these States have experienced at the hands of the best Administration which the world has ever seen.

In regard, sir, to the charge against “the man who is about to wield the destinies of the Union,” I will only remark, that I felt not a little astonishment at hearing my worthy colleague make a newspaper publication, evidently intended for electioneering purposes, the basis of so serious an accusation before this body. The very circumstances under which the publication of Judge Yates' notes has been made, prove that it deserves no sort of credit. Would it not have been more patriotic and honorable to have exhibited the charges contained in that publication at a time which would have afforded an opportunity for their investigation before the decision of the Presidential election ? If it were necessary, upon this charge, I would refer to the archives of Virginia, for the year 1799, where would be found the most signal testimony in behalf of the illustrious person to whom allusion has been made. But his character is fortified by too many distinguished deeds of patriotism to suffer by such an assault.

Mr. Speaker, there is one part of the gentleman's argument which I know not how he can justify. It is that in which he accuses the Americans with cowardice, asserting that we "will show our heels to the enemy."

[Here Mr. RANDOLPH explained, and observed that he had not made use of the words in that sense; that he had intended to use them only hypothetically, and did not insinuate that the Americans were deficient in bravery.]

Mr. GHOLSON proceeded. I am happy at the explanation of my colleague. It is very far from my intention to misrepresent him. My inference was from the words as I had noted them. I however will add, that the Americans will be ever ready to repair with enthusiasm to the standard of their country, when its liberty shall be assailed.

The gentleman reminds us that we have engagements to fulfil; that you cannot dispense with your revenue; and that Sweden is still free to your ships. I hold the public engagements to be sacred, but, if the imposts are not to be dispensed with, I should be glad if that enlightened gentleman would show how the income resulting from them can be continued. Would war, sir, have supplied you with funds, or would the Exchequer find resources in a trade with Sweden? I repeat, again, that the idea of Sweden's furnishing a market for our produce is perfectly visionary. A poor, barren, frigid climate; more the resort of wolves and birds of prey, than of commerce!

The same honorable gentleman has said that property has fallen to nothing, and that the present system will end in the demoralization of the people. I affirm, sir, that if the embargo had not been laid, the prices of produce (which always regulate the value of property) would not have been better than they are now. Our produce in our warehouses is worth something, but, devoted to seizure and confiscation, would be worth nothing, except to our adversaries. Were prices better during our differences with England in 1793, and with France in 1799, than at present? At the former period, tobacco was not higher than two dollars and fifty-three cents; and at the latter, I believe, not more than four dollars per hundred weight. As to the demoralizing tendencies of the embargo, I must be permitted to observe, that, if the habits of frugality and economy which it has produced; if the banishment of luxuries, and consequently in some degree of vice from the nation, will demoralize the people; then that deplorable effect may justly be attributed to the present system.

I have now, Mr. Speaker, concluded the remarks which I intended to make. I am very sensible that I may have taken an incorrect view of this all-important subject. I know, even those who are infinitely my superiors in political science do frequently err. We may say, humanum est errare. When I shall be convinced that I am in error, I shall have no hesitation in acknowledging it, and in contributing my feeble support to another and better system. My deepest solicitude is to pursue that course which shall redound most to the honor and welfare of my country.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said it might have been expected that he should before this time have risen to notice some of the objections made to this resolution and the report of the committee on foreign relations, in order to rescue them from the unqualified and general, though in some instances, very weak and inconsistent censures attempted to be thrown upon them. He had hitherto waited patiently to hear some of those gentlemen who oppose the report state some specific ground of objection, either to the principles assumed in it, to the facts therein stated, to the reasoning upon those principles and facts, or to the conclusions drawn from them. He had expected when gentlemen so very liberally censured the report, that they would at least fix on some definite objections as the foundations of those censures; that were capable of being comprehended, of becoming the subject of investigation, and receiving some specific answer. He had, however, waited in vain. We have heard some general objections taken, but gentlemen have not attempted to deny a single principle assumed in the report; nor to show the incorrectness of a single statement of facts made in it; nor have they yet ventured to deny any part of the reasoning, or to dispute the correctness of the conclusions deduced therefrom. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) who bestows his censures so very liberally, and in terms so very elegant and peculiar to himself, has not pointed to a single part of the report to which he objected in particular. His censures were general and indefinite, and, it might be added, most of them inconsistent and incomprehensible. Some of his objections will be noticed, so far as they relate to the subject under discussion; others of them are of a character not to be noticed for the purpose of investigation. They ought not to stain the page of debate; if noticed at all, it will be only for the purpose of showing that they are totally inapplicable to the subject, and that the public may see the wretched shifts to which gentlemen are put to support their opposition.

Sir, after the House has been nearly two weeks engaged in a discussion in which gentlemen have indulged themselves in such a range that the subject which produced it is almost entirely lost sight of, it is high time to bring our minds back to the real question, which we are about to decide. The debate seems, indeed, to have had no bounds assigned to it; every subject of domestic as well as foreign affairs has been embraced by it. This desultory kind of declamatory discussion, censuring every measure, either adopted or proposed, without offering any substitute, can only be designed for the popular ear, to amuse the public mind, and divert it from perceiving the real course which gentlemen are pursuing, and to cover the abject submission to which that course would lead. The public must see that those gentlemen in the opposition can have no other object in view in exaggerating the distresses of this country under the embargo, in calling it submission, in painting in the highest colors the unavenged wrongs of this country, without proposing any measure of redress, but to turn away the public attention from the real causes of our present difficulties, and prevent the people from perceiving the gulf of disgrace into which the course pursued by those very gentlemen would plunge the nation. These gentlemen must be sensible, that to do nothing but remove the embargo, would be submission of the most humble kind; and, in order to conceal the deformity of such a proposition, they seem desirous to anticipate the public sentiment, and make an impression abroad that the measures pursued by your Government, which were charged, last session, as likely to produce war, are now submission, mere submission, and nothing else. They tell the people, "Your rights are sacrificed by those whom you have intrusted to manage your affairs; everything is going wrong; turn them out and put us (the minority) in power, and we will heal all your wounds; we will set all things right." What other object than this can be ascribed to those speeches we have heard. I have, sir, been unintentionally hurried into these remarks, which have carried me, in some degree, away from the course I meant to pursue. I will return to the subject immediately before you. I cannot, however, avoid first expressing my astonishment at the line of conduct pursued by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) He favored us with two eloquent speeches of some length, partaking in a great degree of a war spirit, and breathing great indignation at foreign aggressions, and censuring temporizing, submissive conduct at home. Much of these speeches amused us, and some parts of them I was really happy to hear, as I was thereby induced to believe, that he was about to assume, with us, a higher ground than that we had hitherto occupied; but when I heard the gentleman descend from the climax to which he had arisen, of avenging his country's wrongs, as it would seem, to the very bathos of doing nothing, worse than nothing, of taking off the embargo, and trading with Great Britain, thereby submitting to her orders, I was, sir, astonished; my very blood chilled in my veins, and so must that of every American who heard him—[Mr. RANDOLPH said that was not his ground.] I will state, said Mr. C., what the gentleman said, and what I considered his ground: If I misunderstood him, I am willing to be corrected. He said, "Will you go to war? will you increase the taxes? No," the gentleman answers—"I will not increase the taxes, I am for opening your trade with both those Powers"—meaning as I understood him, Great Britain and France. If I am not correct in this statement of what he said, I am always willing to have any explanation which any gentleman wishes to make as to facts. [Mr. RANDOLPH.—Does it become me to correct that gentleman? Does it become me after the very candid ascription of motive which he has made, which was as foreign from myself as others, that I should explain what I did say?] Mr. CAMPBELL said, he had given the floor in order to permit the gentleman to state or explain what he had said, not to argue the point. [Mr. RANDOLPH.—The gentleman has abdicated the floor; sir, he has surrendered it to me, and, under the correction of the Chair, I will keep it. I deny that the ground which I am charged with having taken is my ground. It has been put under me by another. It is not improbable, sir, under the circumstances under which I addressed you yesterday, that I may not have at all times, in every sentence, in every minute particular, expressed myself with great precision. But certainly this House, and every one who heard me, must know, that I did not take the ground of submission to the two belligerents, or of trading with them on their own terms.]

Mr. CAMPBELL.—We are now precisely where we were before the gentleman explained. The words which I have stated as having been used by him are not denied, and they justify the statement I have made. I feel no disposition to distort or exaggerate anything that gentlemen say; nor to ascribe to them motives different from those by which they are actuated, or other objects than those they really have in view; but I must be permitted to make such deductions from plain and explicit language as it will fairly warrant. Now, to open your ports and trade with both those Powers, without adopting any other measure, under existing circumstances, I consider a direct and unconditional submission; hence I feel myself strictly authorized by the gentleman's language to say, that the course suggested by him would be the most humble of all submissions, and without even an apology for national disgrace. And what object can gentlemen have in view in making speeches that breathe the spirit of resistance and war, and at the same time refusing to take a single measure calculated to vindicate the injured rights of their country; telling you in plain terms they will do nothing, unless indeed it be to conceal from the public eye the humiliating condition to which their course would bring the nation? I can see none. These are my deductions from what has been said on this floor. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) says his plan was not submission. If so, it is extremely easy; sir, for that gentleman, who every one knows can express his sentiments as clearly and distinctly as any man in the nation, (and in saying this I am not paying any compliment to the gentleman,) it is very easy for him, sir, to tell us precisely what is his plan, what are his objects. But, sir, I will pursue this part of the subject no further at this time, but return to the course I proposed to pursue, and, in the first place, notice some of the objections made to this report.

The House must excuse the want of methodical arrangement in the remarks which I may make. It will probably be impracticable, if not totally impossible, in noticing the inconsistent, and, in many instances, contradictory objections, made to the measure before you, to pursue any regular system.

The style of the report, and the mode in which the subject is treated, which seem to be particularly objectionable to the gentleman from Virginia, for he says it is not served up with such exquisite taste as it might be, will not be examined here. The report is before the public, who will decide no doubt impartially on those points. In their decision I shall very willingly acquiesce. These objections, however, whether well or ill founded, cannot affect the substance of the report. This will rest on its own merits. The facts stated in it are supported by documents, the truth of which will not be denied. The principles assumed are such as I presume it would not suit gentlemen to deny before the American people; they have not denied them. These, together with the reasoning upon them, and the conclusions drawn therefrom, are calculated to show the unprovoked wrongs, and to vindicate the injured rights of the people of this country; it may not, therefore, answer the purpose gentlemen have in view, to deny these directly, or to specify the particular part to which they are so much opposed. They have hitherto declined doing this, and have contented themselves with making vague and general objections to the whole measure, and, at the same time, they tell you, with one exception only, that they will vote for the resolution, while they consume the time of the House in arguing against it. Gentlemen tell you the first resolution under consideration is perfectly useless; that it is so clear it cannot be disputed; and yet, sir, we have not been able to get a question upon it for ten days. Some say they have no objections to it; others do not like it, but still they will not vote against it. One gentleman (Mr. GARDENIER) considered it so extremely clear, so self-evident, that he must vote against it. That is, he must, in order to show his consistency, record his vote against a proposition that was too self-evident to be denied. This kind of logic is to me incomprehensible. The gentleman says, we cannot, or ought not, to submit to anything. He will, therefore, vote against the resolution declaring that we cannot, &c., submit to the edicts of Great Britain and France; the effect of his vote therefore, must be, that we can and will submit to those edicts; as the negative must be the converse of the positive, and all this because the question is too clear to admit of doubt. Yes, sir, because the sun shines into your Chamber at noon day, that no reasoning can be necessary to establish the fact; the gentleman will tell you that it is so self-evident, that he must solemnly affirm, by his vote, that it does not shine at all. I shall not pretend to answer this kind of reasoning.

Some gentlemen object to this resolution on the ground that it is an abstract proposition, and that no bill is to be founded upon it. It has been correctly stated by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GHOLSON,) that it is not, strictly speaking, an abstract proposition. It is, in fact, expressing the sense of the House on the subject of submission as applied to the existing state of things; it may contain an acknowledged truth, but that is applied to the present state of our foreign relations, and so far it is specific. But suppose it were as abstract as gentlemen choose to consider it, still it would be parliamentary, and perfectly consistent with the practice and usages of deliberative bodies, and of this House to adopt it. I need not remind the House of the case when the right of deposit at New Orleans was interrupted. A declaration was then made, asserting our right to the navigation of the river Mississippi, and to the privileges consequent of that right, and our determination to maintain that right and those privileges unimpaired. What is the case now? The privilege of carrying your produce to its usual market is interdicted, and you are called on to declare that you will not submit to this infraction of your rights. I wish the gentleman to point out the difference in principle between declaring that you will not submit to an interruption of the right of deposit for your produce, as was the case at New Orleans, and a declaration that you will not submit to the interdiction of the right of carrying your produce to market, which is the present case. In the one case, the right of deposit is interrupted; in the other, the right of transit or of pursuing your lawful commerce, is interdicted; the principle in both cases is precisely the same. Many other instances of a similar nature might be introduced, if thought necessary, to show that this course is perfectly consistent with parliamentary usage. But I had supposed, sir, the few remarks I made when this subject was first taken up, would have prevented, or at least rendered unnecessary, the objections taken to this resolution. It was then stated to the House as a proposition so clear and self-evident, that I could scarcely bring myself to think it necessary. That it was fixed upon as a rallying point at which all would unite, and short of which no one would wish to stop, and it was supposed no objections would be made to it. It was not proposed as a measure upon which a bill or law was to be founded, and the objections taken on this ground are futile beyond description. It was intended, and will have the effect of showing to the American people who are willing to maintain their rights against foreign aggressions, and who are prepared and willing to submit tamely to those aggressions, and to admit that those edicts, violating your commercial and neutral rights, are perfectly correct, and therefore ought not to be resisted. The vote on this resolution may determine this point. Those who vote against the principle contained in the resolution, to wit: that we cannot submit to those edicts, must of necessity vote in favor of its opposite or contrary, that we can and will submit to them. There is no middle course between the negative and the positive, that I am acquainted with, that will enable gentlemen to vote against this resolution, and yet evade voting for submission to the edicts of Great Britain and France.

The gentleman from Virginia reminds us that we have been four weeks in session, being the fourth part of the time assigned by the Constitution for our deliberation and inquiries—what have we done? What progress has been made in public business? I regret the loss of time, sir, as much as any gentleman; but when we are remind of its rapid progress, and that we have not improved it, it would seem reasonable that those who complain should inform us what we ought, in their opinion, to have done, what they themselves have done, or what they would wish to do.

If they would point out the course they wish to pursue, we might possibly go with them, and thus hasten the progress of public business. None of the gentlemen has explicitly stated his plan. So far as they have divulged their project, it amounts to unconditional submission, that would plunge the nation into an abyss of disgrace. You are told to retrace your steps; to abandon the only measure for resisting foreign aggressions to which you have resorted; to acknowledge your error; that is, to announce to the world that we were totally wrong in opposing the Orders in Council of His Most Gracious Majesty, King George III, and the decrees of the Great Emperor of the French; and that we are willing to remove the embargo, and take just what little commerce they are pleased to assign us. If this be the gentleman's plan, I beg leave to enter my protest against it, and to declare that it never shall, with my consent, stain the page of your Journal.

Being in some measure called upon by the gentleman from Virginia, to explain some pretended inconsistency he has discovered in this report, I shall briefly notice some of the objections he has made to it. I could have wished that he had specified his objections so as to be capable of becoming the subject of investigation, that their merits might be ascertained, and that they might be susceptible of a specific answer. He has not done so; his censures and objections are vague and in general terms, not definite, nor, indeed, consistent or distinctly comprehensible. He says you must have something better than this report to extricate you from your present difficulties, but he does not tell you what that must be; nor does he offer any substitute for it. He observes that reports of committees, and correspondences of Ministers, and instructions of Secretaries of State, will not protect your rights or secure your independence; and seems to regret that the Secretary of State can write so well, because he says, whilst you have the best of the argument, you have the worst of the battle. I do not, sir, perceive any force of reasoning in all this, nor can I comprehend what object the gentleman had in view, unless it be to make known to the public his disapprobation of everything that was done, without assigning even a plausible reason for it. Certainly, our having the best of the argument cannot be the cause of our having the worst of the battle; and if we have, as he says, the worst of the battle, it could be no consolation to us to have also the worst of the argument, nor would this better our situation. Why the gentleman should seem to regret that your statesmen can so successfully show the justice of your cause, is indeed incomprehensible; as it never can, by any possibility, add to the number of aggressions committed on your rights. They would remain the same, whether the subjects of them were well or ilily discussed. It may be thought by some, but surely, I trust, not by that gentleman, a most unfortunate circumstance, that Mr. Madison can write so well, as it has thrown the diplomatic corps of George III in the back-ground; for, with all their Court intrigue and diplomatic address, they have certainly been foiled in the late discussions. It cannot, however, be pretended, that this brought the nation into its present difficulties.

With regard to the first resolution, now under discussion, the objections taken to it by the gentleman are extremely inconsistent, and some of them appear to me in direct contradiction to each other. He first says, "the resolution is weak, feeble, and useless;" and in another part of his speech, he asks, "whether this resolution is intended as a declaration of war." How the gentleman can consider the same resolution feeble, and therefore useless, and also as a declaration of war, is to me incomprehensible. But this kind of reasoning is in perfect consistency with the course pursued by gentlemen for the last two or three years. We were told last year that the embargo was war against Great Britain; now, we are told by the same men, that it is submission to her. In 1805, we were told the non-importation act was war, in the strongest terms, against the same Power; you were told that, by it, you were about to put the match to the train which would explode throughout the United States; you are now told that with the non-importation act commenced your career of submission. Surely, sir, what was war in 1805 and 1806, cannot since have become submission; nor can what was war in 1807, be now turned into submission. The gentleman, with all his eloquence, will not be able to reconcile to the people of the United States such inconsistencies, or induce them to believe in them.

The gentleman asked for some explanation respecting what he considered an inconsistency or anachronism in the report. I presume he must have been mistaken in the dates to which he alluded, or he would not have made this inquiry, as nothing is necessary to show that there is no inconsistency in that part of the report to which he alluded, but to examine and understand it.

The paragraphs which the gentleman read are these: The first in the fifth page of the report:

"The Milan decree of 1807 can still less rest for its defence on the supposed acquiescence of the United States in the British Orders of the preceding month, since those Orders, which have not certainly been acquiesced in, were not even known in America at the date of the decree."

The other paragraph was in the eighth and ninth pages:

"This, (the instruction of the Council of Prizes, &c.) was received on the — day of December; and a copy of the decision in the case of the Horizon, having at the same time reached Government, the President, aware of the consequences which would follow that new state of things, communicated immediately to Congress the alteration of the French Decrees, and recommended the embargo, which was accordingly laid on the 22d of December, 1807; at which time it was well understood, in this country, that the British Orders of Council, of

DECEMBER, 1808.

H. OF R.

November preceding, had issued, although they were not officially communicated to our Government."

Now, sir, the statements here made, are, that, at the date of the Milan decree, the Orders of Council of 11th of November, were not known in America, and that when the embargo was laid, it was well understood that they had issued. The Milan decree is dated on the 17th of December, 1807, the embargo was laid on the 22d of that month—five days afterward. The assertion, therefore, in the report is, that those Orders of Council were not known here to have issued on the seventeenth day of December, but that, on the 22d of that month, it was well understood they had issued. This is perfectly consistent, involves no anachronism, and was in fact the case, as I shall show the House. It may, however, be proper here to observe that, in such a document as that now before you, it would not have been correct to state that those orders were known here, so as to require, on our part, any measure of resistance to be taken in regard to them, in order to avoid a charge of acquiescence in them being made by a third Power, until they were officially communicated to our Government. This is the ground taken in the report. It states that "the Milan decree of 1807, can still less rest for its defence on the supposed acquiescence of the United States in the British orders of the preceding month," &c.; and to prove, beyond a doubt, that France had no such pretext to justify her decree, we say that, so far from having acquiesced in those orders, they were not even known here at that time. The knowledge of them here meant would properly be considered that which would result from an official communication of them to the Government. This might, with propriety, be considered the meaning of the report; and in that sense we were not made acquainted with the orders until the 28d of February, 1808, when they were officially communicated by Mr. Erskine. But, in the present instance, it is not necessary to resort to this construction to justify the statement in the report. For, according to the ordinary meaning of the term, the existence of those orders was not known to us (at least to me) on the 17th of December, 1807, and it was known to us, though not officially, on the 22d of that month. To show this, I beg leave to read to the House a short paragraph from a paper printed in this city, the National Intelligencer, of the 18th December, 1807, stated to be taken from a London print, it is as follows:

"A proclamation is now, we understand, in readiness for His Majesty's signature, declaring France and the whole of her vassal kingdoms in a state of siege, and prohibiting all intercourse with her or them, all entrance of vessels into their or her harbors, except of such as have cleared last from a British port, either home or foreign."

This is the first information, as far as known, received here, of the existence of those orders, and proves the correctness of the statement in the report—it being subsequent to the 17th, and previous to the 22d of December, 1807. This paragraph also fully answers another objection taken by the same gentleman to a statement in the report. He told you that, although it was asserted in the ninth page of the report, at the time the embargo was laid, it was generally understood here, the Orders of Council had issued, yet that in fact the British proclamation respecting seamen; and the injurious construction given the Berlin decree, were the real causes of laying the embargo, and that the Orders of Council did not constitute any part of the ground of this measure. We assert that the existence of these orders was known here, though not officially, when the embargo was laid. This fact is proved beyond a doubt by the paragraph which I have just read to the House, which shows that, on the 18th December, four days before the law passed, the information alluded to was published in this city.

This is the knowledge of those orders, alluded to in the report, which, connected with the note of the British Commissioners, annexed to the famous treaty of Mr. Monroe, so often noticed in this House, was, in my mind, conclusive evidence that the Orders in Council had issued, or at least were prepared to be issued. That note declared, in express terms, that if France did carry into execution the Berlin decree; &c., and if neutral nations did not effectually resist such execution, His Majesty might probably be compelled to adopt measures of retaliation, &c. We were apprized that the execution of the Berlin decree had been determined upon and carried into effect; we were, therefore, authorized to conclude that the British Government would carry into effect the threatened measures of retaliation; and we were further informed by the public prints of that country, as already shown, that such orders were actually in a state of preparation, and about to be officially published. What stronger proof could be required of the existence of those orders? I cannot judge of the motives which actuated other gentlemen, or of the grounds upon which they voted for the embargo. For myself, I can say that this information, in regard to those orders, had with me considerable weight, and when connected with the note alluded to, did induce me to vote precisely in the same manner I would have done if the Orders in Council had been officially laid on your table.

We are told, by the gentleman from Virginia, that we ought to have more of action and less of argument. This kind of memento has been so often repeated in this House, showing not what you ought to do, but that you ought to do something, that it has become the stale phrase in every one's mouth. It is a sufficient answer to those who use it, to ask them, as already, what they have done, or what they wish to do, to relieve the nation from its present difficult situation? They cry out, all is wrong; but not one of them tells you what would be right. They insist you are lost in a wilderness of difficulties; but they do not even point to the way that will lead you out. It is, sir, much easier to find fault with existing measures, than to propose such as would be better, in their stead. So long as human nature is so much under the control of capricious passions, and the malignant spleen of disappointed ambition, the most correct measures that can be devised will be censured, cavilled at, and found fault with, by certain men. We now call upon those gentlemen who exclaim against everything that has been done, or proposed to be done, to give us their project; to tell the nation what they would do, what plan they wish to follow. Until they do this, the public must and will consider their objections as unfounded, and as being the mere offspring of a captious disposition, or rancorous spleen. I do not wish to be understood as impeaching the motives of those gentlemen; they may possibly think their conduct is correct; but their object cannot well be mistaken. It is evidently an effort of the outs to get in. The common cry is, that everything is going wrong—the measures of the present Administration have brought you into all your difficulties—have brought you to the verge of ruin—there must be a change of measures to save you! What conclusion is to be drawn from all this? Why, sir, it is plainly this: That those gentlemen call on the people to turn out those who now manage their public affairs, and put them in. They say, “all is going wrong,” and may plainly be understood to mean, “put us in, and all will go right—we will not tell you what course we will adopt until we are in the full possession of power; we will then tell you what we will do.” Yes, sir; and what would they do? The same they did before, no doubt. They would tighten the cords upon the people, and make them more submissive to their superiors; they would have a strong Government, possessing much energy, supported by navies, armies, and hosts of civil officers. But there would be no surplus money in your Treasury. Instead of this, you would have direct taxes and excise laws to keep the people in order and give your Government energy. This appears to me to be fairly deducible from the conduct of those gentlemen.

It is not my intention, in the remarks which I shall make at this time, to take up the whole subject of the report. I shall notice some of the objections made to the several resolutions; and when I come to observe upon the general subject, shall confine myself principally to the first part of the report, which regards the aggressions committed on our rights by foreign nations, and on which the second resolution is founded; and also notice the nature of the measures we have already adopted in consequence of those aggressions.

It has been stated, that the first resolution is unnecessary and useless; that the second is submission, as it gives up all your trade, when only a part of it is affected by the edicts of the belligerents; and the third is said to be like the first, useless, as it only speaks of defence, &c. The objections to the first resolution have already been noticed, and may be adverted to again in another place. Those made to the second will be substantially answered, in the remarks that will be made in regard to the embargo, to show that it was not submission, and, of course, that this step, which is pursuing the same course, and may be considered as an extension of the same measure, cannot be submission. The objection to the third resolution, that it only proposes to prepare for defence, would naturally induce a belief that the gentleman who made it (Mr. RANDOLPH) wished us to prepare for, and adopt measures of offence. Such, however, does not seem to be the case—if it were, offence or war is one of the alternatives presented in the report, and would meet the gentleman's wishes; but he seems disposed to do nothing, as far as we can understand him, but take off the embargo and open a trade with those Powers, which, in my view, is abject submission, and nothing else. But, sir, if we prepare for defence, do we not, at the same time, prepare for offence? Is it usual or proper for a nation to declare that she is making preparations in order to make war on another nation? Is there to be found an instance of such an extraordinary and impolitic declaration? No, sir, there is not; until she is prepared to make war, she will not announce to her enemy that she intends to do so. Preparations for defence are calculated also for, and of the same nature with those used in offence. They are made for defence, but, should the occasion require it, they are used for both, for offence as well as defence. We do not wish for war—it is our interest as well as our desire to avoid it—we are threatened from abroad—we determine to make the necessary preparation for defence; and, should such a state of things occur as may require it, we can and will use them also for the purpose of offence. But it is, indeed, extraordinary that the objection should come in this shape, from a gentleman who proposes no measure himself, and is opposed to every one that has been suggested. He is against raising an army, against continuing the embargo, against a non-intercourse, objects to preparations for defence; and it may be asked, what is he for? The answer may be, submission. There is no other inference can be drawn from such conduct.

At the same time, sir, you are told, that the submissive, temporizing, missionary policy pursued by your Government has brought the nation to the brink of ruin. These general and unqualified assertions, without any reason given to support them, do not merit, and, indeed, cannot receive any other answer than a general and direct denial, until some proof be given of the facts alleged. It cannot be expected that we will go into proof, to controvert every vague assertion made on this floor. That the Government has used every means in its power to keep the nation out of difficulties; that it has pursued an impartial, firm, and dignified line of conduct toward foreign Powers; and that it has resorted to every honorable expedient, and used every power with which it was vested, to extricate the nation from its present difficulties, brought on by foreign aggressions, will not be denied by any one who examines and understands the whole grounds of the late negotiations, who gives reason fair play, and is not blinded by prejudice, or deluded by party considerations. those negotiations are now before the public, and those whom they will not convince of the correctness as well as the impartiality of the conduct of our Government, would not be persuaded by any argument that could be advanced on this floor. No; they would not believe an angel, though he should come down from Heaven, to sound these truths in their ears.

The same gentleman (Mr. R.) has asserted on this floor, in opposition to a statement made in the report, that an answer has been received from France, which is sufficient to satisfy every one who has seen or heard it. On what authority he founds this assertion, I cannot pretend to say. I have attended to the documents laid before Congress this session, both public and private; and I feel myself authorized, to state expressly, that no answer has been received from France on the point in question; that is, on the proposition under the authority of the law of last session; relative to withdrawing her decrees. In support of this you have the Message of the President; and Mr. Armstrong's last letter, bearing date the 28th of August last, in the public documents, shows that, so far from France having given a final answer, that he did not even renew the discussion on this subject with that Government, as he was authorized to do; and there is no document laid before this House which will show that any such answer has been received. I will not at present pursue these objections further. What has been already said is sufficient to show that they are rather the offspring of a spirit of opposition than founded on any substantial grounds of either fact or reasoning.

I shall now briefly notice the report itself, for the purpose of presenting the House with that view of such parts of it as relates to the question really before them, as I entertain, and which may possibly assist us in forming a correct opinion on the subject. The report may be considered as consisting of two parts. The first relates to, and states the injuries we have received; the aggressions committed on our commercial and neutral rights by foreign nations, and on this is founded the first resolution. The second part relates to the measures to be pursued, in order to resist those aggressions, and on this are founded the second and third resolutions. The first part is that which is immediately before the House. In it are briefly stated the orders and proclamations of Great Britain and the decrees of France, which infract and violate the lawful commerce and neutral rights of this country. Those edicts of the belligerents, and the manner in which they have been adopted and executed, are considered as aggressions of the most aggravating kind, and involving the best rights and dearest interests of the United States. Taken in the aggregate, they are considered and stated to amount to a maritime war against this country. They are also stated to be unprovoked and unauthorized on the part of both those nations, by any act on our part, of injury to either, or of voluntary acquiescence in the unjust violations on our rights by the one to the prejudice of the other. Hence it is concluded ed and insisted, that this nation ought not and cannot, consistently with its true interest and honor, submit to those aggressions; but is bound in duty and justice to itself to resist and oppose them. There can be no ground that would justify a nation (having the power) in not repelling, or at least resisting, an injury received, except such injury be of so little importance as not sensibly to affect its interest, and therefore not to merit public notice; or unless it be authorized or justified by the previous conduct of such injured nation. Neither of these is the case in the present instance. No one pretends to say, that the aggressions committed on our rights are trivial or unimportant; on the contrary, they are admitted to be of the most enormous kind; and it cannot with truth be pretended that there has been any act on our part that could, in justice, either provoke or authorize them. With this view of the subject the first resolution was presented to the House, in order to ascertain if there was any difference of opinion respecting the fact that those edicts of the belligerents, were a violation of the rights of this country, and ought not to be submitted to—to see if there was any one who would justify them, who would tell the American people that they must submit to the regulations of a foreign Power; and also to give the nation a solemn pledge that this House was determined not to abandon its best interests. Sir, it was supposed that no doubt could exist on this part of the subject. No one has been hardy enough to deny the violations committed on our rights by the edicts of the belligerent Powers. No one has denied the enormity and injustice of those violations, nor has it yet been asserted, on this floor, that they were provoked or authorized by any act on the part of this Government. Under what pretext, therefore, can gentlemen refuse to resist them? Why hesitate to vote for this resolution? Why detain the House debating it for ten days? Do they mean to justify those aggressions? to submit to them tamely? to acknowledge the right those Powers have to give laws to the people of this country? If so, let us know it; it is high time the public should be informed of it. Those, however, who admit the proceedings of the belligerent Powers to be violations of our rights, as stated in the first part of the report, (and the correctness of that statement has not been brought in question,) will not hesitate to vote for this resolution. They will not hesitate to declare that they will not abandon the best rights of the people, that they will not submit to foreign aggressions.

When this is once determined, the question of submission will be at rest. The resolution to resist will have been taken, and the next inquiry will be in relation to the measures of resistance most proper to be adopted. This part of the subject, as already noticed, constituting the second part of the report, and giving origin to the second and third resolutions, will come more properly in discussion when those resolutions are immediately before the House. I shall not, therefore, at this time enter at large into the discussion of this part of the subject. But, as gentlemen who have gone before me, have introduced into this discussion the measures pursued by the Government for some time past, and have in particular attacked the conduct of the majority in laying the embargo, I shall find it necessary to notice some of their arguments, on this part of the subject, in order to rescue that measure from the very unjust odium attempted to be thrown upon it. Gentlemen ascribe all your difficulties and misfortunes to the embargo; they say it has destroyed your commerce, and brought the nation to the verge of ruin; that it is submission; that you might have considerable trade, if it were not for the embargo, and that, therefore, it ought to be repealed, &c. By way of answering these arguments, and, in order to lay before the House as briefly as possible the view which I entertain of that measure, I shall endeavor to show—

1. That it was not the embargo, but the Orders in Council of Great Britain, and the decrees of France, which destroyed your commerce, produced the pressure that is now so much complained of, and placed this country in its present critical situation.

2. That the embargo was not submission to those Powers; that it was taking a firm and dignified stand in opposition to their aggressions and in vindication of our rights.

I shall also attempt to show, in the third place, that when the embargo was laid any other measure that could have been adopted, except war, would have been submission to one or both of those Powers. And, further, in the fourth place, that if you had not laid the embargo, but had even submitted to those aggressions, the trade you could have enjoyed, subject to those restrictions, would be of little or no real value in the great scale of national commerce, could scarcely claim any serious notice, and could not possibly be considered an adequate compensation for national degradation and dishonor.

With regard to the first point proposed to be shown, that it was not the embargo but the orders of Great Britain and decrees of France, which destroyed your commerce and placed the nation in its present critical situation, it may be necessary, in order to remove the delusion which has prevailed on this subject, to notice the condition in which those orders and decrees had placed your commerce previous to laying the embargo. For want of attending to this circumstance, the public mind has been imposed upon. It has been erroneously represented that you could have enjoyed commerce to a considerable extent if it were not for the embargo, that it alone has destroyed your trade, and brought the nation to the verge of ruin; and this impression, aided by repeated misrepresentations, has been attempted to be fastened on the public mind, contrary to the real truth and state of the case. It is high time this delusion should be removed. Sir, it must and will dissipate when the people are correctly informed of the real source from which spring all the difficulties and cause of privations they now experience; when they are convinced that, in the orders of Great Britain and decrees of France, is to be found the real cause of all these difficulties; when they clearly perceive that those orders and decrees had opened a gulf to swallow up all your commerce; that the embargo intervened as a shield and saved it from certain destruction, and, at the same time, saved the nation from the bloody scenes of war: when the people are convinced of this, as they undoubtedly will be so soon as they are correctly informed on the subject, they will then cease to be deluded and led astray by misrepresentations; they will see the measure in its proper point of view, and duly appreciate the conduct of their Government.

Sir, what was the situation of your commerce when the embargo was laid? By the orders of Great Britain you were prohibited from going to any country on the Continent of Europe, except Sweden—the poor, barren country of Sweden, as it is emphatically called by an English writer, to which country you export about $56,000 worth of your own domestic produce. You were not permitted to export thither the produce or manufacture of any other country. Of course this was all the trade left open to this country by those orders on the Continent of Europe. If you carried on any other trade to Europe, it must be directly with or through a British port. In order to show the correctness of this statement, and also to show what was considered in England the operation of those Orders in Council, and in what condition they placed the commerce of this country with Europe, I will refer to the production of a late writer of the first respectability, whose authority, for the purpose I have in view, will not be denied. I mean Mr. Baring's pamphlet on the subject of these orders. In the 12th page of which is stated what was considered there as the practical construction of them.

"All trade directly from America to every port and country of Europe at war with Great Britain, or from which the British flag is excluded, is totally prohibited. In this general prohibition every port of Europe, with exception at present of Sweden, is included, and no distinction whatever is made between the domestic produce of America, and that of the colonies re-exported from thence."

"The trade from America to the colonies of all nations remains unaltered by the present orders. America may export the produce of her own country, but that of no other, directly to Sweden.

"With the above exception, all articles, whether of domestic or colonial produce, exported by America to Europe, must be landed in this country, from whence it is intended to permit them re-exportation under such regulations as may hereafter be determined.

"By these regulations, it is understood that duties are to be imposed on all articles so re-exported, &c.

"Any vessel, the cargo whereof shall be accompanied with certificates of French consuls abroad of its origin, shall, together with the cargo, be liable to seizure and condemnation," &c.

Thus, sir, we see that according to the construction given those orders, by the English themselves, (for this Mr. Baring was a member of Parliament,) at the time the embargo was laid, your commerce was prohibited from every country on the Continent of Europe, except Sweden alone, poor and barren in trade as already stated, to which your trade, as has been observed, is of no importance, being confined to your own produce, of which you send there only about the value of $56,000; an amount too inconsiderable to deserve material notice in the great scale of American commerce. On the other hand you were, by the decrees of France, prohibited from trading to Great Britain, or to any other country occupied by British troops. About this time it is believed there were British troops in occupation of Sweden; if so, you were totally excluded, and shut out from all Europe; there was not a single port to which you could go with safety. But, sir, it is altogether immaterial for my purpose, whether Sweden was occupied by British troops or not; the trade with her is not worth naming, and would afford no sufficient inducement to keep open a commerce that would probably involve the destruction of a hundred times its value of your property under one pretext or other; and would also compromise your honor and independence as a nation; for if you voluntarily surrendered all your trade as far as forbidden by Great Britain and France, and continued the small precarious scraps, if any, that they chose to assign you, you at once acknowledged their right to regulate your trade at their own pleasure, and in fact to give laws to this country. If this view of the subject be correct, and I call on gentlemen, if they deny it, to show the contrary, what trade could you have pursued or enjoyed when the embargo was laid? Your trade with all Europe was totally cut off, as has been already shown, (that with Sweden whether permitted or not would not sensibly affect the general result,) your only trade that remained was that with the colonies. Let us inquire what this trade would be. With the British colonies you have no permanent trade; she never opens the ports of her colonies to your ships, except when forced by necessity to do so. Your whole trade, then, to the colonies would have been in domestic produce only somewhat more than $6,000,000 worth. This would have been all the trade you could carry on; your trade with those colonies in foreign articles would cease, because you could not procure the foreign goods that constituted that branch of trade. When, therefore, the embargo was laid, your whole commerce, amounting to more than $108,000,000 of exports, was liable to capture and confiscation, except the small amount of somewhat more than $6,000,000. When your trade was in this situation, when those orders and decrees were about to sweep your commerce from the ocean, the embargo was laid, and like a shield intervened and saved it from certain destruction. Yes, sir, I venture to affirm, without the hazard of a contradiction from any well informed merchant of candor, as my information is derived from the most respectable authority, that the embargo has saved the American people more than $100,000,000, that would, if it had not been laid, most undoubtedly have fallen into the hands of the belligerent Powers. No man will be so wild as to say that those Powers, after solemnly declaring that they would capture your vessels, trading to their enemies, would, notwithstanding, refrain from taking them if they came in their way. There is not the slightest pretext for this; there was then no security for your commerce, but to withdraw it from the ocean. This was done, and it has been saved. The edicts of the belligerents left no alternative with your Government, but to leave your commerce to be entirely destroyed, or retain it within your own limits—the latter was resorted to, and was rendered indispensable by the conduct of those Powers. There is not, therefore, any foundation in fact for the assertion that the embargo destroyed your trade; the contrary is shown beyond a doubt. Yet, sir, unfounded as this assertion is, it has been industriously circulated throughout the nation; has imposed upon and deluded many honest, well meaning men, and aided by constant misrepresentations, equally unfounded, which are constantly spread from one end of the Union to the other by the opponents and enemies of the present Government, has been made the hobby-horse upon which they have indulged the hope for the last year of riding into power. In this hope, however, they may probably be disappointed. So soon as the people are correctly informed, the delusion which has been produced by misrepresentation will vanish and disappear. [Mr. SOUTHWARD here observed, that as the gentleman who was speaking appeared somewhat exhausted, and was not probably near the conclusion of his remarks, and it being now a late hour, he would, with his consent, move to adjourn, which was agreed to.]

On the next day, [December 7.] Mr. CAMPBELL said when he closed the remarks which he had the honor of making on yesterday, he had just submitted to the House some observations with the view of showing that it was not the embargo that destroyed our commerce, or brought on the nation the pressure which is now so sensibly felt, and so much complained of. I had stated to the House, said he, that the orders of Great Britain, and the decrees of France, were the real cause of all the difficulties which are now experienced by this country. That they, and not the embargo, had cut up your trade by the very roots, and rendered a total suspension for a time indispensable for its salvation from inevitable destruction. This is a truth supported by facts that cannot be denied; remove the embargo, and you expose your trade, naked and defenceless, to certain destruction—the same that would have taken place if it had not been laid. Fortunately for the merchants, (but unfortunately it would seem for the Government, if the misrepresentations that are circulated abroad should be believed,) your commerce did not feel the destructive scourge that was prepared for it. The embargo intervened and saved it from the devouring jaws of the great Leviathan of the ocean that were already open to receive it. If the embargo had been postponed a few weeks longer, until your trade had felt a partial destruction, until a few hundred more of your ships had been swept from the ocean, and condemned by Great Britain and France under their orders and decrees, your merchants and the people of the United States generally would have been more sensible of the salutary effects of this measure in saving the property of the nation. They would then have been convinced of the real cause of the present suspension of trade, and ascribe it to its true source, the edicts of the belligerent Powers. They would have seen that nearly all their property on the ocean was seized and sequestered or condemned by those Powers, and that the residue, if it had been suffered to go out, would have shared the same fate. That this would have been the case there can be no doubt. It is proved by the fact, that of the vessels that left this country for Europe, shortly before the embargo, scarcely one arrived safe at their intended market. A fact of the strongest kind in support of this position is well known, and has already been stated; that of nine vessels that went out of one of the Eastern ports, immediately previous to the embargo, not one of them arrived safe at the place of destination. It is a fair calculation, that if your commerce generally had been permitted to go on the ocean, it would have shared the same fate. Hence the conclusion is inevitable that this measure, so far from destroying your trade, has saved it from certain destruction.

Entertaining this view of the subject, and being convinced of its correctness, I confess I have been much astonished that it has been so often repeated in this House, and also in the party prints in different parts of the country, that the embargo has brought the nation to the verge of ruin; when it is undoubtedly true, that if it had not been laid, property to a vast amount, which is now within the country, and in your own possession, would have been captured, condemned, and added to the resources of your enemies. You would have been stripped, I may say robbed, of more than one hundred millions of property, and that would have been added to the common stock or funds of Great Britain and France. This is precisely the situation in which you would have been placed by the edicts of the belligerents, if the embargo had not been laid. Will gentlemen say that this would be a more desirable situation than you are in at present? Will they say that your own people being deprived of their property, while it is thrown into the hands of their enemies, would render their condition more eligible, relieve their distresses, or add to the money in your Treasury? Is it better, sir, that Great Britain should have the greater part of your vessels and merchandise, and a great proportion of your seamen, and make use of them against you, whenever the occasion should occur, than that they should remain in the country in your own possession, and add to the resources of the nation? There can be no doubt on this subject; no one will assert this. I might pursue the inquiry further. Is it not better and much more honorable for this country that your produce should even rot in your warehouses, than it should be enjoyed by your enemies, and used by them for your destruction? The people of America cannot entertain a doubt on this point. If they know what is the fact, that there was no alternative but either to leave it in their warehouses to rot, or throw it into the hands of their enemies, they would not hesitate to say with one voice, "we will suffer it to moulder and rot in our warehouses rather than supply our enemies with it to our own destruction." This is the precise question which was presented when the embargo was laid, and which is still to be decided. That those Powers would have captured all your property which they could find upon the ocean cannot be doubted by any one who has attended to their conduct, and is in any degree acquainted with their proceedings.

It may not be improper here to notice some particular instances in the conduct of those Powers on this occasion, in order to ascertain whether we had anything to expect from their friendship or justice; whether on the contrary they did not seem to prepare deliberate plans to entrap and destroy your commerce.

It will be recollected that Great Britain, in the famous note of reservation, which was annexed to Monroe's Treaty (so often noticed here) lately rejected by our Government, expressly stated, that "if, however, the enemy should carry these threats (meaning the Berlin decree) into execution, and if neutral nations (contrary to all expectation) should acquiesce in such usurpation, His Majesty might probably be compelled, however reluctantly, to retaliate in his just defence, and to adopt, in regard to the commerce of neutral nations with his enemies, the same measures which those nations shall have permitted to be enforced against their commerce with his subjects." From this it appears that the two requisites necessary in the opinion of the British Ministry themselves to justify retaliation, are the execution of the decree and the acquiescence of neutral nations in such execution. This note was calculated to lull into security the people of America, and induce them to believe there was no danger to be apprehended from Great Britain, unless France should carry her decrees into execution, and there should also be an acquiescence on the part of this country. But what was the result? After this public declaration, without waiting to ascertain either of these facts, without knowing whether France would execute her decree, or the United States acquiesce therein—nay, in less than eight days after such declaration Great Britain issued her retaliating orders of the 7th January, 1807, which, contrary to the acknowledged law of nations, and in direct violation of the note that had been officially communicated, declared as good prize vessels of the United States sailing from the ports of one belligerent to a port of another belligerent. This was spreading a net, in which would probably be taken a great part of your commerce then afloat upon the ocean.

In the next place, a Minister Extraordinary, Mr. Rose, was sent to this country, to adjust existing differences between the two nations; it was announced that he was the messenger of peace; this was also calculated, to quiet the apprehensions of your people, to lull into security the councils of your nation, and produce an impression that nothing hostile or unfriendly was intended by that Government. He gave you no information respecting the existence or intended publication of any orders violating your commerce; mark the result. At the very time he left England, those Orders in Council of the 11th November, 1807, had issued, and another scheme was thereby laid, more deep and much more extensive than the former, to sweep the whole of your commerce from the ocean, and put an end at once to all rivalry of British trade by that of America. Can the object of this measure be mistaken or misunderstood? Will gentlemen close their eyes against the strongest proof? This Minister Extraordinary did not mention those orders to your Government; he did not even know of their existence, as was pretended; yet they had actually issued before he left that country. A fact may be mentioned here, which I have received from such authority as induces me to believe it, that may throw some light on this subject, and show the effects it was there expected the measure would have. Bets were offered in England immediately after those orders issued, that in a few months the United States would not possess one hundred merchant vessels; so confident they were that their plan was so well laid, that they would sweep from the ocean the whole commerce of the United States! And it was not so important to Great Britain, whether this was effected by herself or by France, so as it was done. Her great object was to destroy your commercial importance; if she effected that, she gained the great point she had in view. Again, it so happened, that in some parts of this country there was a great outcry made against the embargo; misrepresentations were numerous, and industriously circulated, (principally by the enemies of this country and the friends of England,) and its pressure on the people was exaggerated, and its evils highly colored, beyond all reason, and without the least regard to truth. These misrepresentations and false coloring of facts reached England, and there probably gained some credit. That Government was induced to believe that when Congress met, they must and would remove the embargo. The session had hardly opened, the members had scarcely taken their seats, when this great Leviathan of the ocean, hungry for the prey, of which she had been deprived by the embargo, again opened her avaricious jaws to engulf your defenceless commerce the moment it floated upon the seas. But unfortunately for her, (though fortunately for your own merchants,) she was again disappointed. She had declared the French West India islands in a state of blockade about the time the session commenced, in order to be prepared, in case the embargo was removed, to seize and destroy your trade whenever it was committed to the ocean; and had your embargo been taken off, every ship which would have left this country would, undoubtedly, under one pretext or other, have fallen a prey to British cruisers. These are three honorable instances of British consistency, friendship, and candor. I have thought proper to notice them to the House, to show that we have nothing to hope from the friendship of Great Britain, who has now the entire command of the seas. That, so far from having any disposition to favor us, she has deliberately laid one plan after another to seize your vessels and destroy your trade; so that if your commerce had been permitted to go out, it would most undoubtedly have been annihilated. Further, sir, experience has proved that almost the whole of the vessels that went out about that time, and shortly before, have either been seized and condemned, or made to pay tribute by Great Britain, or sequestered, or condemned by France. If your trade had generally gone out, it must, therefore, all have shared the same fate. And yet, sir, you are told that, by laying the embargo, and saving your commerce from certain destruction, you have brought this country to the verge of ruin.

From this view of the subject I feel myself authorized to say, that the embargo when it was laid, was not only a wise and proper, but also a fortunate measure. This has been proved by events which afterwards took place, that could not have been foreseen, in their full extent, or in all the points of view in which they afterwards presented themselves. The result has shown it to have been more important, as well as more fortunate, than it could fairly have been estimated at the time it was imposed. How long it may be proper to persevere in the embargo, in preference to war, is a question of quite a different nature; a question which I do not intend at this time to investigate. But, sir, if gentlemen consider the embargo, aided by a non-intercourse law as proposed, inefficient and too weak a measure, the committee, whose report is now under consideration, has presented to the House another alternative—war. If gentlemen prefer this course, and are willing to adopt it, let them come forward and say so; we have not said that we will not join them in it; we have not said that we will not go every length to vindicate the injured rights of our country. Let the gentlemen therefore declare to the nation the ground they are willing to take to resist aggressions.

I propose to show that the embargo, when laid, was not submission to those Powers, (as has been asserted and often repeated;) that it was taking a firm and dignified ground in opposition to their aggressions and in vindication of our rights.

Nothing could give the least appearance of plausibility to the assertion, that the embargo was submission, but the situation in which we were placed, in regard to the two great belligerent Powers, who were at war with each other, rendering it necessary that we should resist both at the same time. When the measure is considered, as it certainly ought to be, as applied to each of them separately and distinctly; and as if adopted and operating first against one alone, in consequence of its conduct towards us, and then against the other in like manner; its true character will be manifested, and no doubt can exist on the subject. First, then, as it regards France; by her decrees she declares, you shall not trade to Great Britain or any of her dependencies. To resist this aggression on our rights, we say to France, "you have violated our lawful commerce, we will therefore shut up our ports as to you. If you do not permit us to trade with other nations on fair terms, we will not trade with you at all; we will keep our commerce at home, and show you and the world, that we can do better without your manufactures, than you can subsist without our produce, so essential to your support." Surely, sir, this cannot be called submission to France—and although not a hostile measure, it is a measure of firm and decided resistance. In the first place you save your own trade from threatened destruction, you deprive her of supplies, and the advantages she derived from your commerce; and next you say to her, "although we have not as large a navy, or as many soldiers to fight as you have, yet we will be independent; we will remain within our own limits, live on our own productions, and protect our own soil; we will not hold intercourse with you on your own terms, nor submit to go to those ports only which you point out, and to no others."

On the other hand, apply the measure to Great Britain. She, by her Orders in Council, has declared "you shall not trade with France or with any of her dependencies," that is, "you shall not sail to a single port on the Continent of Europe, (except perhaps those of Sweden,) if you do, my cruisers are authorized to seize you and carry you into my ports, where you shall either be condemned, or made to pay a tribute, a heavy tax for license to go, where you will most undoubtedly be condemned for having such license." To this outrageous aggression on their best rights, the United States have said—in the first place, "we will cut off our export trade from you altogether; if you do not suffer us to trade with other nations on fair terms, we will not trade with you at all. We know we have not a navy to protect our commerce against your thousand ships of war, upon the ocean; we will therefore withdraw our commerce from that element, and retain it within our own limits; you shall not receive supplies from us, or be furnished with our produce. We will, in the next place, cut off all intercourse with you, until you agree to do us justice; you will feel much more sensibly the loss of our trade, than we shall the loss of your custom." This sir, is not submission. It is a firm and manly resistance though not of a hostile nature, and the only measure that could at the time have been adopted consistent with the honor and interest of the nation. We do not pretend to have as many ships of war as Great Britain, to protect our commerce on the ocean; we do not wish to have them; such an establishment would be inconsistent with the genius of our Government; but we do know that our produce, being the necessities of life, is much more important to her than her gaudy fabrics are to us; that the balance of her trade with us is nearly twenty millions annually in her favor; that we receive of her manufactures annually, about twelve millions sterling, nearly equal to sixty millions of dollars, being about one-third of her whole exports; and knowing these facts, we must know, that by a suspension of our commerce with her, she must be a loser in proportion to the advantages she usually derived from it. We have a right fairly to conclude that a nation will do what is best for her own interest, and what will most promote the benefit of her people. If Great Britain is blind to, and regardless of the best interests of her people, it is no proof that our measures are not correct, or that they were not the best for this country that could at the time have been adopted.

It is however said, sir, that this measure is an abandonment of commerce. I do not profess to have any practical knowledge in commercial matters, but I apprehend it will not be difficult to show, without much of such knowledge, that this assertion is totally fallacious and unfounded. That, on the contrary, the measures pursued by Government have been taken in support of the commercial rights of this country, and are persevered in to maintain the same unimpaired. What occasioned the passage of the non-importation act? The numerous petitions of your merchants, complaining of aggressions committed on your trade by Great Britain, and violations of your neutral rights on the ocean. They alone complained in this case—and they were principally interested. The Government attended to their complaints—a stand was made in favor of commerce—a step was taken to maintain and vindicate the mercantile interest of the nation. The measure taken pledged the Government at once to support those commercial and neutral rights which we claimed as an independent nation. Was this abandoning commerce? It was not, sir. Again, who were likely to suffer most by the orders of Great Britain and the decrees of France? Certainly the merchants, whose property was exposed to ruin, almost inevitable. It is true the other classes of society would feel the effects of those foreign aggressions sensibly; but it would only be through the merchants, who would suffer first and most materially. This produced the embargo, in order to save the property of your merchants, and maintain unimpaired the commercial rights of the country. In this instance the nation gave another pledge not to suffer those rights to be encroached upon, and hazarded all the consequences of throwing back as it were on the hands of the farmers their produce, to remain dormant, or be sold for very low prices—of having the sources from which their revenue was chiefly derived, in a great degree dried up, rather than see those rights trampled upon and the vital principles of the mercantile interest openly violated; and yet we are told that in all this we are abandoning commerce. It is scarcely possible to believe, that gentlemen who have any tolerable knowledge of the substantial and real interests of commerce in a national point of view, can be serious in making those as-assertions—or, if they are, they must be blinded by prejudice or deluded by mistaken views of the subject. What would be the consequences of pursuing your trade under the restrictions imposed upon it by foreign Powers? It would be acknowledging the right those Powers had to regulate and circumscribe your commerce at pleasure—to cut it up by piece-meal, until you were stripped of the whole of it. I say, sir, this would be abandoning commerce, and they must be totally ignorant of the great principles of national commerce, or inimical to them, who wish to pursue this course. Yet, sir, it is the course insisted upon by those who pretend to be the advocates of commerce. They say, although Great Britain has cut off your trade with France and the Continent, and France has interdicted your trade to Great Britain, there is still some trade left, which you might enjoy. This would be submitting to the right which Great Britain and France claim, to fix the precise places to which we shall be permitted to go. You agree not to go to France because Great Britain has so required. You do not go to Great Britain because France has so directed—but you go to some of the islands because both have permitted it. This would be submission to both those Powers, and that of the meanest kind; and it would also be surrendering at once the vital principles of the great commercial interests of this country.

If you relinquish your commerce by piece-meal, as the belligerents choose alternately to interdict it, will it not soon be wholly destroyed? For they have as good a right to cut off our trade with the whole world, as with that part of it from which they have already interdicted it. There can be no difference. The Government of this country has considered our commercial rights as forming our whole or aggregate system, which, as a free nation, we had a right to enjoy; and have determined not to surrender any part of these rights—not to suffer any encroachments upon them, to rally round and maintain them unimpaired, to enjoy the whole as a free people, or not enjoy them at all. For there is no ground upon which you could surrender any part of those rights that would not equally justify the surrender of the whole. In this view I understand this subject; and those who oppose the present measure, must be considered as willing to surrender a portion of those rights—to submit to foreign aggressions—in order to be permitted to pursue the scanty trade that may be left them at the pleasure of those Powers. This ought to be known. The people should be informed that in this way a portion of their best rights is proposed to be surrendered, and probably forever abandoned. I am not, sir, for giving up any portion of our rights—I am not for abandoning commerce—I consider the measures we have adopted a stand made in support of commerce. I am not for retracing our steps; if we must move, I am for advancing. So far as commerce is consistent with the great interests of agriculture, so far I am willing to go in support of it; but when it is attempted to oppress or sacrifice the agricultural interest of the whole country, in order to extend commerce beyond its natural bounds, or when those two interests come in collision, the one with the other, I shall consider it my duty to support the interests of agriculture in opposition to that of commerce. It may be proper here to remark, that there is not the slightest pretext for the allegation that we are about to pursue a Chinese policy, or that the embargo is to be perpetual. These are the mere chimeras of a feverish imagination, or the alarm-cries of those whose constant endeavor has been to misrepresent in order to mislead the public mind. The committee have presented to the House two alternatives, the one is a continuation of the suspension of commerce for a season, the other is war. If the time has not yet arrived to resort to the last alternative to obtain justice, persevere for a time in the embargo; but if you do, strengthen its ties, and execute its provisions, and do not permit a few of the most corrupt and degenerate individuals in society to enrich themselves at the expense not only of the honest part of the community, but of the dearest and best rights of the nation.

I come now to show in the third place, that any other course which could have been pursued when the embargo was laid, would be war or submission. If you attempted to trade to those places from which you were prohibited by the edicts of the belligerents, you came in direct collision with them; your vessels were of course captured and condemned, and this must produce war. If you traded to those places only to which you were permitted to go by those edicts, (the only remaining course that could be pursued,) it was submission to both those Powers. Many of the remarks already made in showing that the embargo was not submission, are applicable to this point, and sufficiently support it; a few additional observations only will be made. Suppose you were to pursue such trade as was left unrestricted by those edicts, what would be its extent, and what its character? You were totally excluded from Europe, as already shown, except that you might possibly carry your own produce, but that of no other country, to Sweden, amounting as already stated only to about fifty-six thousand dollars, and this very doubtful. But suppose you were suffered to go there unmolested, what would, what ought the world to say of your conduct? That you were the submissive, humble slave of Great Britain and France; that you obeyed their edicts, and submitted to trade to the precise country to which they permitted you, and surrendered up all the rest of your commerce at their pleasure. Each of those Powers may, with equal justice, prevent you from exercising any other of your rights appertaining to a free people, as to say, that you shall not trade with certain ports or places not under its control. In going to that precise place to which they permit you, and to no other, you submit to both, and you acknowledge their right to give you laws. Yet this is the only course proposed to be pursued by those gentlemen, and it would reduce the nation to a state of foreign vassalage. Gentlemen have said that the West India islands are not included in those edicts, and that you might carry on a commerce with them. This trade, sir, falls under all the objections just stated, and would be pursuing as humble a course as trading to Sweden alone. But what is the situation of this trade to the islands? Great Britain does not permit any regular trade with her West India colonies; you are never suffered to go there, except when she is forced by necessity, by scarcity, to open her ports for your produce, and then it is under such restrictions that her own merchants derive the greater part of the benefits from the trade. The British orders, according to their general tenor, include the other West India islands, but His Majesty, as a matter of favor, is graciously pleased to permit you for the present to carry on your trade with them. This is announced officially to your Government by Mr. Erskine, in the same note by which he communicated those orders. There it is stated expressly that His Majesty might justly exclude you from all the colonies of France and her allies, but that through favor, as a matter of mere grace, your trade to them was left open. He would not press too severely on you at once, lest the spirit of the nation might be roused into indignation, and they should determine to avenge at once those aggressions and insults; (and it is hoped the day of retribution may not be far distant.) He chose, in order to soften the measure, to suffer this small portion of your trade, not exceeding seven millions of dollars, as shall be shown hereafter, to be carried on, but under his express permission, which he might withdraw at pleasure. This is the trade which the nation has been told might still be pursued; and these are the terms on which it would be enjoyed. Is there, sir, a soul that warms an American breast so degraded as to be willing to accept of such a boon upon such conditions? I had supposed there was not? I had supposed that every American would recoil with indignation from such a proposition; but in this I was mistaken. A proposition made by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LIVERMORE,) during the last session, had for its object expressly to pursue such part of your commerce as Great Britain had assigned you, by her orders, and no more, and to relinquish all she had prohibited.

A gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. KEY,) in a long speech, recommended, and strongly advocated the same measure in substance. He told you your fish would be carried to one market, and your produce to another, to a considerable amount, without being exposed to danger from those edicts; and how did this appear? Because Great Britain had permitted you to go to those places, he would therefore carry on so much commerce as she was pleased to permit, and by which she might conceive herself likely to be benefited, and abandon the rest. If His Majesty, George the Third, had an advocate on this floor, whose business it was to carry into effect his Orders in Council, he could have proposed no measure more effectual for that purpose than this would have been. Nothing could more completely execute those orders, than confining your trade to those ports, and within the precise circle which these orders prescribe. It is acknowledging, what I am told, some British agents and advocates in this country avow, that Great Britain has conquered the ocean, and has therefore a right to regulate commerce upon it as she pleases. We have been told something about pursuing a Chinese policy; but I venture to affirm that this would be the most effectual mode to destroy your foreign commerce, and establish this kind of policy. If you acknowledge the supremacy of Great Britain, the right she has to limit, circumscribe, and regulate your commerce, when, and how she pleases, you at once sap the vital principles of foreign commerce, and necessarily lay the foundation for a Chinese policy. If, to-day, she cuts off all your trade, except to the West India islands, in a few days, months, or years, she may on the same principle cut you off from them also. This might probably open the eyes of those who are most deeply interested in commerce; and I cannot help feeling the strongest conviction, that if the merchants in the Eastern States saw this subject in its true light, they would be amongst the first to support at every hazard the measures already adopted and proposed. They are deeply interested in preserving unimpaired foreign commerce in its full extent. In the bold and daring violations of it by those orders and decrees, they must see a fatal blow aimed at its vital principles; which, if submitted to, may be repeated, and finally complete its total destruction. They are therefore now seriously called upon to determine whether, in order to avoid this catastrophe, and maintain unimpaired the great principles of national commerce, they will not rally round their Government, who have put everything to hazard for this important object, and support not only the embargo and non-intercourse, so long as the same are thought proper and necessary, but also war with all its calamities, should that be the result. If they do not act thus, through whatever delusion it may be, they will most certainly repent when they are undeceived, for they must and will be convinced, in a short time, that the real objects of those measures, and of the Government in adopting them, were, and still are, the protection of national commerce; and that the effects of the course proposed by the opposition party would be to sap its very foundations, to endanger its existence, to surrender the fairest portions of it to Great Britain, and fritter it away to a mere skeleton—a name without substance. If gentlemen interested in commerce will persevere in this course, let them beware of, and be prepared to abide by, the consequences.

I come now to show, as I proposed, in the fourth place, that if you even submitted to carry on the miserable pittance of commerce that was left you, and which could be enjoyed if the embargo had not been laid, it would only amount to a mere trifle, not sufficient to merit any serious notice, and could not be considered as any compensation for national degradation and dishonor.

You were shut out from the continent of Europe. I will not mention again your trade to Sweden; she is now a mere speck in the political horizon, and scarcely known in the political world. The conditions upon which you would obtain permission to trade to any other place on the Continent, are too degrading to be passed in review here. I will not go through the odious task, for the purpose of exciting your indignation, of repeating the tribute or tax imposed on your commerce, and even on your own produce in British ports, in order to obtain a license to carry it elsewhere; I will not rouse indignant feelings, by telling the people of this country that they may send their cotton to the Continent, by carrying it first to Great Britain, and there paying a duty of 17 cts. per lb. on it, and receiving a license, as a badge of vassalage to George III, which would certainly procure its condemnation at any port on the Continent to which it could go. Nor will I enter into a calculation of the duty to be paid on that portion of your produce consumed in Great Britain, after it is forced into her ports; neither shall I pursue the regulations by which you are compelled to take your cotton and other articles out of the warehouses for the purpose of home consumption on payment of duties, unless exported within fifteen months after you have been compelled to carry them there by their cruisers; and in case your cotton will not sell for a sufficient price to pay the charges and duties, you are graciously permitted to burn or otherwise destroy it, in order to avoid paying duties. These odious impositions need not be announced to the American people, to rouse resentment already sufficiently excited; but in order to show what trade you could pursue, subject to those humiliating restrictions of the belligerents already mentioned, I have made out, though with some reluctance, as I do not conceive the question before you to depend on calculations, a brief statement of your commerce with those countries and places to which you were permitted to go. This statement, taken from official documents, will present the House with the amount of trade during the last year, ending the 30th of September 1807, to the respective countries and places to which which we were permitted to go by the orders of Great Britain, and were not prevented from going by the decrees of France.

The whole trade, therefore, that could be pursued by the special permission of Great Britain, and not interdicted by France, when the embargo was laid, would be less than seven million and a half of dollars, out of more than one hundred and eight and one-third millions, the amount of your foreign trade for the same year. This, sir, is a correct statement, and cannot be controverted by any authentic documents; and it will show how falacious the statements were, which a gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Key) made at the close of last session, and which were calculated to impose on the public mind. I know, sir, we exported during the period mentioned, to the same countries, foreign produce and manufactures to the amount of about sixteen millions and a half of dollars; but this cannot be included in the commerce we could pursue; because we could not procure the articles which constituted this branch of our exports, being prohibited from going to those countries where they could be obtained. It is proper here also to remark, that your imports from the same countries are less than your exports, which can be shown from the most correct information on the subject. But, whatever they may have been, they must in such case depend entirely on your exports, as they would depend on the means you had to pay for them. We could not, therefore, export from those countries more than they received from us, because we would not possess the means to pay for such overplus. This leaves the estimate precisely as already stated, and confines the amount of commerce you could pursue to the sum before stated, of about seven and a half millions, out of one hundred and eight and one-third millions of dollars, the amount of your lawful commerce. And this paltry, inconsiderable portion of your trade, which would be entirely confined to a few particular States of the Union, you are seriously called upon to pursue, at the expense of, and to accept as the price for, national degradation and dishonor; and it has also been used as the stalking-horse to divert the public mind (which would always decide correctly, if properly informed) from the real situation in which their commerce was placed by the conduct of the belligerent Powers. And we are now told, because we did not sell our honor, our independence, our birth-right, for this petty morsel of (commercial) bread, we have brought the nation to the verge of ruin.

But some gentlemen have said, there are countries which have not passed any orders or decrees violating your lawful commerce, you ought to force a trade with them, notwithstanding you are prohibited from going to them by edicts of the belligerents. This is the only other proposition suggested of opening a trade, and, at first view, possesses some plausibility. The objections to this course, however, are insurmountable. It is not pretended such trade could be pursued without arming. If you arm your merchant vessels, with authority to capture, it is immediate war with the belligerents. If you arm them only for defence, you expose them to almost certain destruction, without the chance to reimburse the loss by retaliating on their enemies. For they would not generally be attacked except by vessels of superior force, to which their resistance would be ineffectual—and they would not be authorized to attack in their turn, and by way of retaliation, vessels of inferior force. This would, therefore, lead directly to a war of depredation on your commerce, in which it would be exposed to inevitable ruin, and in which your merchants would certainly have everything to lose and nothing to gain.

But suppose you were to pursue this trade in opposition to those insuperable objections, its amount would be so inconsiderable as to afford the country no sensible relief; it would not claim the public attention, and could in no point of view be considered as any compensation for the hazard you would incur of a ruinous and predatory war. I have made another brief statement from authentic sources, to show the value of this trade to the respective countries, that had not, on the 22d December, 1807, passed edicts violating our commerce. This statement relates to the exports of the year ending the 30th September, 1807.

These are all the countries which, at the time the embargo was laid, had not passed orders or decrees violating your lawful commerce, and with which you had carried on any trade. Hamburg and Germany are not mentioned, being in possession of France. The whole amount of the commerce that could be carried on with those countries, therefore, is as stated less than two millions and a half of dollars. For it must be confined to the exports of your own produce. I know there has been exported to the same countries, of foreign produce, during the same period, about $3,361,917. But this amount cannot be taken into the calculation, for the reason already given relative to the former statement, that we could not obtain the foreign goods which used to supply this branch of trade. It is also to be remarked here that our imports would be governed by our exports, and would exceed them for want of means to pay for the surplus. But some gentlemen have lately said you can now go on the same terms to Spain and her colonies. There is no sufficient ground to believe that the ports of Spain are open to us; so far as she is controlled by France, her former decrees are still in force, and so far as she is governed by the new Order that has lately arisen there, the Juntas, we have no assurance whatever from them on the subject; and what is still more important, our vessels sequestered in their ports have not yet been released. But suppose you could now go to Spain and her countries, your exports to them in domestic produce are short of four millions of dollars; so that the whole trade you could pursue even at this time on the most extended plan proposed; and at the hazard of fighting the navy and privateers of Great Britain, as well as those of France, would be less than six and a half millions of dollars; which certainly would not, even if we were to be guided by mercenary views—which I hope will never control the councils of this nation, when its best interests and rights are at stake—be any adequate object for national humility and disgrace, or even for the danger to which you would expose your commerce, of becoming a sure and easy prey to the cruisers of both those Powers.

But it is difficult to comprehend what precise object gentlemen have in view, on the subject of arming for defence. No specific proposition has been brought forward for arming your merchant vessels, that designated what gentlemen meant by the term, or what authority they contemplated giving them. To send out your commerce without arming, would be submission of the meanest and most humble kind. If you permit them to arm, what is the consequence? If they are authorized to capture vessels belonging to the belligerents, this is war at once, and ought to be understood; and if gentlemen are serious in the determination to go to war, let them say so, and we may probably join them. But if you do not authorize your merchantmen to capture, you send out your commerce to become a prey to both Great Britain and France, you expose your merchants to be plundered without a chance to retaliate. This would result in the destruction of your commerce, and would be almost as degrading to the nation as unconditional submission.

I have presented those statements which I have made, in relation to the amount of commerce that could be enjoyed according to any plan suggested, and the probable result of pursuing any such commerce, not so much with the expectation of being able to give the House much new information, as with the view to correct misrepresentations which have been made on this floor, and have gone abroad on this subject. I shall compress the additional remarks I have to make within as narrow a compass as may be in my power. It was observed in regard to the embargo, that it has been approved of by France, and not complained of by Great Britain. This is a question which I feel no disposition to examine in this place. Whether this assertion be correct or not, I should presume could not affect the decision of the question before you. If it be correct, however, if those Powers are satisfied with the embargo, it proves beyond a doubt that those who announced it as a war measure last year were totally mistaken, and that all their objections to it on that ground (and that was the principal ground on which it was then opposed) were altogether unfounded; this it would seem might silence them on this subject. But it may be proper to observe that those Powers have no right to object to it, however hard it may press upon them. It is a municipal regulation, a measure we have an undoubted right to adopt, without being considered just cause of complaint to any foreign nation. But, sir, so far as regards the fact as stated, I am not disposed to believe it; there is no substantial proof to support it. The best information shows the embargo has made a very serious impression on the people of Great Britain, and has had a powerful effect there, though it may not have produced the desired result. Facts speak a stronger language than anything in official letters from Secretaries, or announced in newspapers. The insurrections of the starving mechanics, the high price of provisions, the alarms throughout that whole country on account of apprehended famine, are strong proofs of the operation of the embargo. But if it did not produce the effects in that country which might have been expected, we cannot be responsible for that. We are not accountable for the conduct of foreign nations; and the circumstance of their not feeling a measure as strongly as might have been expected, is no sufficient reason why we should not persevere in it, if it is a wise and proper measure, productive of good effects at home. It has certainly saved our property, and hitherto kept us free from the calamities of war. If it has not, however, produced all the good effects that were expected, there are many strong reasons which can be assigned for it, that could not have been foreseen and were not within the control of those who passed it; among these may be mentioned the numerous evasions of it in certain parts of the Union, which were shamefully countenanced by many whose standing in society gave just grounds to expect from them a different line of conduct. By these means the measure was deprived of much of its coercive efficacy; many of the most corrupt and profligate characters enriched themselves at the expense of the honest part of society, and at the same time to the great benefit of the enemies of their country. In saying this I do not mean to apply the remark to any general section of the country, but to the individuals concerned in the violations of the law, and those who encouraged or countenanced them; their conduct will stain their characters and names with reproach for ages to come. It is a kind of treason against the State, of the most insidious and dangerous kind; like murder produced by poison, it corrodes the vitals of the body politic in so secret a manner that the perpetrator most generally evades the punishment his crime so justly deserves. Such characters, and those who countenance them, ought to be detected if possible, and severely punished; they ought to be marked as enemies to their country; in particular they ought to be distinguished as enemies to the commercial interest of the nation; having, at the expense of the honest merchant, aided those who have endeavored to extinguish the vital principles of your commerce. They have robbed their own country to befriend and support its enemies; and so in effect do all those who at this awful crisis oppose and revile their own Government, and justify or excuse the aggressions of foreign Powers. But let them remember the day of retribution is probably near at hand, when they may have to account for their conduct in a summary way; when they must determine to which side they belong, to America or Great Britain; when they must take their stand in the ranks of their own country or declare for its enemies. The time must soon arrive when this distinction will be made, and then, I trust, it will appear who are the real friends of their country, and who are rotten-hearted foreigners.

Other circumstances contributed, no doubt, very much to prevent the embargo from producing that effect on foreign nations which might have been expected; of these may be noticed the numerous misrepresentations that were industriously disseminated abroad in regard both to the pressure of it on the people here, and to their disposition to submit to and support the measure. Its pressure was exaggerated, and painted in the most extravagant colors, without regard to truth; the spirit of the people was misrepresented, as being in general hostile to the law, and disposed to resist its execution; when, in fact, the discontents were confined to a very small section of the Union, and excited there by the leaders of a small faction, many of whom are evidently the agents or warmest friends of Great Britain, and all of whom are the bitter enemies of their own Government, and have for years opposed every measure calculated to promote the interest of this country. Your public prints teemed with falsehoods, and misstatements on this subject; insurrections were announced in some quarters of the Union as likely to take place, and dreadful distress stated to prevail everywhere. These groundless misrepresentations, circulated for party purposes alone, went abroad, and had, no doubt, considerable influence on the conduct of foreign nations; they gave credit to them, and were induced to believe that the people of this country would not endure a continuance of the embargo; that they would soon force the Government to repeal it. Those Powers, encouraged by such publications, determined, notwithstanding they were sorely pressed by the embargo, to persevere in their aggressions, under the hope that we would not long continue this measure, and that we would ultimately submit to their terms. To this shameful conduct of a portion of your own people, sir, this country owes, in a great degree, the continuance of its present difficulties, and the inefficacy of the embargo. The great outcry made with regard to the distress and pressure produced by this measure at home, is in a considerable degree unfounded; your people do not suffer in any part of the Union for want of the necessities of life; they have a superabundance of them; there is no such thing as suffering for want known in this country; there is only a temporary pause in the rapid acquisition of wealth; a cessation of profits only. I do not mean to be understood to say that the American people do not feel the embargo; I know they do feel it sensibly; and they must have expected to feel any measure that would be likely to press hard on those who violate their rights. But the great difference between its effects on us, and on them, is this: among our people it occasions a superabundance of all the necessities of life, and the only ground of complaint is, the want of a market for the surplus; while their people suffer and complain aloud for want of enough of the necessities of life, essential for their subsistence, and which they cannot obtain from any other quarter. No one will hesitate on deciding whose situation is most eligible, and least to be complained of, that of those who have too much, or of those who have not enough to subsist upon. Another reason may also be assigned, why we could not anticipate the precise effect of the embargo on foreign Powers; we could not foresee that the Governments of those Powers would not regard the distress and sufferings of their people; that France would suffer her West India colonies to be almost desolated with famine, and to be compelled to apply to their inveterate enemy, to save them from actual starvation rather than revoke her decrees; nor could we know that the Government of Great Britain would be regardless of the complaints and representations of her manufacturers, and a respectable portion of her merchants; that it would lend a deaf ear to the hungry cries of the starving mechanics, and silence their just and loud complaints with the thunder of their murdering guns, and quench their hunger with a shower of balls instead of bread. We cannot be culpable for not anticipating such events.

It has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) that the people of New England will descend upon the ocean; that they will not bear this measure. If this be intended as a threat; if the gentleman meant that the people of New England are determined to resist the laws of the Union, let him say so; let us know it, and we will act accordingly. [Mr. QUINCY said, he did not mean or think that they would resist the laws.] Mr. CAMPBELL continued: I am happy to hear the gentleman explain his expressions in the manner he has done; it will render unnecessary some remarks I intended to make on that point. I hope, sir, these people will not oppose the laws of their country. I feel a confidence that the genius of liberty has not deserted New England, and that a large majority of the people there would rally round the standard of their Government when the occasion required it. From the best information I have been able to obtain, the people of one of those States, (I mean Connecticut,) which has generally differed in political sentiments from the present Administration, still retain the spirit of independence, and a sense of the value of their Constitution and civil liberties, and would be among the first to put down any open opposition to the laws; to crush in embryo the demon of insurrection. This, sir, I hope is true; it breathes the surviving of the spirit of seventy-six; it is highly honorable to those people; it proves them to be honest in their sentiments and good citizens. While the laws passed by a Constitutional majority are in force, they will support them; still they may justly claim the right, if they do not think them wholesome, to disapprove of them, and use all Constitutional means to procure their repeal. I would, sir, still indulge a strong hope that a large majority of the people of the very State from which the gentleman (Mr. QUINCY) comes, would, when called upon, support the laws of their country, and punish the lawless wretches who dare openly set up the standard of opposition. If gentlemen acknowledge that this is the case, I trust we shall not again hear the language of menace on this floor. On this subject I concur perfectly in sentiment with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that if any portion of the people oppose a public law, they must be reduced to submission, and I would be among the first to compel obedience to it; and I would, also, as stated by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NELSON,) if the disease required bleeding, use the lancet, and that promptly too. Yes, sir, whoever would attempt to raise the standard of insurrection, should be made a public example of, as the enemy to independence and civil liberty; as the agent or tool of a foreign Power.

It has been repeatedly said, the people of New England will not bear this measure; that there will be a separation of the States. Such sentiments cannot be entertained or countenanced by any true American—by any friend to his country. They may be cherished by the agents and tools of Great Britain; by the enemies of our Constitution and independence, and by them alone. A separation of this Union, sir, can never be contemplated or countenanced by any portion of the people, even of New England, who are real Americans. Such a disposition can only exist among a few unprincipled and restless spirits, who, regardless of the general good, wish to become the petty tyrants of the people in that quarter, to lord it over them, make them groan under heavy taxes, and finally strip them of their liberty and independence; and, probably, to render their object more certain, would throw themselves under the fostering care of Great Britain, and become openly, what they now are secretly, her very minions and humble tools.

To enable them to effect this object, they may endeavor, under false pretences, to spirit up the people there to a severance of the Union, in order to withdraw them from the protection of the General Government and Constitution, which guarantees to every State a republican form of government, and is to the people their strong shield against tyranny and oppression. . . To this group, however, this little insignificant group alone, must be confined any intention or disposition whatever to oppose the laws or sever the Union. The great body of the real Americans of New England, who descended from the illustrious heroes of 1776, and who hold dear the liberty and independence for which their fathers fought and bled, will not endeavor to stab the very vitals of their own country; they will not enlist under foreign banners; they will not, in the day of danger, be arrayed against their country; they will be found in the ranks, who dare to fight and shed their best blood for their country. But if the people of that quarter were to consider this proposition of a separation from the Union correctly, even in a pecuniary point of view, and as regards their own interest alone, they must reject it without hesitation. A great proportion, at least four-fifths, of the shipping of New England, find employment in carrying to market the produce of the Middle, Southern, and Western States. The whole produce of their own soil does not exceed in value seven or eight millions of dollars, out of forty-eight millions exported by the United States, while the single article of cotton, in the Southern and Western States, exceeds in value fourteen millions of dollars. They are, therefore, the mere carriers for the Middle and Southern States. Cut off their connexion and commerce with them, and where would they find employment for their immense tonnage of which they so much boast? What would become of it? Where would they get employment for their seamen? Their ships would rot at their wharves, or float empty upon the ocean; they could not furnish them with cargoes, and their boasted commerce would soon dwindle away into a mere trifle compared with its present flourishing condition. Have gentlemen who make these insinuations about a separation of New England from the Union, seriously considered the subject in these points of view, and fairly weighed the consequences? If they have not, it is high time they should. These remarks are made to show that New England cannot possibly have any interest in such a measure; that, on the contrary, it would be ruinous to the best interests of the people, and cannot, therefore, unless they are totally deluded, be countenanced by them.

It is with some reluctance I come to notice some remarks made by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) with respect to the report under consideration; that abstract legislation generally proceeds from ignorance, or wickedness, or—[Mr. QUINCY requested to explain; he said his remarks were intended to apply to the doctrines recommended, and not to the style of the report or the committee who made it.] Mr. C. proceeded—I shall, sir, generally be willing to take gentlemen's explanations of the meaning of what they have said. I had intended to make some observations in answer to the remarks of the gentleman on this point, as I understood them, as relating to the report; but, as it is now stated, they were not intended to apply to the committee or the report itself, I shall omit those remarks and say nothing on that point. The gentleman, however, in another place, observed, that the principles contained in the report were loathsome. I do not, sir, profess to comprehend his meaning very distinctly when he applies the term loathsome to the principles of the report. A principle may be incorrect, or improper, to be supported, but how it can be loathsome, is not very obvious. [Mr. QUINCY said he had alluded to the course, not the principles.] I will take the gentleman's explanation, said (Mr. CAMPBELL,) though I took his words down as I have stated them; the course proposed is loathsome; this amounts to the same thing; the course proposed is founded on the principles assumed, and the facts stated in the report, and consists of the resolutions annexed thereto. How these can be called loathsome, is rather difficult to comprehend. But it seems there was a loathing produced; perhaps the appetite was vicious, and not the food presented impure or unwholesome; or, are we to understand that the resolution before you, which has been called weak, and so self-evident as not to admit of a doubt, has become so strong as to operate on the gentleman's delicate political stomach as an emetic, and occasion the discharge of that envenomed gall of rancorous enmity to the Government, which seems to exist in such abundance, and which is so liberally bestowed on most occasions by that gentleman and others? Should this be the case, the result may be a favorable one, and less of these bitter invectives may be expected for the future than has been usual. But those kinds of objections to the report must arise from one of two causes; either from defects in the report itself, or from a bluntness of mental optics in those who make the objections, if indeed they are sincere. The report, however, is now before the public, and they will decide, and no doubt correctly, to which of these causes we ought to ascribe all the unqualified censures we have heard against it. I shall willingly acquiesce in their decision. It may not be improper here to remark, that notwithstanding the hard names by which the gentleman has called the principles of this report, he has not ventured to deny the correctness of one of them; he has not denied the aggressions therein stated to have been committed on our rights by the belligerents, nor has he attempted to show that there is any other course which we could pursue, better calculated to resist those aggressions than that presented in the report. This renders it unnecessary for me, at this time, to enter into a further investigation of this part of the subject. When gentlemen specify their objections to the course we propose, or present us with their project, we shall endeavor to answer the one and examine the other.

Gentlemen appear so anxious and determined to produce, if possible, a conviction among the people, that they are oppressed by the embargo; that no matter what question is before the House, their constant theme is the pressure of the embargo, the distress it produces, and the ruin it will bring on the country. This mournful tale is repeated on every occasion, and painted in the highest and most extravagant colors. One gentleman, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) at the close of one of those exaggerated representations, inquires what he shall do with his third crop of tobacco? The answer to this will equally apply to many other inquiries of a similar nature, made during this discussion. What would he do with it if the embargo was at this moment removed? You could not send it to the Continent, because you are prohibited by the British Orders in Council. If you should even submit to Great Britain, and, at the expense of national disgrace, send your tobacco there, she consumes less than 10,000 hogsheads of it out of about 80,000, which is annually exported, and the price that could be obtained for that portion at a market so glutted, would not pay the freight. What, then, would you do with it, supposing the embargo was off? The same you do now; keep it in your warehouses until there is a market open for it. The gentleman intimated you might carry it to Sweden, and find a market for it at Gottenburg, and that it would find its way from thence to the Continent; on what ground this last assertion is made, I cannot comprehend. It is well known that Sweden is at war with Russia, and it may be said with all the Powers on the Continent; that she has no communications with them, and that all their ports are shut against her. Produce of any kind could not, therefore, find its way to the continent of Europe through her ports; and she herself consumes but a very small quantity of tobacco. Taking off the embargo, therefore, would not furnish a market for this article; until the Orders of Council are revoked, you can have no market for tobacco.

But another ground has been taken and much relied upon, that the Treasury is drained by the operation of the embargo, and the sources of your revenue dried up. This argument, like most others which have been made against this measure, rests entirely upon ascribing effects to the wrong cause. They ascribe to the embargo what is really produced by the orders and decrees of the belligerents; and all that has been already said to show that those orders and decrees, and not the embargo, destroyed your commerce, will apply in this case, and show that they, in fact, and not the embargo, drained your Treasury, and dried up the sources of your revenue. For it is certain, that so long as your revenue depends upon your commerce, whatever destroys your commerce, of course, cuts up your revenue. It has already been shown, that if your commerce went upon the ocean, it would be captured; and it surely cannot be pretended that the capture of your vessels and property by Great Britain would increase the receipts in your Treasury, or open for you new sources of revenue. It must be much better to have your Treasury empty and your property at home, than to be deprived of the latter and have the former drained; nor can it be pretended that, for the sake of a commerce worth only three, or even six, millions of dollars, you ought to surrender your best rights, or hazard the calamities of a predatory war on your own merchants. The revenue to be raised from such a commerce would be inconsiderable, and I trust that, on a question involving the independence of our country, we shall not be governed by mercenary views alone, or by the effect it may have on our finances. If the only inquiry was, how we should replenish the Treasury, the case would be different; the effect of measures on the Treasury ought to be the principal point to be ascertained. But at such a crisis as the present, the questions of maintaining your independence and increasing your revenue, ought to be kept separate and distinct. You ought to protect and preserve unimpaired the rights of your people, whatever the effect on the Treasury might be. So long as the people have their property and rights secure, and are independent, you are safe; a rich people and an empty treasury, is much better than a poor people and an overflowing treasury. They will always support their Government so long as it acts correctly. Should direct taxes become necessary, they will cheerfully pay them, because they would be on their own account and for their own interest—though there is no ground to believe that such will be the case; and it is chimerical, it is a mere slander upon the good sense of the people, to suppose that such a measure would either produce a separation of the Union, or lead to a consolidation of the State authorities into the General Government. There can be no pretext for such alarms. But, sir, the Treasury is at this time more abundantly filled than it has been at any former period, and there are reasonable grounds to expect we shall be able to replenish it before it is entirely exhausted. But surely the nerves of gentlemen must be of a very delicate texture when they tremble so much for the fate of the nation, because our revenue may not have been as productive the present year as it was the last. There can be no good ground for such extraordinary palpitations on this subject. The American people will always furnish the means to maintain their rights and support their Government, if those means are properly applied.

I shall close the remarks I have to make at present on this subject, by calling on those gentlemen who oppose the present course, to give us the plan they wish to pursue, and let us know the grounds upon which they act. Do they deny the aggressions stated to have been committed on our commerce and neutral rights by the belligerents? If they do, let them inform us which of those Powers they consider justifiable in her conduct. If, on the contrary, they do not; if they admit those aggressions were committed on our rights, are they willing to resist them? Are they determined to vindicate the rights and independence of their country? If they are we wish to know in what manner. If they are not willing to pursue the measures of resistance we propose, of a total interdiction of intercourse with those Powers, will they assume a higher ground? Will they prefer war? If they do, this is one of the alternatives presented in the report. We wish to know what measures they are willing to adopt for the safety of the nation. The crisis is awful. The time has come to unite the people of America; we join issue with the gentlemen as to temporizing policy; we are for decisive measures; we have not, we will not, now temporize. We say there is no middle course. We are, in the first place, for cutting off all intercourse with those Powers who trample upon our rights. If that will not prove effectual, we say take the last alternative, war, with all its calamities, rather than submission, or national degradation. This is the time for every man to take his stand in the ranks on one side or the other. There can no longer be but two denominations of characters in this country—friends and foes. Dangers thicken around, and threaten us from abroad; it is therefore high time for domestic differences to cease. The period has arrived at which every man in the nation must be called upon to rally round the standard of American freedom; when he must declare whether he will be for his country, or against his country; whether he will be an American or a traitor!

When Mr. CAMPBELL had concluded, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 7.

Mr. SAY presented memorials from sundry late officers in the Pennsylvania line of the Revolutionary army, stating that, from the peculiar circumstances of the memorialists, they have been compelled to dispose of the certificates of pay and commutation granted them for military services rendered to the United States; and praying such relief in the premises as to the wisdom and justice of Congress shall seem meet.

Mr. WHARTON presented a petition from sundry late officers of the Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina lines of the said Revolutionary army, to the like effect.

The said memorials and petition were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DURELL moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That it be the duty of the Clerk of this House to furnish the Representatives in Congress from each State in the Union, for the time being, and the Delegates from each of the Territories thereof, with one copy of every public document, including the laws and journals printed by order of the House, to be by them transmitted to the principal seminary of learning in each State and Territory, respectively.

The resolution was read, and, on motion of Mr. BACON, ordered to lie on the table.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the first member of the first resolution reported on Thursday last, from the Committee of the Whole, which was depending yesterday at the time of adjournment, in the words following, to wit:

“Resolved, That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain.”

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL concluded his observations of yesterday, as given entire in preceding pages.

Mr. QUINCY.—Mr. Speaker, I offer myself to the view of this House with very sensible embarrassment, in attempting to follow the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. CAMPBELL)—a gentleman who holds so distinguished a station on this floor, through thy blessing, Mr. Speaker, on his talents and industry. I place myself with much reluctance in competition with this, our great political Æneas, an illustrious leader of antiquity, whom, in his present relations, and in his present objects, the gentleman from Tennessee not a little resembles; since, in order to evade the ruin impending over our cities—taking my honorable colleague (Mr. BACON) by one hand, and the honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MONTGOMERY by the other, (little Iulus and wife Creusa)—he is posting away into the woods with Father Anchises and all the household gods.

When I had the honor of addressing this House a few days ago, I touched this famous report of our Committee of Foreign Relations perhaps a little too carelessly; perhaps I handled it a little too roughly, considering its tender age, and the manifest delicacy of its constitution. But, sir, I had no idea of affecting very exquisitely the sensibilities of any gentleman. I thought that this was a common report of one of our ordinary committees, which I had a right to canvass or to slight, to applaud or to censure, without raising any extraordinary concern, either here or elsewhere. But, from the general excitement which my inconsiderate treatment of this subject occasions, I fear that I have been mistaken. This can be no mortal fabric, Mr. Speaker. This must be that image which fell down from Jupiter, present or future. Surely, nothing but a being of celestial origin would raise such a tumult in minds tempered like those which lead the destinies of this House. Sir, I thought that this report had been a common piece of wood—inutile lignum—just such a piece of wood as any day-laborer might have hewed out in an hour, had he health and a hatchet. But it seems that our honorable chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, maudit esse Deum. Well, sir, I have no objections. If the workmen will, a god it shall be. I only wish, that when gentlemen bring their sacred things upon this floor, that they would blow a trumpet before them, as the heathens do, on such occasions, to the end that all true believers may prepare themselves to adore and tremble, and that all unbelievers may turn aside, and not disturb their devotions.

I assure gentlemen that I meant to commit no sacrilege. I had no intention, sir, of canvassing very strictly this report. I supposed, that when it had been published and circulated, it had answered all the purposes of its authors, and I felt no disposition to interfere with them. But the House is my witness that I am compelled, by the clamor raised on all sides by the friends of the Administration, to descend to particulars, and to examine it somewhat minutely.

My honorable colleague (Mr. BACON) was pleased the other day to assert:—Sir, in referring to his observations, on a former occasion, I beg the House not to imagine that I am about to follow him. No, sir; I will neither follow nor imitate him. I hang upon no man's skirts; I run barking at no man's heel. I canvass principles and measures solely with a view to the great interests of my country. The idea of personal victory is lost in the total absorption of sense and mind in the impending consequences.—I say he was pleased to assert that I had dealt in general allegations against this report, without pointing out any particular objection. And the honorable chairman (Mr. CAMPBELL) has reiterated the charge. Both have treated this alleged omission with no little asperity. Yet, sir, it is very remarkable, that, so far from dealing in general allegations, I explicitly stated my objections. The alternatives presented by the report—war or suspension of our rights, and the recommendation of the latter, rather than take the risk of the former, I expressly censured. I went further. I compared these alternatives with an extract from an address made by the first Continental Congress to the inhabitants of Great Britain, and attempted to show, by way of contrast, what I thought the disgraceful spirit of the report. Yet, these gentlemen complain that I dealt in general allegations. Before I close, sir, they will have, I hope, no reason to repeat such objections. I trust I shall be particular, to their content.

Before entering upon an examination of this report, it may be useful to recollect how it originated. By the third section of the second article of the Constitution, it is declared that the President of the United States "shall, from time to time, give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." It is, then, the duty of the President to recommend such measures as in his judgment Congress ought to adopt. A great crisis is impending over our country. It is a time of alarm and peril and distress. How has the President performed this Constitutional duty? Why, after recapitulating, in a formal Message, our dangers and his trials, he expresses his confidence that we shall, "with an unerring regard to the essential rights and interests of the nation, weigh and compare the painful alternatives, out of which a choice is to be made," and that "the alternative chosen will be maintained with fortitude and patriotism." In this way our Chief Magistrate performs his duty. A storm is approaching; the captain calls his choice hands upon deck; leaves the rudder swinging, and sets the crew to scuffle about alternatives! This Message, pregnant with nondescript alternatives, is received by this House. And what do we? Why, constitute a great Committee of Foreign Relations, and, lest they should not have their attention completely occupied by the pressing exigencies of those with France and Great Britain, they are endowed with the whole mass—British, Spanish, and French; Barbary Powers and Indian neighbors. And what does this committee do? Why, after seven days' solemn conclave, they present to this House an illustrious report, loaded with alternatives—nothing but alternatives. The cold meat of the Palace is hashed and served up to us, piping hot, from our committee room.

In considering this report, I shall pay no attention to either its beginning or its conclusion. The former consists of shavings from old documents, and the latter of birdlime for new converts. The twelfth page is the heart of this report; that I mean to canvass. And I do assert, that there is not one of all the principal positions contained in it which is true, in the sense and to the extent assumed by the committee. Let us examine each, separately:

"Your committee can perceive no other alternative but abject and degrading submission, war with both nations, or a continuance and enforcement of the present suspension of our commerce."

Here is a tri-forked alternative. Let us consider each branch, and see if either be true, in the sense assumed by the committee. The first—"abject and degrading submission"—takes two things for granted: that trading, pending the edicts of France and Great Britain, is submission; and next that it is submission, in its nature, abject and degrading. Neither is true. It is not submission to trade, pending those edicts, because they do not command you to trade; they command you not to trade. When you refuse to trade, you submit; not when you carry on that trade, as far as you can, which they prohibit. Again, it is not true that such trading is abject and disgraceful, and that, too, upon the principles avowed by the advocates of this report. Trading, while these edicts are suspended over our commerce, is submission, say they, because we have not physical force to resist the power of these belligerents; of course, if we trade, we must submit to these restrictions, not having power to evade or break through them. Now, admit, for the sake of argument, (what however in fact I deny,) that the belligerents have the power to carry into effect their decrees so perfectly; that, by reason of the orders of Great Britain, we are physically disabled from going to France; and that, by the edicts of France, we are in like manner disabled from going to Great Britain. If such be our case, in relation to these Powers, the question is, whether submitting to exercise all the trade which remains to us, notwithstanding these edicts, is "abject and degrading."

In the first place, I observe, that submission is not, to beings constituted as we are, always "abject and degrading." We submit to the decrees of Providence—to the laws of our nature. Absolute weakness submits to absolute power; and there is nothing in such submission shameful or degrading. It is no dishonor for finite not to contend with infinite. There is no loss of reputation, if creatures, such as men, perform not impossibilities. If then it be true, in the sense asserted by some of the advocates of this report, that it is physically impossible for us to trade with France and Great Britain and their dependencies, by reason of these edicts, still there is nothing "abject or degrading" in carrying on such trade as these edicts leave open to us, let it be never so small or so trifling; which, however, it might be easily shown, as it has been, that it is neither the one nor the other. Sir, in this point of view, it is no more disgraceful for us to trade to Sweden, to China, to the Northwest coast, or to Spain and her dependencies—not one of which countries is now included in those edicts—than it is disgraceful for us to walk, because we are unable to fly; no more than it is shameful for man to use and enjoy the surface of this globe, because he has not at his command the whole circle of nature, and cannot range at will over all the glorious spheres which constitute the universe.

The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. CAMPBELL) called upon us just now to tell him what was disgraceful submission, if carrying on commerce under these restrictions was not such submission. I will tell that gentleman. That submission is "abject and disgraceful" which yields to the decrees of frail and feeble power, as though they were irresistible; which takes counsel of fear, and weighs not our comparative force; which abandons the whole, at a summons to deliver up a part; which makes the will of others the measure of rights, which God and nature not only have constituted eternal and unalienable, but have also endued us with ample means to maintain.

My argument on this clause of the report of the committee may be presented in this form: either the United States have or they have not physical ability to carry on commerce in defiance of the edicts of both or of either of these nations. If we have not physical ability to carry on the trade which they prohibit, then it is no disgrace to exercise that commerce which these irresistible decrees permit. If we have such physical ability, then, to the degree in which we abandon that commerce which we have power to carry on, is our submission, "abject and disgraceful." It is yielding without a struggle; it is sacrificing our rights, not because we have not force, but because we have not spirit to maintain them. It is in this point of view that I am disgusted with this report. It abjures what it recommends; it declaims, in heroics, against submission, and proposes, in creeping prose, a tame and servile subserviency.

It cannot be concealed, let gentlemen try as much as they will, that we can trade, not only with one, but with both these belligerents, notwithstanding these restrictive decrees. The risk to Great Britain against French capture scarcely amounts to two per cent.; that to France against Great Britain is unquestionably much greater. But, what is that to us? It is not our fault, if the power of Britain on the ocean is superior to that of Bonaparte. It is equal and exact justice between both nations for us to trade with both, as far as it is in our power. Great as the power of Britain is on the ocean, the enterprise and intrepidity of our merchants are more than a match for it. They will get your products to the Continent in spite of her navy. But, suppose they do not; suppose they fail, and are captured in the attempt; what is that to us? After we have given them full notice of all their dangers, and perfect warning, either of our inability or of our determination not to protect them, if they take the risk, it is at their peril. And, upon whom does the loss fall? As it does now, through the operation of your embargo, on the planter, on the farmer, on the mechanic, on the day-laborer? No, sir; on the insurer—on the capitalist—on those who, in the full exercise of their intelligence, apprized of all the circumstances, are willing to take the hazard for the sake of the profit.

I will illustrate my general idea by a supposition. There are two avenues to the ocean from the harbor of New York—by the Narrows, and through Long Island Sound. Suppose the fleets, both of France and Great Britain, should block up the Narrows, so that to pass them would be physically impossible, in the relative state of our naval force. Will gentlemen seriously contend that there would be anything "abject or disgraceful," if the people of New York should submit to carry on their trade through the Sound? Would the remedy for this interference with our rights be abandoning the ocean altogether? Again; suppose, that instead of both nations blockading the same point, each should station its force at a different one—France at the mouth of the Sound, Britain at the Narrows. In such case, would staying at home, and refusing any more to go upon the sea, be an exercise of independence in the citizens of New York? Great philosophers may call it "dignified retirement," if they will. I call it, and I am mistaken if the people would not call it, "base and abject submission." Sir, what in such a case would be true honor? Why, to consider well which adversary is the weakest, and cut our way to our rights through the path which he obstructs. Having removed the smaller impediment, we should return with courage, strengthened by trial and animated by success, to the relief of our rights, from the pressure of the strongest assailant. But, all this is war; and war is never to be incurred. If this be the national principle, avow it; tell your merchants you will not protect them; but, for Heaven's sake, do not deny them the power of relieving their own and the nation's burdens, by the exercise of their own ingenuity. Sir, impassable as the barriers offered by these edicts are in the estimation of members on this floor, the merchants abroad do not estimate them as insurmountable. Their anxiety to risk their property, in defiance of them, is full evidence of this. The great danger to mercantile ingenuity is internal envy—the corrosion of weakness or prejudice. Its external hazard is ever infinitely smaller. That practical intelligence which this class of men possesses, beyond any other in the community, excited by self-interest—the strongest of human passions—is too elastic to be confined by the limits of exterior human powers, however great or uncommon. Build a Chinese wall, and the wit of your merchants, if permitted freely to operate, will break through it, or overleap it, or undercreep it.

"Effugiet tamen, hæc sceleratus vincula Proteus.

The second branch of the alternatives under consideration is equally deceptive—"War with both nations." Can this ever be an alternative? Did you ever read in history, can you conceive in fancy, a war with two nations, each of whom is at war with the other, without an union with one against the other immediately resulting? It cannot exist in nature. The very idea is absurd. It never can be an alternative, whether we shall fight two nations each hostile to the other. But it may be, and if we are to fight at all, it is a very serious question, which of the two we are to select as an adversary. As to the third branch of these celebrated alternatives, "a continuance and enforcement of the present system of commerce," I need not spend time to show that this does not include all the alternatives which exist under this head—since the committee immediately admit, that there does exist another alternative, "partial repeal," about which they proceed to reason.

The report proceeds. "The first" (abject and degrading submission) "cannot require any discussion." Certainly not. Submission of that quality which the committee assume, and with the epithets of which they choose to invest it, can never require discussion at any time. But, whether trading under these orders and decrees, be such submission, whether we are not competent to resist them in part, if not in whole, without a total abandonment of the exercise of all our maritime rights, the comparative effects of the edicts of each upon our commerce, and the means we possess to influence or control either, are all fair and proper subjects of discussion; some of which the committee have wholly neglected and none of which have they examined, as the House had a right to expect.

The committee proceed "to dissipate the illusion" that there is any "middle course," and to reassert the position before examined, that "there is no other alternative than war with both nations, or a continuance of the present system." This position they undertake to support by two assertions. First, that "war with one of the belligerents only, would be submission to the edicts and will of the other." Second, that "repeal in whole or in part of the embargo, must necessarily be war or submission."

As to the first assertion, it is a miserable fallacy, confounding coincidence of interest with subjection of will; things in their nature palpably distinct. A man may do what another wills, nay, what he commands, and not act in submission to his will, or in obedience to his command. Our interest or duty may coincide with the line of conduct another presumes to prescribe. Shall we vindicate our independence at the expense of our social or moral obligations? I exemplify my idea in this way. Two bullies beset your door, from which there are but two avenues. One of them forbids you to go by the left, the other forbids you to go by the right avenue. Each is willing that you should pass by the way which he permits. In such case, what will you do? Will you keep house forever, rather than make choice of the path through which you will resume your external rights? You cannot go both ways at once, you must make your election. Yet, in making such election, you must necessarily coincide with the wishes and act according to the commands of one of the bullies. Yet who, before this committee, ever thought an election of one of two inevitable courses, made under such circumstances, "abject and degrading submission" to the will of either of the assailants? The second assertion, that "repeal in whole or in part of the embargo must necessarily be war or submission," the committee proceed to maintain by several subsidiary assertions. First—"a general repeal without arming would be submission to both nations." So far from this being true, the reverse is the fact; it would be submission to neither. Great Britain does not say, "you shall trade with me." France does not say "you shall trade with me." If this was the language of their edicts, there might be some color for the assertion of the committee, that if we trade with either we submit. The edicts of each declare you shall not trade with my adversary. Our servile knee-crooking embargo, says, "you shall, therefore, not trade." Can any submission be more palpable, more "abject, more disgraceful?" A general repeal without arming, would be only an exercise of our natural rights, under the protection of our mercantile ingenuity, and not under that of physical power. Whether our merchants shall arm or not, is a question of political expediency and of relative force. It may be very true that we can fight our way to neither country, and yet it may be also very true, that we may carry on a very important commerce with both. The strength of the national arm may not be equal to contend with either, and yet the wit of our merchants may be over-match for the edicts of all. The question of arming or not arming, has reference only to the mode in which we shall best enjoy our rights, and not at all to the quality of the act of trading during these edicts. To exercise commerce is our absolute right. If we arm, we may possibly extend the field beyond that which mere ingenuity would open to us. Whether the extension thus acquired be worthy of the risk and expense is a fair question. But, decide it either way, how is trading as far as we have ability, made less abject than not trading at all?

I come to the second subsidiary assertion. "A general repeal and arming of merchant vessels, would be war with both, and war of the worst kind, suffering the enemies to plunder us, without retaliation upon them."

I have before exposed the absurdity of a war with two belligerents, each hostile to the other. It cannot be true therefore, that "a general repeal and arming our merchant vessels," would be such a war. Neither if war resulted, would it be "war of the worst kind." In my humble apprehension, a war, in which our enemies are permitted to plunder us, and our merchants not permitted to defend their property, is somewhat worse than a war like this; in which, with arms in their hands, our brave seamen might sometimes prove too strong for their piratical assailants. By the whole amount of property, which we might be able to preserve, by these means, would such a war be better than that in which we are now engaged. For the committee assure us, that the aggressions, to which we are subject, "are to all intents and purposes a maritime war, waged with both nations against the United States."

The last assertion of the committee, in this most masterly page is, that "a partial repeal must, from the situation of Europe, necessarily, be actual submission to one of the aggressors, and war with the other." In the name of common sense, how can this be true? The trade to Sweden, to Spain; to China, is not now affected by the orders or decrees of either belligerent. How is it submission, then, to these orders for us to trade to Gottenburg, when neither France nor Britain command, nor prohibit it? Of what consequence is it to us, what way the Gottenburg merchant disposes of our products, after he has paid us our price? I am not about to deny that a trade to Gottenburg would defeat the purpose of coercing Great Britain, through the want of our supplies, but I reason on the report upon its avowed principles. If gentlemen adhere to their system, as a means of coercion, let the Administration avow it as such, and support the system, by arguments, such as their friends use every day on this floor. Let them avow, as those friends do, that this is our mode of hostility against Great Britain. That it is better than "ball and gunpowder." Let them show that the means are adequate to the end; let them exhibit to us, beyond the term of all this suffering, a happy salvation, and a glorious victory, and the people may then submit to it, even without murmur. But while the Administration support their system only as a municipal regulation, as a means of safety and preservation, those who canvass their principle are not called upon to contest with them on ground, which not only they do not take, but which, officially, they disavow. As partial repeal would not be submission to either, so, also, it would not be war with either. A trade to Sweden would not be war with Great Britain, that nation is her ally, and she permits it. Nor with France, though Sweden is her enemy, she does not prohibit it. Ah! but say the committee, "a measure which would supply exclusively one of the belligerents, would be war with the other." This is the State secret; this is the master-key to the whole policy. You must not only do what the letter of these orders prohibits, but you must not sin against the spirit of them. The great purpose is, to prevent your product from getting to our enemy, and to effect this you must not only so act as to obey the terms of the decrees, but keeping the great purpose of them always in sight, you must extend their construction to cases which they cannot, by any rule of reason, be made to include.

Sir, I have done with this report. I would not have submitted to the task of canvassing it, if gentlemen had not thrown the gauntlet with the air of sturdy defiance. I willingly leave to this House and the nation to decide whether the position I took in the commencement of my argument is not maintained; that there is not one of the principal positions contained in the 12th page, the heart of this report, which is true, in the sense and to the extent assumed by the committee.

It was under these general impressions that I used the word "loathsome," which has so often been repeated. Sir, it may not have been a well chosen word. It was that which happened to come to hand first. I meant to express my disgust at what appeared to me a mass of bold assumptions, and of illy cemented sophisms.

I said, also, that "the spirit which it breathed was disgraceful." Sir, I meant no reflection upon the committee. Honest men and wise men may mistake the character of the spirit, which they recommend, or by which they are actuated. When called upon to reason concerning that which, by adoption, is to become identified with the national character, I am bound to speak of it as it appears to my vision. I may be mistaken. Yet, I ask the question: is not the spirit which it breathes disgraceful? Is it not disgraceful to abandon the exercise of all our commercial rights, because our rivals interfere with a part; not only to refrain from exercising that trade which they prohibit, but for fear of giving offence, to decline that which they permit? Is it not disgraceful, after inflammatory recapitulation of insults, and plunderings, and burnings, and confiscations, and murders, and actual war made upon us, to talk of nothing but alternatives, of general declarations, of still longer suspension of our rights, and retreating farther out of "harm's way?" If this course be adopted by my country, I hope I am in error concerning its real character. But to my sense, this whole report is nothing else than a recommendation to us of the abandonment of our essential rights and apologies for doing it.

Before I sit down, I feel myself compelled to notice some observations which have been made in different quarters of this House on the remarks which, at an early stage of this debate, I had the honor of submitting to its consideration. My honorable colleague (Mr. BACON) was pleased to represent me as appealing to the people over the heads of the whole Government, against the authority of a law which had not only the sanction of all the legislative branches of the Government, but also of the Judiciary. Sir, I made no such appeal. I did not so much as threaten it. I admitted, expressly, the binding authority of the law. But I claim a right, which I ever will claim, and ever will exercise, to urge, on this floor, my opinion of the unconstitutionality of a law, and my reasons for that opinion, as a valid ground for its repeal. Sir, I will not only do this, I will do more. If a law be, in my apprehension, dangerous in its principles, ruinous in its consequences, above all, if it be unconstitutional, I will not fail in every fair and honorable way to awaken the people to a sense of their peril; and to quicken them, by the exercise of their Constitutional privileges, to vindicate themselves and their posterity from ruin.

My honorable colleague (Mr. BACON) was also pleased to refer to me, "as a man of divisions and distinctions, waging war with adverbs, and dealing in figures." Sir, I am sorry that my honorable colleague should stoop "from his pride of place," at such humble game as my poor style presents to him. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I cannot but confess that, "deeming high" of the station which I hold; standing, as it were, in the awful presence of an assembled people, I am more than ordinarily anxious, on all occasions, to select the best thoughts in my narrow storehouse, and to adapt to them the most appropriate dress in my intellectual wardrobe. I know not whether, on this account, I am justly obnoxious to the asperity of my honorable colleague. But, on the subject of figures, sir, this I know, and cannot refrain from assuring this House that, as on the one hand, I shall, to the extent of my humble talents, always be ambitious, and never cease striving to make a decent figure on this floor; so, on the other, I never can be ambitious, but, on the contrary, shall ever strive chiefly to avoid cutting a figure like my honorable colleague.

The gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. TROUP,) the other day, told this House that, if commerce were permitted, such was the state of our foreign relations, none but bankrupts would carry on trade. Sir, the honorable gentleman has not attained correct information in this particular. I do not believe that I state anything above the real fact, when I say that, on the day this Legislature assembled, one hundred vessels, at least, were lying in the different ports and harbors of New England loaded, riding at single anchor, ready and anxious for nothing so much as for your leave to depart. Certainly, this does not look much like any doubt that a field of advantageous commerce would open, if you would unbar the door to your citizens. That this was the case in Massachusetts I know. Before I left that part of the country, I had several applications from men, who stated that they had property in such situations, and soliciting me to give them the earliest information of your probable policy. The men so applying, I can assure the House, were not bankrupts; but intelligent merchants, shrewd to perceive their true interests; keen to pursue them. The same honorable gentleman was also pleased to speak of "a paltry trade in potash and codfish," and to refer to me as the Representative of men who raised "beef and pork, and butter and cheese, and potatoes and cabbages." Well, sir, I confess the fact. I am the Representative, in part, of men, the products of whose industry are beef and pork, and butter and cheese, and potatoes and cabbages. And let me tell that honorable gentleman, that I would not yield the honor of representing such men, to be the Representative of all the growers of cotton and rice, and tobacco and indigo, in the whole world. Sir, the men whom I represent, not only raise those humble articles, but they do it with the labor of their own hands, with the sweat of their own brows. And by this, their habitual mode of hardy industry, they acquire a vigor of nerve, a strength of muscle, and spirit of intelligence, somewhat characteristic. And let me say to that honorable gentleman, that the men of whom I speak will not, at his call, nor at the invitation of any man or set of men from his quarter of the Union, undertake to "drive one another into the ocean." But, on the contrary, whenever they once realize that their rights are invaded, they will unite, like a band of brothers, and drive their enemies there.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) speaking of the embargo, said, that this was the kind of conflict which our fathers waged; and my honorable colleague (Mr. BACON) made a poor attempt to confound this policy with the non-intercourse and non-importation agreement of 1774 and 1775. Sir, nothing can be more dissimilar. The non-intercourse and non-importation agreement of that period, so far from destroying commerce, fostered and encouraged it. The trade with Great Britain was indeed voluntarily obstructed, but the enterprise of our merchants found a new incentive in the commerce with all the other nations of the globe, which succeeded immediately on our escape from the monopoly of the mother country. Our navigation was never suspended. The field of commerce at that period, so far from being blasted by pestiferous regulations, was extended by the effect of the restrictions adopted.

But let us grant all that they assert. Admit, for the sake of argument, that the embargo, which restrains us now from communication with all the world, is precisely synonymous with that non-intercourse and non-importation which restrained us then from Great Britain. Suppose the war, which we now wage with that nation, is in every respect the same as that which our fathers waged with her in 1774 and 1775. Have we from the effects of their trial any lively hope of success in our present attempt? Did our fathers either effect a change in her injurious policy or prevent a war by non-intercourse? Sir, they did neither the one nor the other. Her policy was never changed until she had been beaten on our soil, in an eight years' war. Our fathers never relied upon non-intercourse and non-importation as measures of hostile coercion. They placed their dependence upon them solely as means of pacific influence among the people of that nation. The relation in which this country stood at that time with regard to Great Britain, gave a weight and a potency to those measures then, which in our present relation to her, we can neither hope nor imagine possible. At that time we were her Colonies, a part of her family. Our prosperity was essentially hers. So it was avowed in this country. So it was admitted in Great Britain. Every refusal of intercourse which had a tendency to show the importance of these then colonies to the parent country, of the part to the whole, was a natural and a wise means of giving weight to our remonstrances. We pretended not to control, but to influence, by making her feel our importance. In this attempt we excited no national pride, on the other side of the Atlantic. Our success was no national degradation, for the more we developed our resources and relative weight, the more we discovered the strength and resources of the British power. We were then component parts of it. All the measures of the Colonies, antecedent to the Declaration of Independence, had this principle for their basis. As such, non-importation and non-intercourse were adopted in this country. As such, they met the co-operation of the patriots of Great Britain, who deemed themselves deviating from none of their national duties, when they avowed themselves the allies of American patriots, to drive through the influence of the loss of our trade, the ministry from their places, or their measures. Those patriots did co-operate with our fathers, and that openly, in exciting discontent, under the effect of our non-intercourse agreements. In so doing, they failed in none of their obligations to their sovereign. In no nation, can it ever be a failure of duty to maintain that the safety of the whole depends on preserving its due weight to every part. Yet, notwithstanding the natural and little suspicious use of these instruments of influence, notwithstanding the zeal of the American people coincided with the views of Congress, and a mighty party existed in Great Britain, openly leagued, with our fathers, to give weight and effect to their measures, they did not effect the purposes, for which they were put into operation. The British policy was not abandoned. War was not prevented. How then can any encouragement be drawn from that precedent, to support us under the privations of the present system of commercial suspension? Can any nation admit that the trade of another is so important to her welfare, as that on its being withdrawn, any obnoxious policy must be abandoned, without at the same time admitting that she is no longer independent? Sir, I could indeed wish that it were in our power to regulate not only Great Britain, but the whole world, by opening or closing our ports. It would be a glorious thing for our country to possess such a mighty weapon of defence. But, acting in a public capacity, with the high responsibilities resulting from the great interests, dependant upon my decision, I cannot yield to the wishes of love-sick patriots, or the visions of teeming enthusiasts; I must see the adequacy of means to their ends. I must see, not merely that it is very desirable that Great Britain should be brought to our feet, by this embargo, but that there is some likelihood of such a consequence to the measure, before I can concur in that universal distress and ruin, which, if much longer continued, will inevitably result from it. Since, then, every dictate of sense and reflection convinces me of the utter futility of this system, as a means of coercion, on Great Britain, I shall not hesitate to urge its abandonment. No, sir, not even although, like others, I should be assailed by all the terrors of the outcry of British influence.

Really, Mr. Speaker, I know not how to express the shame and disgust with which I am filled, when I hear language of this kind cast out upon this floor, and thrown in the faces of men, standing justly on no mean height in the confidence of their countrymen. Sir, I did, indeed, know that such vulgar aspersions were circulating among the lower passions of our nature. I knew that such vile substances were ever tempering between the paws of some printer's devil. I knew that foul exhalations like these daily rose in our cities, and crept along the ground, just as high as the spirits of lampblack and saline oil could elevate; falling, soon, by native baseness, into oblivion, in the jakes. I knew, too, that this species of party insinuation was a mighty engine, in this quarter of the country, on an election day, played off from the top of a stump, or the top of a hog'shead, while the gin circulated, while barbacue was roasting; in those happy, fraternal associations and consociations, when those who speak, utter without responsibility, and those who listen, hear without scrutiny. But little did I think, that such odious shapes would dare to obtrude themselves, on this national floor, among honorable men;—the select representatives, the confidential agents of a wise, a thoughtful and a virtuous people. I want language to express my contempt and indignation at the sight.

So far as respects the attempt which has been made to cast such aspersions on that part of the country which I have the honor to represent, I beg this honorable House to understand, that so long as they, who circulate such insinuations, deal only in generals and touch not particulars, they may gain among the ignorant and the stupid a vacant and a staring audience. But when once these suggestions are brought to bear upon those individuals, who in New England have naturally the confidence of their countrymen, there is no power in these calumnies. The men who now lead the influences of that country, and in whose councils the people on the day when the tempest shall come will seek refuge, are men whose stake is in the soil, whose interests are identified with those of the mass of their brethren, whose private lives and public sacrifices present a never failing antidote to the poison of malicious invectives. On such men, sir, party spirit may indeed cast its odious filth, but there is a polish in their virtues, to which no such slime can adhere. They are owners of the soil; real yeomanry; many of them men who led in the councils of our country in the dark day which preceded the national independence; many of them men, who, like my honorable friend from Connecticut on my left, (Mr. TALLMADGE,) stood foremost on the perilous edge of battle; making their breasts in the day of danger a bulwark for their country. True it is, Mr. Speaker, there is another and a much more numerous class, composed of such as through defect of age can claim no share in the glories of our Revolution; such as have not yet been blest with the happy opportunity of "playing the man" for their country; generous sons of illustrious sires; men, not to be deterred from fulfilling the high obligations they owe to this people by the sight of foul and offensive weapons. Men who, with little experience of their own to boast, will fly to the tombs of their fathers, and questioning concerning their duties, the spirit which hovers there, will no more shrink from maintaining their native rights, through fear of the sharpness of malevolent tongues, than they will, if put to the trial, shrink from defending them through fear of the sharpness of their enemies' swords.

When Mr. QUINCY had concluded, the House adjourned without taking a question.

THURSDAY, December 8.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, that the unfinished business of yesterday, depending at the time of adjournment, do lie on the table; and that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendatory bill authorizing the President to employ an additional number of revenue cutters: and the question being taken thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the first member of the first resolution reported on Thursday last from the Committee of the Whole, which was depending yesterday at the time of adjournment, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain."

Mr. KEY said that it was with much regret that he had seen the course which the debate on the first resolution had taken; as the propositions contained in that resolution met his entire and full approbation, he could have wished that instead of the discussion which had taken place, a silent, dignified vote, the spontaneous effect of feeling and judgment, had at once passed. It would have been a better course, would have had a better effect, and kept the American mind from the impression which the protraction of the discussion must have occasioned, when taken in connexion with the subject. A view however of the embargo had been gone into in respect to its past effects at home, and its probable future effects at home and abroad. As that course had been adopted, he said he should find an apology, for the time which he should occupy, in the present eventful crisis, and the interest it universally excited.

I did myself believe (said Mr. KEY) that the first resolution was an abstract proposition, and I still think so, although gentlemen consider it special, but surely a special proposition may be an abstract one. That which I consider an abstract proposition, is one out of which no future legislative proceedings can grow; but I agree that the crisis well warrants an expression of the public voice.

I shall take up the report and resolutions as a system, not with a view to condemn the report at all, for I take it as gentlemen wish it to be considered. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) as stating that the committee on our foreign relations had said nothing of the embargo. It was not necessary, Mr. Speaker, that they should, for the embargo law continues in operation until repealed. But surely it must be recollected that the Committee on Foreign Relations in their resolutions seem to consider the system which they recommend, as including a continuance of the embargo; and I trust I meet the committee on fair and firm ground, when I consider their assent to be implied to the continuance of the embargo, and that it is their opinion that the measures which they recommend, united with the embargo, form an efficient system proper for the American people to adopt at this time. I shall necessarily therefore endeavor to answer gentlemen who have considered the embargo as a wise measure for the American people; that they are competent to bear it; and that it will, if guarded more sedulously, yet work out the political salvation of our land.

That the embargo is a measure severely felt by our country at large, and by some portions of it to a very eminent degree, cannot be denied. I did not expect to hear its effects contradicted; but they have been in some measure softened by the honorable chairman of the committee. I think the pressure of this measure great, and in some places requiring all the exertion of patriotism to support it. And as a proof of it, the members on this floor from different parts of the Union have only contended which section suffered most. A member from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) because he conceives that thirty millions of dollars have been lost to the Eastern country by the measure, hence concludes that the Eastern country suffers most. The gentlemen from the Southern country say that they raise seventy millions of pounds of cotton, of which but ten millions are consumed at home, and the whole of the residue remains on hand; and that having seven-tenths of their produce unsold, conceive that they most sensibly feel the weight of this affliction in their country. A member from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) will not yield the palm of oppression to either. "I live (said the gentleman) in the centre of the tobacco country, whether you draw the line from East to West, or from North to South. We are not less pressed than others, for we have no vent for this article so obnoxious in itself, but which the taste of mankind has rendered necessary." Now, with great deference to all these gentlemen, I say that my country suffers most. The Southern country possesses its staples, which but remain on hand; their value only diminished by the non-export. Tobacco and cotton may be preserved without material injury for a length of time. We know that at the close of the Revolutionary war tobacco bore a greater price than previous to its commencement, and amply remunerated the holders. But I represent an agricultural country. What can resuscitate wheat devoured by the fly? What restore flour soured in the barrel? Our produce perishes, the subject is destroyed. So far therefore as I represent an extensive and fertile farming district, I will not yield the palm of pressure to the cotton and tobacco country. So great has been the feeling of the people that it has wrought a wondrous change in the State which I have the honor to represent;

not in men who are either deluded or deceived, as intimated by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. CAMPBELL,) but men who, by the pressure of the embargo itself, have been driven to reflection, and by reflection removed the film from their eyes, and thereby seen their true interests more distinctly. In the course of the last Winter, the Legislature of the State of Maryland, believing that the Orders in Council justified the embargo, and that it was a wise measure, approved of it. Succeeding elections have taken place, and the present House of Representatives tells you that it is most ruinous and oppressive. Such certainly are its effects in the State of Maryland; and I should illy represent my own district, if I did not so declare. Gentlemen will say that I should rather be pleased with the change than regret it; but, so help me God, Mr. Speaker, I am much less anxious what description of citizens administers the affairs of the country, than that they should be well administered; that it should protect the liberty, give to labor its just reward, and promote the happiness and prosperity of the citizens.

But it is alleged, by the honorable chairman of the committee, (Mr. CAMPBELL,) that this is a delusion; that the people do not comprehend the subject; for that it is the Orders in Council which have produced our embarrassments, and not the embargo. Here then, sir, I am precisely at issue with that learned and honorable gentleman. I contend that the pressure on the people is caused by the embargo, and not by the Orders in Council. However speculative theorists may reason, there is proof abroad, and stubborn facts to contradict their reasoning. Test the market from Boston to Savannah, as to the price which you may get at ninety days credit, the embargo being continued, or on condition that the embargo be repealed in thirty days. Is there no difference in the price under these circumstances? I know well from experience, and the whole country knows, that if the embargo be now taken off, the price of every species of produce will rise fifty per cent. The depreciation in price then flows from the embargo. Remove it and they will give you more; keep it on and they will give you less. These are stubborn facts, and every man who has gone to the market will attest their correctness. You may reason as you please; but there is not a farmer that can be reasoned out of his senses, especially when they are sharpened a little by necessity. I hold these facts to be more conclusive than any abstract reasoning to prove that the embargo does work a diminution in the value of the articles which we have for sale. If this be the case, it results, sir, that we must ascribe to the operation of that measure the loss our country now so greatly feels. Our citizens are not so uninformed as the gentleman from Tennessee imagines. He thinks, and I agree with him, that the public voice will be generally right, when the people are well informed. They have seen all the official communications which have been published, and are competent to judge whether the Orders in Council justified the embargo, and whether, if the embargo had not been laid, they would have wrought that effect which we now so sensibly feel. Instead of being deluded, sir, their eyes are opened, and the film removed; and they see that the embargo was not justified by necessity, and as far as their opinion has been expressed, that it was impolitic and unwise.

The gentleman seems to think that the country cannot feel much because it feeds well; but we may feel and feed at the same time. It is plenty that we complain of. Our surplus is touched by this torpedo, the embargo, and is thereby rendered useless. But gentlemen say that if the embargo were now taken off, we could not trade; and a calculation has been entered into by the gentleman from Tennessee in opposition to one made by me at the last session. I have not seen my calculation for months, sir; it is before the public—the gentleman's statement will go to the same tribunal, and I am willing to commit my slender reputation to the country for the accuracy of mine, and let the people judge between us. The gentleman tells you that we have no commerce to resort to which would be either safe or profitable. It is strange we cannot confide the decision of this question to commercial men—for what commercial man would undertake a voyage which shall be attended with certain ruin? I had thought that men of great experience and information, and whose knowledge was sharpened by interest, might be safely confided in. But merchants, whose habits of life have led them to calculate, whose information extends to every part of the world, are not to be trusted with the prosecution of their own interest, but we must kindly take it in hand for them! Sir, I contend that commerce had better be left free for merchants to find a market, which every one knows they would do, from their eagerness now to ship. If they could not export with safety, or profit, they would lay a voluntary embargo, ten thousand times better than a coercive one; the very necessity of coercion shows that our merchants would sail, were it not for the embargo. I contend that the embargo is ruinous and oppressive. Need I say anything further on the subject? Look at the country. The courts of justice shut in one of the Southern States; executions suspended in a State contiguous to this; and Maryland reduced to the same necessity, from the circumstance of there being no market for our produce. So great is the pressure that the people have it not in their power to pay their ordinary debts; and how eloquent is the fact that in a moment of peace (for certainly there is not war) we are compelled to arrest the current of justice. The legislative acts depict the situation of the country more strikingly than volumes of argument. The State Legislatures know the inability of their citizens to pay, and hold out a kind hand to assist them.

In point of revenue how does it work? The honorable chairman of the committee, (Mr. CAMPBELL,) in a speech of great learning and investigation, told us that the Treasury never was more full. I wish the documents were before the House to convince us of it. But did an atom of it flow in from the operation of the embargo? If there be such a surplus, it only shows the beneficial operation of the system pursued anterior to the embargo. What is to fill your Treasury now, if the people cannot sell their produce? What will in this case become of your source of wealth in the Western country? The people can neither buy lands, nor buying, pay for them. Where is the impost duty, which has supported the Government, and sunk to a considerable degree the national debt? The moment you prevent all importation, there is an utter extinction of impost revenue; and at home a physical inability to produce any from the people at large. We are a rich country, abounding in the necessities of life; we have money's worth, but no money. Nor can our people by any practical means raise money to defray the expenses of State Governments, much more of that of the United States. I am in the country, sir; I cannot collect my rents, my neighbors cannot sell wheat or tobacco. All is stopped. I ask then what physical ability we have to discharge the State taxes, or any other? We have no other way of getting money but through the sale of our produce. Gentlemen say that our revenue would fall just as short, supposing the embargo to be raised. That is begging the question, sir. They assume that for a truth which they ought to prove in the first instance. Leave commerce open, and you will soon have money in return for our produce, or that which will procure it. Revenue is the life of Government, and let me suppose gentlemen to be sitting here thirteen months hence, on the first of January, 1810. Where is your revenue then to come from? You have dried up every source of the national wealth. What must you do? Either borrow or raise money by direct taxation. There is no doubt what must be resorted to; and it was touched with great ability, though slightly touched, by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) as to the consequences which must grow out of such a system as direct taxation. This species of taxation is not consonant to the genius of the country, to the habits of our people—it comes too close to the pocket of the agriculturist, and is besides a source of revenue which ought to belong exclusively to the States. I hold it as a political truism, that upon the sovereignty and independence of each State, as guaranteed by the Constitution, do our liberties depend. I know that some of the ablest men in America opposed the adoption of the Federal Constitution on this ground: that the General Government being raised and supported on external matters only, if the time should ever arrive at which foreign commerce should cease, and internal taxes be resorted to, that great would be the conflict between the officers of the State and General Governments, which would ultimately end in the prostration of State rights. Gentlemen call the embargo, in silken phrase, a temporary suspension of commerce. I will call it by its own name; it is better known to the people by it. I contend that the embargo now laid is a perpetual embargo, and no member of this House can constitutionally say it is otherwise; for the immediate Representatives of the people have so played the game as to leave the winning trump out of their own hands, and must now have a coincidence in opinion both of the Senate and of the President of the United States to effect its repeal. If the whole of this body were to consent to a repeal, and a majority of the Senate, yet the President might resist them both. Is there any limitation to the law on the statute book? No; but there is a power given to the President to suspend it in the whole or in part, in the event of certain contingencies. Have those contingencies happened? Are they likely to happen? No, sir; and these are the views which I take of the subject. America, anxious to get rid of this burden, has proffered to take it off, if either of the two belligerents would relax their edicts in our favor in relation to such one, keeping it on in relation to the other. What says the sarcastic British Minister? Why, sir, that they have no cause of complaint; that it was laid by the President as a precautionary measure; and they were told by our Minister that it was not to be considered as a hostile measure. What says France? She gives us no answer, say gentlemen. Aye, sir—and is that true? Have we indeed received no answer? I think we have one that wounds our feelings as deeply as the answer of Mr. Canning. It is the situation of our Minister abroad, who says he dare not ask for an answer, because the asking it might be injurious to our cause. What, have we a Minister abroad, and is he afraid or unwilling to make a proposition to the Government where he is resident? Surely, sir, that state of things furnishes as definite an answer as any that could be given. We have no hopes that either will remove its edicts. Sir, I consider the embargo as a premium to the commerce of Great Britain. Gentlemen say that she is a great Power, a jealous Power, and possessed of a monopolizing spirit. If these views be correct, by annihilating our commerce, do we not yield the seas to her, and hold out an inducement to her forever to continue her orders in force? What prospect is there that the embargo will be removed? It cannot now be got rid of by a vote of this House. We are saddled with it. If we cast our eyes to proceedings elsewhere constitutionally held on the same subject, we shall find that it is to remain still farther to oppress and burden the people of this country with increased rigor.

As a measure of finance it has laid the axe to the root. The tree is down that bore the golden fruit, and will not again grow till we ease ourselves of this measure. In a fiscal point of view I cannot then for my life think it a wise or provident measure. But as a preparation for war, it is still worse; because it produces a deficiency of that out of which war alone cannot be sustained. Instead of having money for your surplus produce, it rots upon your hands; instead of receiving a regular revenue, we have arrested its course, and dried up the very source of the fountain. As to preparation at home, which is the only preparation contemplated to make, what or whom is it against? Against France? She cannot come here. Or against England, who, with the monopoly of commerce which you leave her to enjoy, has no object further to annoy you? I believe, as a preparation for war, the best expedient would be to get as much money as we could, to send out our surplus produce and bring back the supplies necessary for an army if to be raised at all—to arm and discipline the militia. A raising of the embargo would be a preparation for war—it would bring us articles of the first necessity for our surplus. But on a continuation of the embargo, things must progress from bad to worse.

Another thing, sir; I do not now mean to take a Constitutional view of the subject—but will not gentlemen pause and reflect on the continuance of the embargo? It is well known that the General Government grew out of a spirit of compromise. The great authors of that instrument were well acquainted with the term embargo. A temporary embargo, for the purpose of sending out a squadron of concealing an equipment, was well understood. But I ask every one who hears me, if a question had been agitated in convention to give Congress a power to lay an embargo for one or two years, if the Eastern or commercial States would have agreed to it? Does any man believe it? No man who knows the country can believe it. With what sedulous anxiety did they say, in a negative provision of the Constitution, that Congress should not lay an export duty? You are prohibited the minor power of taxing exports, and yet you stop exports altogether for an indefinite term. It is utterly inconceivable, that the States interested in commerce should have given their assent to any such powers so self-destructive. If they had given them, they ought to be most clear; not by implication, but most manifest. The exercise of powers counter-acting principles most dear to every part of the community, ought to be assumed with the utmost caution. Under that view, except the measure be most wise in itself, and its effects most clear, the Government ought not to continue the embargo. But why is it to be continued? We have taken some view of its effects at home. Let us see what effects may be expected to be produced by it abroad. An honorable gentleman told us an hundred millions were saved by laying the embargo, a sum nearly equal to the whole exports of the United States for one year, excluding the capital employed. The first two or three seizures of vessels, sir, would have sent an alarm abroad, and the danger been so imminent, they would have voluntarily retired from destruction. There are no reasonable data from which to infer that one hundred millions of our property could at any one time have fallen a prey. Some few vessels might have been taken, but the rest would have escaped the grasp of the Power which harassed them.

I will now examine the character of this measure; for upon my word, sir, it seems a political non-descript, though we feel its effects so severely. The President tells you it is a measure of precaution only; and yet we are told by the gentlemen that it is a species of war, which America can best use to coerce the two greatest Powers on the earth, commanding land and sea, to truckle at our feet. I know not how gentlemen can place our connexion with foreign nations in such a predicament; whilst the President officially holds out to the world that the embargo was a peaceful measure, gentlemen now say that it is a coercive one, a sort of quasi war. I recollect a gentleman at the last session making an estimate of the West Indies being worth an hundred millions to Britain, and predicting that before the measure was ninety days known in the West Indies, it would bring that nation to our feet, that it would act as a great political lever, resting its fulcrum on Jamaica, and move all Europe to our wishes. Double the number of days have elapsed, and they hold out insulting language. How then can we trust to the future predictions of gentlemen? Their error arises from a want of knowledge of the country; a little experience is worth all the theory in the world. In the years 1774-5, an honorable feeling adopted a non-exportation and non-importation agreement, more faithfully executed by patriotism than any law since made or enacted; for every family refused to use an article which was not raised within the bosom of its own country. Did it produce starvation in the West Indies? No, sir; the politicians of that day did not so calculate. They knew the resources of those islands, and told them that if they would convert a part of their sugar plantations into cornfields, they would not suffer. We are now in the habit of overvaluing ourselves and undervaluing our enemies. Come the day when it will, we shall have no ignoble foes to meet.

In the Revolutionary war how did England stand—how her islands? For several years she was at war with America, with Holland, with Spain, with France, whose fleets in the East and West Indies were often equal, sometimes superior to her own, and an armed neutrality in the North—during this period a French fleet blockaded the Chesapeake, and aided the capture of Cornwallis, and threatened the British islands—but how was this conflict with the world sustained? Were the islands starved during these years? did they fall? No, sir; the British nation braved the storm, and was only conquered by her sons—America was victorious and independent; but Europe retired discomfited. Sir, America can again prove victorious, but it must be by other measures than embargoes—destructive only at home and without effect abroad.

It is said that one reason why the embargo has not pressed so hard on Great Britain as it might, is, that it has not been so tightly drawn as it may be; that our citizens have evaded it. And, sir, if I have any geographical knowledge of the country, tighten the cords as you may by revenue cutters and gunboats on the seaboard, and collectors and military on land, they will escape both. Interest, ever alert, will avail itself of our extensive coast and elude the law.

But, gentlemen say they are not accountable for the failure in England, from another cause—the language of the public papers and pamphlets of the anti-embargoists. The enemy, we are told, has been induced to hold out under the idea that America will yield. Sir, would Great Britain rely for her oracles on the newspapers or pamphlets of this country? Have those causes wrought on her a perseverance in her measures? I wonder, sir, that in the anxiety to find causes, gentlemen never cast their eyes to official documents—to a very important State paper issued on this side the Atlantic—saying that the marshals and civil force were not adequate to enforce the embargo. When the President's Proclamation arrived in England, no doubt could have remained of the effect of the embargo. Another public record accompanied it—an act of one of the States arresting executions for debt during the continuance of the embargo, and for six months afterwards. With these public documents before them, the British nation would be more apt to judge, and more correctly judge, of the internal situation of the country, than from all the periodical publications of the day put together. Pamphlets also have been written in this country, of which it is said the British Ministry have availed themselves, to induce their people to believe that the United States are not capable of suffering. I believe we are. The people of America are as patriotic as any on earth, and will respect the laws, and must be made to respect them. They will obey them from principle; they must be made to obey them if they do not; for, while a law is in existence, it must be enforced. But I am somewhat surprised that gentlemen who talk of opposition publications in this country, as influencing England, should derive all their political data from British newspaper publications or opposition pamphlets. British opposition papers and pamphlets are with them the best things in the world; but nothing said here must be regarded there as correct. Even Mr. Baring has been quoted, who is a commission merchant, to the greatest extent perhaps known in the world. The Louisiana purchase of fifteen millions was nothing to him as a commission merchant. The next writer referred to, is Mr. Brougham, brought before Parliament, to assert the rights of a body of merchants confined almost exclusively to the Continental trade. He came forward on their account, and the fact was demonstrated, notwithstanding his exertions, that the Orders in Council did not, but the prior French decrees did, curtail that commerce. So the majority thought and acted on that supposition. If the continuance of the embargo, then, does not produce a change in the policy of Great Britain, by its operation on the West Indies, if they resort to documents in this country, or even to speeches on this floor, they will probably continue the conflict of suffering as long as we are able to endure it, and continue our measures. For my opinion is, sir, that the extent of our seaboard affords such opportunities for evasion, that, unless we station cutters within hail of each other, on our whole coast, they will not be competent to carry our laws into effect. It will be benefiting the British colonies at the expense of our own country.

The continuance of our measures may be productive of another consequence, attended with more serious mischief than all others together—the diversion of trade from us to other channels. Look at both sides of the case. If Great Britain holds on, (and my predictions are not fulfilled, or she will persevere,) she will look for other sources of supply, that, in the event of a war, she may not be essentially injured. She will endeavor to arrange her sources of supply, so that no one nation refusing to deal with her shall have it in their power materially to impair her interests. As to cotton, large quantities of this article were formerly drawn from the West Indies. The destruction of the sugar estates in St. Domingo gave a new direction to cultivation. They ceased to grow in many of the West India islands that article which they formerly had raised to a considerable extent, (cotton,) and which, if the increased labor employed in the sugar estates, now adequate to the supply of Europe, be not profitable, they will again cultivate. The Brazils will assist to take a sufficient quantity for consumption, (and, as well as my memory serves me, they produce seventy or eighty thousand bags annually;) and South America will add her supplies. I grant that we can now undersell these countries; but I beg gentlemen to pause before they drive England into a change of commercial habits, which in the hour of future peace may never be fully restored, and thus inflict deep and lasting wounds upon our prosperity. Sir, we are told that we are to produce great effects by the continuance of the embargo and non-intercourse with this nation. Do gentlemen who were in the majority on the subject of the embargo when laid (for I was anxious then that at least foreign nations might come and give us what we wanted in exchange for our product) recollect their argument against permitting foreign vessels to come and take our produce; that it was privilege all on one side; that it would be nominal to France, while England would be the sole carrier? Now, sir, as to the non-intercourse system—how does that operate? France has no commerce—cannot come here—and therefore is not injured by her exclusion from our ports. It operates solely on England. If the argument was then correct, to avoid the measure because it operated to the sole benefit of England, what shall we think of the non-intercourse measure which operates solely against her? In a commercial view, therefore, and in point of interest, this country will be deeply benefited by a removal of the embargo.

But, gentlemen say that the honor of the country is at stake; that a removal of the embargo would be submission to Great Britain, and submission to France. How is our honor affected by removing it? We say we will not trade—with whom? With them alone? No, sir; the embargo says we will not trade with anybody. All nations, when they find it convenient, can pocket their honor for profit. What is it we do for a license to go into the Mediterranean? Do we not pay an annual tribute to Algiers for liberty to navigate the sea safer from its corsairs? Have we not an undoubted right to navigate the Mediterranean? Surely; and yet we pay annually a tribute for permission to do it—and why? Because the happiness and interest of the nation are promoted by it. In a monarchy, the Prince leads his subjects to war for the honor of his mistress, or to avenge a petty insult. But, what best consults the honor of a Republican Government? Those measures which maintain the independence, promote the interest, and secure the happiness of the individuals composing it. And that is the true line of honor which, if pursued, shall bring with it the greatest benefits to the people at large. I do not know, sir, strictly speaking, whether the destruction of any commercial right is destructive to the independence of the country; for a nation may exist independent, and the happiness of the people be secured, without commerce. So, that the violation of commercial rights does not destroy our independence. I acknowledge that it would affect the sovereignty of the country, and retard its prosperity. But, are not the measures which have been adopted, submission? No train of argument can make more clear the fact, that, withdrawing from the ocean for a time is an abandonment, instead of an assertion, of our rights. Nay, I think I have the authority of the committee for it; for I speak of submission as applicable to the measure recommended by the committee. They say, that “a permanent suspension of commerce, after repeated and unavailing efforts to obtain peace, would not properly be resistance; it would be withdrawing from the contest, and abandoning our indisputable right freely to navigate the ocean.” If a permanent embargo, after repeated offers of peace, would not properly be resistance, but an abandonment of our rights, is not a temporary embargo—and this has been a year continued—an abandonment for the time? Unquestionably it is. So long as it continues, it does abandon our rights. And now I will show that it is submission, and not resistance. I maintain that the embargo, aided by the second and third resolutions of the committee, does complete an abandonment of our maritime rights, and is a submission to the orders and decrees.

DECEMBER, 1808.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

Of what nature are the rights in contest? They are maritime rights, and not territorial; and, to be used, must be exercised exterior to the limits of our territory. Whatever measures are confined within our territorial limits, is not an assertion or enjoyment of our exterior rights. Their enjoyment, must be abroad, consisting of the actual use of them. If, then, all our measures be confined within our jurisdictional limits, they cannot amount to an enjoyment of the rights exterior to those limits. I will illustrate this, to every man's comprehension. There is a street in Georgetown, through which every one has a right to pass—it is a highway. A merchant, with whom I have dealt for many years, because I purchase some articles of another merchant, says I shall not go through that street. I cross over, and his enemy says I shall not pass by him. I retire home and call a consultation of my friends. I tell them that I have entered into resolutions, first, that, to submit to this will be an abandonment of my right to pass and re-pass. Well, what then say my friends? Why, I declare I will neither go nor send to either of their houses—have no intercourse with them. Well, what then? Why, I will buy a broadsword and pair of pistols, and lock my door and stay at home. And do I enjoy my right of walking the street by making myself a prisoner? Surely not, sir. Now, this is precisely our case, under these resolutions. We say, that to submit, would be a wound on our honor and independence. We call a consultation. What is the result of it? We say we will have no intercourse with the nations injuring us, nor with any other; and, lastly, that we will arm and defend ourselves at home. And, I ask, is this resistance? Is it an enjoyment of our rights, or a direct, full submission? Is it not an abandonment of those rights to which we are entitled?

It has been said, that the little portion of commerce which would remain unaffected by the belligerent edicts, would belong to us as a boon from England, were we to prosecute it. I do not understand it in this light. Our right to navigate the ocean is inherent, and belongs to us as a part of our sovereignty; but, when interdicted from any one place, if we go to another, we certainly do not accept that commerce as a boon. I might as well say, if a man interdicted me from going down one street in Georgetown, that I accept a boon from him in going down another. This is certainly not the case. The trading to these places is exercising our original right, not interfered with; and, so far as those orders and decrees do not operate, we could carry on a legitimate trade, flowing from our indisputable right, as a sovereign nation, to navigate the ocean. It does seem to me then, sir, that the residue of our trade might be carried on without submitting to the belligerent edicts. But, an honorable gentleman (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL) asked me, yesterday, if we were to permit our enemies to take any part, whether they would not take the remainder? This, like the horse's tail in Horace, would be plucked, hair by hair, till it was all out. True, sir, this might possibly happen. But, what have we done? Why, we have cut the tail off, for fear all the hair should be taken out. We have ourselves destroyed all that portion of our trade which the belligerents have not interdicted.

Taking the whole into view, then, I think that the continuance of the embargo, as an assertion of our rights, is not an efficient mode of resistance.

But gentlemen say, in a crisis like the present, when each individual ought to contribute his mite, it is very easy to find fault; and they ask for a substitute. I want no substitute. Take off the embargo. That is what I want. But when called upon in this manner, I cannot help looking around me to the source whence I expected higher and better information. The crisis is awful. We are brought into it by the means recommended by the head of our foreign relations. I think the President advised the embargo. If he did not, he certainly advised the gunboats and the additional military force. In these minor measures, which have been in their consequences so interesting, there was no want of advice or responsibility. Why then, in this awful crisis, shall we not look to the same quarter? The responsibility is left on us. We anti-embargoists show that things would not have been thus, had our advice been taken; and, not being taken, we have little encouragement to give more. Our advice is on the journals. We said, let us have what commerce we can get, and bring home returns to stimulate our industry. I believe the declarations of gentlemen when they say that they are friendly to commerce; but their fondness for it is the embrace of death. They say they will protect it; but it is strange that they should begin to protect it by abolishing it. I contend that their measures have not answered the purposes of protection, but on the contrary they have been prejudicial to it; and I trust in their candor that they will join us in giving elasticity to commerce, and removing this pressure. The interests of commerce and agriculture are identified; whenever one increases, the other extends. They progress pari passu. Look at your mercantile towns; and wherever you find one, like a pebble thrown into water, its influence extends in a circle more or less remotely, over the whole surface. Gentlemen from the agricultural country vote to support commerce, because it increases the value of their own product; they are not so disinterested as they suppose, and I believe the best way is to consider the two inseparable. As I am at present disposed, could I not obtain a total repeal, I would prefer a resolution laid on the table by a gentleman (Mr. MUMFORD) from one of the largest commercial cities in the Union, and who must be supposed to know the opinion of commercial men. I can scarcely with my knowledge or understanding point out anything; but if I have not capacity to be one of the ins, I can readily perceive whether the present system be adequate or not. I would let our vessels go out armed for resistance; and if they were interfered with, I would make the dernier appeal. We are able and willing to resist; and when the moment arrives, there will be but one heart and hand throughout the whole Union. All will be American—all united for the protection of their dearest rights and interests.

Mr. LYON opposed the report in a speech of an hour.

Mr. DESHA said he had been particularly attentive to the whole of the debates during the very lengthy discussion of this important subject, and, said he, I am at a loss how to understand gentlemen, or what to conclude from their observations. Am I to conclude that they are really Americans in principle? I wish to do so; and I hope they are; but it appears somewhat doubtful, or they would not tamely give up the honor of their country by submitting to French decrees and British Orders in Council—that is, by warmly advocating the repeal of the embargo, without proposing something as a substitute. Do gentlemen mean an abject acquiescence to those iniquitous decrees and Orders in Council? Do gentlemen mean that that liberty and independence that was obtained through the valorous exertions of our ancestors, should be wrested from our hands without a murmur—that independence, in the obtaining of which so much virtue was displayed, and so much blood was shed? Do they mean that it should be relinquished to our former masters without a struggle? Gentlemen assign as a reason why the embargo should be removed, its inefficacy—that it has not answered the contemplated purpose. I acknowledge that as a measure of coercion it has not come entirely up to my expectations. It has not been as efficient as I expected it would have been. But what are the reasons why it has not fully come up to the expectations of its supporters, as a measure of coercion? The reasons are obvious to every man who is not inimical to the principles of our Government, and who is not prejudiced against the present Administration. Was it not for want of unanimity in support of the measure? Was it not in consequence of its having been wantonly, shamefully, and infamously violated? and perhaps winked at by some who are inimical to the principles of our Government; but who have had address and ingenuity sufficient to procure themselves to be appointed to office, and in which situation they have obtained a certain influence, and by misrepresentations as well as clamorous exertions have, in many instances, led the unwary astray, and caused the measure to become unpopular in some parts of the country? By improper representations and fallacious statements of certain prints, apparently, and I might add, undoubtedly, hostile to civil liberty and free Government, and advocates of British policy; by the baneful opposition of British agents and partisans, together with refugees or old Tories, who still recollect their former abject standing, and who have never forgiven the American independence, and who, in all probability, are doing all in their power at this time to assist their master George the Third in bringing about colonization and vassalage in this happy land—by keeping up party spirit to such a height, that the tyrant of the ocean was led to believe that he had a most powerful British party in the bosom of our country—and that, by an extraordinary opposition made to the embargo, we would become restless, and could not adhere to a suspension of commerce—consequently would have to relax, and fall into paying tribute, under the Orders of Council, to that corrupt Government, Britain. These are part of the reasons why the embargo, as a measure of coercion, has not proved completely efficacious; and had it not been for this kind of conduct, our enemies would have been brought to a sense of justice, an amicable adjustment of differences would have taken place. By this iniquitous conduct they have tried to wrest from the hands of Government an engine, the best calculated of all others that could have been imagined, to coerce our enemies into a sense of justice, and bring about reciprocity of commerce, that most desirable object, a system of all others the best suited to the peaceful genius of our Government. But if it has not been entirely efficacious as a measure of coercion, it has been particularly serviceable in many instances—by keeping us out of war, which is at all times to be deprecated by civilized men, by preserving our citizens from becoming victims of British tyranny on board their war ships, and securing an immense amount of American property, that was sailing on the ocean, supposed to amount in value to between sixty and a hundred million of dollars, the principal part of which would inevitably have fallen into the voracious jaws of the monster of the deep, or into the iron grasp of the tyrant Napoleon—by which, if we are involved in war, we have preserved the leading sinews, wealth; and above all, for preventing us from becoming tributary to those piratical depredators, whose inevitable determination is to monopolize the whole trade of the world, by which they rob us of our inherent rights. If gentlemen had come forward with propositions to adopt anything as a substitute for the embargo, that would have prevented us from the degradation of submission, or from falling into the hands of those monsters of iniquity, they no doubt would have met with support. The friends of this measure are not so particularly attached to it, but what they would willingly exchange it for one that was less sorely felt, less oppressive, and one that would preserve national honor, and bring about a redress of grievances; as it was with extreme regret, that they had to resort to the measure of the embargo, and which could only be warranted by the necessity of the case. I am as anxious for the repeal of the embargo, as any gentleman in this House, or perhaps any man on the continent, whenever it can be done consistent with the honor and welfare of the nation. The citizens of Kentucky, whom I have the honor to represent, feel its effects in common with their fellow men throughout the continent; but their patriotism is such that they bear it with cheerfulness, and magnanimity, and very justly consider it as a preventive of greater evils. I think that a retrograde step at this time would have the appearance of acquiescence, and be calculated to mark the Government with pusillanimity; therefore I deprecate war, believing as I do, that in a Government constructed like ours, war ought to be the last alternative, so as to preserve national honor. As such it would perhaps be advisable to adopt something like the second resolution that is under consideration, which, in addition to the embargo, would amount to a complete non-intercourse—which if systematically adhered to must produce the desired effect. If it should not, it will at least give time to make preparations for a more energetic appeal, which may probably have to be the result. But let it not be understood, because I am for avoiding war, as long as it can be avoided upon honorable terms, that I am against going to war when it becomes actually necessary. No, sir, my life and my property are at all times at my country's command, and I feel no hesitation in saying that the citizens of Kentucky, whom I have the honor to represent, would step forward with alacrity, and defend with bravery that independence in which they glory, and in the obtaining of which some of the best blood of their ancestors was spilt; for the degradation of tribute they would spurn with manly indignation. I would even agree to go further. From my present impression, I would agree to a recall of our Ministers from both England and France, and to a discharge of theirs; and have no intercourse with the principal belligerents until they learned to respect our rights as an independent nation, and laid aside that dictatorial conduct which has for years been characteristic of those European despots; for I am almost certain, under existing circumstances, that our Ministers in neither England nor France can do us any possible service, and that their Ministers here can, and in all probability do a great deal of harm, by fomenting division and keeping up party spirit, at a time, too, when unanimity is of the utmost consequence.

As to our commerce being driven from the ocean, I am not disposed to take a lengthy retrospect, or to examine minutely in order to discover which of our enemies, England or France, was the first aggressor; it is sufficient for me that both France and England have done nearly all in their power to harass and oppress us in every imaginable way. I am not the apologist of either France or England. I am an American in principle, and I trust whenever it is thought necessary to call my energies into action I shall prove myself to be such, by defending and protecting the rights and independence of my own country, from any encroachments, let them come from what quarter they may. By those iniquitous decrees of France, all vessels bound to or from England are deemed lawful prize, and if spoken by an English ship they were condemned in the prize courts of France. When a ship arrived in any of the French ports, bribery and corruption was practised; in order to succeed in her condemnation a separate examination of the crew would be resorted to, as to the events that happened on the voyage; offers made of one-third of the ship and lading as their portion of the prize money, if they would give information of their vessel having touched at any of the ports of England, or that any English cruiser had visited her on the voyage. Consequently, by the French decrees, all property afloat belonging to the Americans was liable to seizure and condemnation. Are gentlemen, possessing the feelings of Americans, prepared to submit to such degradation? Are they prepared to say the embargo shall be raised, while our commerce is subjected to this kind of depredation? I trust not.

As respects the British Orders in Council, all American vessels bound to French ports, or to any of the allies of the French, are considered good prize in the courts of Britain. England says you must not carry on any trade to any of the places that I have interdicted, without obtaining my leave—pay me a duty, and then you shall be permitted to go to any port—by paying me a tribute you may trade to any port you please. Degrading to freemen! Britain in her goodness says, you shall have the liberty to bring flour from the United States of America to England, land it, and re-export it, by paying two dollars on every barrel into my coffers. On cotton, which is certainly a very important article, a duty is charged on its exportation of about nine pence per pound sterling; nearly equal to the full value of that article in the parts of America, where it is raised, exclusive of the import duty, which is two pence in the pound. Therefore, if our traders wish to go to the Continent of Europe, the condition is, a tribute must be paid nearly equal to the value of the cargo, exclusive of the insurance and risk. If I mistake not, about two-thirds of the cotton exported from this country is made use of in England; on the balance a tribute must be paid of about nine pence sterling per pound, which is about twenty millions of pounds—on a calculation the sums will be found to be enormous—purely for the liberty of selling cotton; as also high and oppressive duties on other articles. If these impositions are submitted to, I pronounce your liberties gone—irretrievably lost—a blot made in the American political character, never to be obliterated. No man possessing an American heart will submit to the degradation of paying tribute to any nation on earth, nor suffer the freemen of America to be taxed without their consent. Will gentlemen say the embargo law must be repealed, and suffer our commerce to flow in its usual channel, while the decrees of France and the British Orders in Council are enforced, by which they would not only be liable to seizure and condemnation, but what is more degrading, pay a tribute of many millions of dollars annually, too degrading to be thought of with patience? We received liberty in its purity from our heroic ancestors—it is a duty incumbent on us to transmit it to posterity unsullied, or perish in the undertaking.

But, sir, it has been said that the people of the East would not bear the continuance of the embargo any longer—that they would force their way in trade; hinting, I presume, that they would openly rebel against your laws if they were not allowed to pursue their usual course in commerce, by which they subscribe to those nefarious Orders in Council, which is tribute of the most degrading kind. Who are these people of the East that have the hardihood to insinuate anything like rebellion against the laws of the land, or that would wish to degrade themselves so far as to pay tribute? It cannot be the descendants of the heroes of '76, that bravely stepped forth and fought against a tyrant for liberty! It cannot be the descendants of those brave fellows that struggled on the brow of Bunker's Hill for independence! No. It must be the descendants of refugees or old Tories, or otherwise it must be British agents or partisans; for no man possessing the feeling that an American ought to feel, would throw out such threats, or degrade himself by coming under tribute. If patriotism has left the land of freedom—if it has taken its flight from the mild and peaceful shores of Columbia—if foreign influence and corruption has extended itself so far that the people are disposed to rebel against the Government of their country—if the dissemination of foreign gold has had the baneful effect of suppressing all noble and patriotic sentiments, it is indeed time that foreign intercourse should cease. If the spirit of commercial speculation and cupidity had surmounted all patriotism, it is time that more energetic measures should be resorted to, in order that the chaff might be separated from the wheat; in a word, that traitors might be known.

Mr. NELSON said it was with very considerable reluctance that he rose to make a few remarks on this subject, after the very lengthy and very eloquent discourse of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. KEY.) I did not intend, said he, to have troubled the House upon this question; but as I am a man who generally speaks off-hand, it is necessary for me to answer the arguments of any gentleman promptly, if I intend to do it at all. For this reason I rise to do away some false impressions which may have been made by the gentleman's eloquence on the House, and on the bystanders, in the galleries, for I must say that his speech was better calculated for the galleries than for the sober members of this House. The gentleman commenced his argument with stating, what I do not believe, with due submission, is true in point of fact, that, although at their last session, the Legislature of Maryland passed resolutions approving the embargo, yet another election having taken place, the present Legislature have passed contrary resolutions.

Mr. KEY said he had spoken of the House of Representatives of Maryland, and not of the Legislature.

Mr. NELSON said the House of Representatives have, to be sure, passed resolutions bottomed on the same principles as those on which the gentleman himself has spoken, and which I have heard echoed in the electioneering campaign from almost every stump in the district in which I live. Whilst the gentleman was on this subject, I wish he had told us of the philippic these resolutions got from the Senate of Maryland. The fact is not, as I understood the gentleman to say, that the Legislature of Maryland have passed resolutions disapproving the measures of the Government. But the gentleman intimates that the politics of Maryland have undergone a great change, and that the party formerly uppermost, is now under. Sir, the question which turned out the old members of the Legislature in the county where I live, was not the embargo system, but a question as to a State law. The militia system was the stumbling-block which caused many of the old members to be turned out, and thus the opposite party got the ascendancy in one branch of the Legislature of Maryland. But, since that election, another has taken place for members of Congress; and how has that turned out? Why, sir, that gentleman and two other anti-embargoists are elected, whilst six men, who have always approved of it, are also returned; making six to three. Does this prove a change? No, sir. But we have had another election since that. Out of eleven electors, nine men are returned as elected who have approved this system of measures. Does this prove that the embargo was the cause of the change of the politics of the Maryland Legislature? I think not, sir.

But the gentleman has said that the embargo, and not the Orders in Council and decrees, has destroyed the commerce of this country. I do not know, after all the arguments which I have heard, if the gentleman listened with the same attention as I did, how he could make such an assertion. When our ports are blockaded, and all the world is against us, so that, if the embargo was raised, we could go nowhere with perfect freedom, can gentlemen say that the embargo has ruined our commerce? Is it not these acts which have shut us out from a market? The gentleman says we may trade to England. Yes, sir, we may, provided we will pay all such duties as she chooses, and go nowhere else. And would not the doing this place us in precisely the same situation as we were in before the Revolution? England says we may trade with her, paying heavy import and export duties, but says we shall go nowhere else. If you go anywhere else, she says you shall go by England, take a license, and pay a duty, and then you may trade. Is it to be supposed that the people of the United States will agree to this? Are they reduced to that situation, that they will become the vassals of a foreign Power—for what? Why, sir, for the prosecution of a trade with that foreign Power, who, if her present impositions be submitted to, may cut up our trade in any manner she pleases; for, through our trade, she will raise a revenue to almost an equal amount with the value of your whole produce carried hence. She levies a higher tribute on some articles than the article itself is worth, and this trade the gentleman wants to pursue. He wants no substitute; “take off the embargo,” says he, “and let us trade.” Sir, if we could trade upon equal terms, I, too, should say, “take off the embargo, and let us trade.” But if we cannot trade, except under the license of a foreign Power, I say it would be ruinous to us. And has it come to this, for all the arguments of this, that the American people, for the sake of pounds, shillings, and pence, for the sake of hoarding up a few pence, are to give up their independence, and become vassals of England and France? I hear nothing from the gentleman about the honor of the nation. It would appear as if gentlemen on the other side of the House are willing to sell their country if they can put money in their pocket. Take off the embargo, they cry—for what? money. Pay tribute—for what? money. Surrender your independence—for what? all for money, sir. I trust the people have a different feeling from these gentlemen. The people love money, sir; but they love liberty and independence much better. If money had been the sole object, the Revolution would never have happened; and if that be our sole object now, the blood spilt and money spent in our Revolution was all in vain. But the gentleman says, that our honor is not concerned; that Republics have none; that their honor is to pursue that course by which they can make the most money.

Mr. KAY said, that he did not say that the honor of the nation was money; but that the line of conduct was most honorable which best secured the happiness and independence of the people.

Mr. NELSON.—I ask pardon of the gentleman, if I misrepresented him; because the gentleman's argument was quite vulnerable enough, without my making it more so than it really was. I did understand the gentleman to say, and had he not contradicted me, should still believe so, that the honor of the Republic is precisely that which brings the most riches to the nation. But I ask, whether the line of conduct recommended by that gentleman be such a one as would be proper to secure and take care of the independence of the people? Is it to secure the independence of the people, to suffer a foreign nation to impose upon them any terms which it thinks proper? Is it for the honor or happiness of this nation that we should again pass under the yoke of Great Britain? Is it for the honor of the nation to remove the embargo, without taking any other measure, and to bear with every indignity? No, sir; and yet the gentleman tells you, “take off the embargo, I want no substitute.” I did not suppose, sir, that gentlemen who oppose our measures (for I have great charity for them) would openly tell us to take off the embargo, and trade as foreign nations choose to dictate.

But the gentleman talks about the pressure of the embargo. That it does press hard is beyond doubt. It is an evil thing in itself; something like the dose a doctor gives us; it is a disagreeable thing in itself, but it cures your complaint. Thus the embargo is a disagreeable thing; but if we swallow it, however disagreeable, it may bring the political body to health. The gentleman gilds the pill he would give us; but it is a slow poison that would creep upon us, and bring on a distemper heretofore unknown to us, that sooner or later would carry us to the grave. We take off the embargo, and trade on their terms; what will be the consequence? Will they not forever hereafter compel us to trade as they please? Unquestionably. And is it not better to submit to some inconveniences, eventually to insure a free trade?

The gentleman says that, if produce be offered for sale, on condition that the embargo be raised, it will bring a higher price than if on a certainty that the embargo is to be continued. No doubt, sir, when the embargo is taken off, a momentary spur will be given to exportation; but how long will it continue? It will last but a very few weeks. Produce will soon be reduced to its proper level in the market. Take flour, for instance, the principal article raised for exportation in the gentleman's district and mine. It would rise, on a removal of the embargo, to ten or twelve dollars; and how long would that price last? It would be a thing of a day, and to the people who live in our districts of no sort of consequence; it would be of no benefit but to those who have flour at the market; to the merchants who have bought it up at a low price. Before the honest farmer can bring his produce to market, the great price will be all over; and though no embargo affects it, will be down to its present price, of four or five dollars; so that, although a removal of the embargo would reduce the price of produce at first,

I cannot see how gentlemen would make that an argument for taking off the embargo. If the gentleman can show that the price will continue, and that we can traffic without dishonor, then, sir, would I cordially join hands with him, to take off the embargo.

But the gentleman says, that the pressure is so very great that some of the States have passed laws for suspending executions. I know not what has been done in other States on this subject, nor what has been done in my own. If the gentleman has any information on the subject, I should like to hear it. A bill was before the House of Delegates for that purpose, but I did trust in God that it would be unanimously rejected. That such a law would pass in Maryland I never had an idea, because it is totally unnecessary. There are fewer men confined in jail for debt on this day than there ever were before for sixteen years that I have been in the practice of the law in that State. No man has gone to jail but those who, to use an emphatic expression, have broken into jail, who were too idle to work to pay their debts; who would get a friend to put them into jail, if they could get no other; and who stay there awhile, and then come out new men. This being the case, there can be no reason for shutting the courts of justice there.

On the subject of revenue, I can only say that, at present, there appears to be no deficiency of money in the Treasury. It is very certain that, if this embargo and non-intercourse system be continued long, our Treasury will run short, and we shall have no means of filling it but by loans or direct taxation. But I trust and hope that before the money already in the Treasury is fairly expended, if we pursue our object, we shall get over our embarrassments. Rather than pursue this subject much further, I would not only arm our merchantmen at sea, but our citizens on the land, and march to the North and East, and see if we could not do them some injury in return for all that we have received from them, even if we should do ourselves no good by it. It would do me some good to be able to do them some injury. I confess I do not like this Quaker policy. If one man slaps another's face, the other ought to knock him down; and I hope this will be our policy.

But the gentleman says, that the President recommended this measure to Congress as a measure of precaution. I do believe that, at the time the embargo was laid, it was done as a measure of precaution, and the President viewed it in that light. After its having answered every purpose as a measure of precaution, I am for continuing it as a measure of coercion. For, whatever gentlemen say about turning sugar plantations into cotton-fields, if the embargo be rigidly enforced, that we shall distress the West Indies very considerably, I do believe. I am unwilling to involve this country in a war if I can avoid it, but I am still more unwilling to take off the embargo and embrace the proposition of my colleague; for I have no idea of a free trade being permitted to us. In any country a war is to be deprecated; in this country particularly, where everything depends on the will of the people, we ought to be well aware that war meets the approbation of the people. We might make many declarations of war without effect, unless the people follow us. We try every method to obtain honorable peace; and if we do not succeed, the people will go with us heart and hand to war.

I shall enter into no calculations on this subject, sir. When the great question is presented to us whether we will submit or maintain our independence, we must determine either to do one or the other: that nation is not independent which carries on trade subject to the will of any other Power. Then, to my mind, the only question is, shall we defend ourselves, or shall we submit? And on that question I will make no calculations. If a man submits, of what use are calculations of money, for it may be drawn from him at the pleasure of his master? Let us have as much trade as we may, if we can only carry it on as others please, we need not calculate about money. We shall be poor, indeed; and, having lost our independence, we shall not even have money in return for it. But this nation will not submit, sir, nor will any man, who is a real American, advocate such a doctrine.

As to the embargo, Mr. N. said, he was not wedded to it. If any better system were devised, he would give up the present system and embrace the better one, let it come whence it would.

The House adjourned without taking a question.

FRIDAY, December 8.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of the President and Directors of the Washington Bridge Company, praying a revision and amendment of an act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act authorizing the erection of a bridge over the river Potomac, within the District of Columbia."—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill to revive and continue the authority of the Commissioners of Kaskaskia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

An engrossed bill to authorize the President to employ an additional number of revenue cutters was read a third time: Whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. DURELL that the said bill be re-committed to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, farther to consider and report thereon to the House: it passed in the negative.

The main question was then taken, that the said bill do pass, and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 26, as follows:

Resolved. That the title be, "An act to authorize the President to employ an additional number of revenue cutters."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act farther to amend the judicial system of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business depending yesterday at the time of adjournment—the report of the committee still under consideration.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said: It has become very fashionable to apologize to you, sir, for every trespass which a gentleman contemplates making on the patience of the House, and I do not know but in ordinary cases it may be very proper; but the present question is certainly such an one, as exempts every gentleman from the necessity of making any apology whatever. I shall offer none, and for the additional reason, that I have given to every member who has spoken the utmost of my attention.

Upon this question, which presents itself in every point of view too clear to admit of a single doubt; equally unsusceptible of sophistical perversion or misrepresentation; a question which involves a political truism, and which is undenied; a debate has grown out of it, embracing the whole foreign relations of this country. I shall not attempt to follow the gentlemen in the course which they have pursued, but will confine my observations to a justification of the embargo, and to the proof, that the orders and decrees of the belligerents, and not the embargo, as was said by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Key,) have produced the present embarrassments. Bad as our situation was at the close of the last session, it has now become infinitely worse. The offer to suspend the embargo laws, for a suspension of the Orders in Council, made in a sincere spirit of conciliation, has been contemptuously rejected, those orders justified, and an extension of their operation threatened: this is a state of things insufferable. At a crisis of this sort, the importance of which every gentleman acknowledges, I deem it proper that every man who feels an ardent love of country should come forward to save that country, to rescue his sinking parent from the jaws of pollution. The effort should be, who shall render our common country the most good; who will be foremost in the ranks; we should not shrink behind the irresponsible stand of doing nothing, ready to raise ourselves upon the mistakes of others; perhaps, the virtuous misfortunes of our political brothers. I am willing to take my share of the responsibility of asserting the wisdom of the original imposition of the embargo, and the correctness of its present and future continuance. Gentlemen have been frequently called upon, while they make vehement declamation against the embargo, to say what they wish in its stead; they declare the utmost hostility to the measure, and yet they offer no substitute. Can they for one moment forget, that upon this question, as upon every other national subject, we must all hang together or be hung separate! It inevitably follows from the organization of our Government, that this is the fact.

I consider the original imposition of the embargo as wise in a precautionary point of view; and notwithstanding all that has been said, and eloquently said, by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Key,) I believe it was called for by the most imperious public necessity. Every one must know, that had it not been for the embargo, millions of property, and (what is worse) thousands of our seamen, must have fallen a sacrifice to the cupidity of belligerent cruisers. No need of calculations on this subject—I shall not stop to enter into one. I appeal to the common sense of the nation and of this House, whether or not, the orders and decrees were calculated to have swept from the ocean all our floating property and seamen. But, no, say gentlemen, the seamen are not saved; and here we are amused with the old story, new vamped, of the fishermen running away. The seamen gone, sir! This is a libel on their generous and patriotic natures. Where are they gone? Every man, who ventures such an allegation, is bound to prove it; because it is, if true, susceptible of proof. Surely, sir, the assertion, or even proof, that British or other foreign seamen have left your service, does not establish that American seamen have deserted their country. The British seamen gone! I am glad of it, sir. I wish there had never been one in our service; and if there is an American tar, who would, in the hour of peril, desert his country, that he would go also. The thing is impossible, sir; every vessel which has sailed from the United States since the imposition of the embargo, has passed under such a peculiar review, before the officers of the revenue, that had any number of American seamen shipped themselves, proofs of their departure might, and certainly would, have been had. Read the intelligence from Nova Scotia; it informs us that none but English sailors have arrived there. I call upon gentlemen then to show how, where, and when, an American seaman has left his country, except in the pursuit of his ordinary vocation.

If the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. KEY) will apply to his political—I beg pardon—to his mercantile barometer, the insurance offices, he would find that, after the operation of the Orders in Council was known, insurance could not have been effected at Baltimore to the continent of Europe for 80 per cent., and not at London, on American property, for 90 guineas per cent. The proof of this is before me. Does not this prove that so much danger existed on the ocean that it was next to impossible to pass without seizure and condemnation? And surely he will not contend that this advance of premium was caused by the embargo? If the embargo then has saved anything to the country—and that it has there can be no doubt—exactly in the proportion that it has saved property and seamen to you, it has lessened the ability of the enemy to make war upon you, and, what is primarily important, lessened the temptation to war. The rich plunder of your inoffensive and enlarged commerce, must inevitably have gone to swell the coffers which are to support the sinews of war against you. The reaction thus caused by the embargo, is in your favor, precisely to the amount of property and men which it has saved to you from your enemies.

But we are told that the enterprising merchant is deprived of an opportunity—of what? Of ruining himself and sacrificing the industry of others. Has any capitalist said he would venture out in the present tempest which blackens the ocean? No, sir, they are your dashing merchants; speculators, who, having nothing to lose, and everything to gain, would launch headlong on the ocean, regardless of consequences. No commerce can be now carried on, other than that which is subservient to the Orders in Council. I appeal to the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. JACKSON)—no man is better informed on this subject—would he venture his property on the ocean in a trade contravening those orders? I would ask him further, would Brown and Ives, merchants, as remarkable for their prudence as for their enterprise, and for their capital as either; would they send their vessels to the Continent of Europe? I believe their opinion would corroborate the opinion of Mr. Gray.

The mercantile distresses have been described, with every possible exaggeration, as insufferable. The real distress, sir, is quite sufficient, without any undue coloring. I regret extremely, indeed, sir, from my heart and soul, I lament that the embargo should be considered as falling heavier on the merchant than on the planter. If I know my own heart, I would share with them to the last loaf. But compare their situation now with what it would have been, if their whole property had been swept away. Compare their present situation with that which must have been the necessary consequence of the seizure of all the floating, registered tonnage of the United States, and which would have happened, but for the embargo. Their vessels are now in safety; if the embargo had not been laid they would have lost both vessel and cargo. They must have either imposed an embargo on themselves, or exposed their capital to total destruction.

Another reason why I approve of the embargo, and which, really to my mind, is a very consolatory reason, is, it has at least preserved us thus far from bloodshed. I am one of those who believe the miseries of this life are sufficiently numerous and pressing without increasing either their number or pungency by the calamities inseparable from war. If we had put the question to every man in the nation, the head of a family, whether we should go to war, or lay an embargo, (the only choice we had,) nineteen out of twenty would have voted for the embargo. I believe, sir, the people of the United States confiding their honor and national character to your guardianship, would this day decide the same question in the same way. The people have nothing to gain by war, nothing by bloodshed; but they have everything to lose. From this reason results another, equally satisfactory; we are still free from an alliance with either of the belligerents. Upon a loss of peace inevitably follows an alliance with one of these two Powers. I would rather stake the fate of the nation on a war with both, than ally with either. No, sir, I never will consent to rush into the polluted, detestable, distempered embraces of the whore of England, nor truckle at the footstool of the Gallic Emperor.

But the embargo has failed, it has been triumphantly asserted on one side of the House, and echoed along the vaulted dome from the other. If it has, it is no cause of triumph; no, indeed, sir; but it is a cause of melancholy feelings to every true patriot, to every man who does not rejoice in the wrongs of his country. Why has the measure failed of expected success? The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. KEY) used an argument incomprehensible to me, as an argument in his favor; on my side it is indeed invincible. He has established, it was the evasions of the laws which prevented their being effectual. He tells you that certain evaders of the laws have so risen up in opposition to them, that the President of the United States was obliged to issue his Proclamation in April last; that this proclamation told the British Cabinet the people had rebelled against the embargo—but I will pass over the subject; it imposes silence on me, because it must speak daggers to the hearts of some men.

My friend from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) urged one argument against the embargo, which, to be sure, is a most serious one. He asked if we were prepared to violate the public faith? I hope not, sir. I beg to be excused for asking him (for I know he scorns submission as much as any man) if submission will pay the public debt? To that gentleman's acute and comprehensive mind, the deleterious consequences of the present system of the belligerents to our interests, must be glowing, self-evident. He will see that their present measures carry destruction to the most valuable interests, and are subversive of the most sacred rights of the people; and if they are submitted to, everything dear to an American must be afflicted with the slow, lingering, but certain approaches of consumption. I had rather go off at once. I have no opinion of a lingering death. Rather than the nation should be made to take this yoke, if so superlative a curse can be in store for us, may the hand of Heaven first annihilate that which cannot be nurtured into honor. I had much rather all should perish in one glorious conflict, than submit to this, so vile a system.

But we are told, that the embargo itself is submission. Indeed, sir! Then with all my heart, I would tear it from the statute book, and leave a black page where it stood. Is the embargo submission? By whom is it so called? By gentlemen who are for active offence? Do these gentlemen come forward and tell you that the embargo is submission? No such thing, sir. My memory deceives me, if any man who voted for the embargo thinks it submission. They are the original opponents of the embargo who call it submission, and who, while they charge you with the intention, are by every act and deed practising it themselves. It is incorrect, sir. Every gentleman who has spoken, and who has told you that the embargo is submission, has acknowledged the truth of the resolution under consideration; it has not been denied by a single individual. Suppose then we were to change its phraseology, and make it the preamble to a resolution for repealing the embargo, it will then read: whereas "the United States cannot without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain." Therefore resolved, that the embargo be repealed, and commerce with Great Britain permitted. Do these two declarations hang together, sir? That, because we cannot submit to the edicts of the belligerents, we will therefore open a free trade with them? The first part of the proposition is true, no man has denied it; the addition which I have made to it then, is the discordant part, and proves the embargo is not submission. I wish to know of gentlemen, whether trading with the belligerents, under their present restrictions on commerce, would not be submission? Certainly, sir. Is then a refraining from so doing, submission? In a word, is resistance submission? Was the embargo principle considered submission in the days of the stamp act? Did the nation call it submission when it was enacted under General Washington? Was it so considered by the Republicans, when resorted to for redress against the primary violations in 1793? Or was it ever contended that had not the embargo been raised, the terms of Jay's treaty would have been worse? Do gentlemen of the "old school" undertake to say that the Father of their Country submitted then to George III? I hope not, sir. If the embargo was not submission under George Washington, it is not under Thomas Jefferson. Again, I ask, were the principles of the embargo submission in 1774-'5-'6? But it has been replied, it is not meet that the remedies of that day should be applied to the present case. Why not, sir? The disease was the same; and lest gentlemen have forgotten what it was, I will tell them how the old Congress described it: "You exercised unbounded sovereignty over the sea, you named the ports and nations to which alone our merchandise should be carried, and with whom alone we should trade." Draw the parallel, sir, and if the remedy of that period will not suit the present crisis, let us look out for others. I will not stop here; I am willing to go further; I would carry fire and sword into the enemy's quarters; but I would first exhaust every means to preserve peace.

You will excuse me, sir, for giving an opinion in this place, which, perhaps, some gentlemen may think, does not result from the subject immediately before us. I will tell you what description of people in the United States are most anxious that the embargo should not be repealed. It is a new sect, sir, sprung up among us—ultra-federalists. They are the persons, in my belief, who are most desirous the embargo should be continued. They see that upon its removal a war with Great Britain follows. An alliance with her is the object nearest their hearts—not a resistance of the wrongs and insults practised by her. If this embargo be submission, if non-intercourse be submission, if a prompt preparation for war be submission, I ask them what is it to sit still and do nothing? Do you mean to submit? Come out and tell the nation whether you will or will not resist the Orders in Council—let us know it—it is desirable that we should know it—it will conduce to the public weal.

I, for one, sir, will vote to continue the embargo, because I do still consider it a coercive measure—as the most deadly weapon we can use against Great Britain. I am induced to consider it so, when I take a view of what is the nature of our products—what is the nature of her exports and imports—what is the nature of her wants, and what her capacity and means of supply. Look at the West Indies, where the embargo has a decided ascendancy over every other measure you can adopt. You will find that her colonial and navigation system has, in that quarter, never been maintained since the Revolution. Perhaps I ought, in presuming to speak further about the West Indies, to apologize to the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. KEY,) not indeed for his very courtly conduct, because if a man is ignorant, he does not like to be told of it. The gentleman will be pleased to pardon me, if I blunder on in my ignorant way, and talk a little more of that part of the world. [Mr. KEY explained that he had not intended any reference to the gentleman from South Carolina in his remarks.] I am extremely obliged to the gentleman for his explanation. Entertaining great respect for his talents, I am happy to find, upon such authority, the charge is neither applicable nor intended. The colonial system has been always regarded as essential to all the vital interests of Great Britain. Every relaxation of that system has excited murmurs and great discontent in the mother country, and yet they have been constantly produced by the wants of the colonies. Would they have been permitted in favor of the United States, could those wants be supplied from any other quarter? I must contend, then, that their profitable existence depends upon an intercourse with the United States, notwithstanding everything which has been said to the contrary. I do not mean to involve the idea of absolute starvation; much less to insinuate that the embargo is so coercive as to humble Great Britain at our feet; far from it—but I do say, from the nature of their products, their profitable existence depends upon us. There are not contained within the whole British Empire at this time, whatever there may have been previous to the American Revolution, supplies for the home and colonial consumption. Will gentlemen tell us from whence they are to procure the principal articles of provisions and lumber? I might rest the argument in safety on these articles alone; these are essential, and of our produce. All the evasions of the embargo have been made with a view to that supply; enforce it, and from whence will they procure the article of lumber? It bears a higher price and is more scarce in Great Britain, even in ordinary times, than in the West Indies. The opinion that Nova Scotia and Canada were adequate to that supply, has been long since abandoned. The articles of their produce require a constant supply of our materials, some of them cannot be procured from any other part of the world; of the lumber received, we have heretofore furnished ninety-nine parts out of one hundred. But we are told they can raise corn. Who denies it? I will grant to gentlemen all they ask on that point, and add, too, that their corn is actually more valuable per bushel than that of this country; but when their labor and industry is directed to that object, what becomes of their cotton, sugar, and coffee cultivation? What becomes of the immense revenues derived from those sources? Gentlemen must not forget that at least one-third of her revenue accruing from commerce, is derived from the West India trade alone. I do not know that I should be wrong, if I were to say from sugar and coffee only. If you drive them to the cultivation of corn for subsistence, they must necessarily abandon the cultivation of their most valuable staples. And do gentlemen believe Great Britain is willing to sacrifice all these considerations to a refusal to do you justice? We do not require justice, for all we ask of her is to abstain from plundering us. We say to her "hands off;" we wish not to come into collision with you; let us alone. These sacrifices will not be much longer hazarded, unless indeed she is deluded into a belief that she has sufficient influence, in this country, to excite disaffection and insurrection, and thereby remove the cause of pressure.

Another objection with me to removing the embargo, is, it will betray a timid, wavering, indecisive policy. If you will study the sentiments contained in Mr. Canning's note, you will find they afford a lesson of instruction, which you ought to learn and practise upon. "To this universal combination His Majesty has opposed a temperate, but a determined retaliation upon the enemy; trusting, that a firm resistance would defeat their project; but knowing that the smallest concession would infallibly encourage a perseverance in it." I beg the House to draw instruction from this otherwise detestable paper—it preaches a doctrine to which I hope we shall become proselytes. A steady perseverance in our measures will assist us, almost as much as the strength of them.

I conceive the supplies necessary for the maintenance of the war with Spain and Portugal will fairly come into the calculation. It has become the duty and interest of Great Britain to maintain the cause of Spain and Portugal—she has made it so. Where will those supplies be drawn from? Does she produce them at home? Certainly not; for it cannot be forgotten that the average importation of flour alone at Liverpool is ninety thousand barrels annually. The Baltic is closed against her. The demand must be great; for Spain and Portugal in times of peace have regularly imported grain for their own consumption. And here I will observe, there is no attribute in my nature which induces me to take sides with those who contend for a choice of masters. So far as they are fighting for the right of self-government, God send them speed; but at this peculiar crisis I think it extremely important that our sympathies should not be enlisted on the side of either of the contending parties. I would, therefore, from Spain and Portugal withhold our supplies, because through them we coerce Great Britain.

But that pressure which Great Britain feels most, is most alive to, is at home. The last crop is short, and injured in harvesting; wheat is fourteen shillings the bushel, and rising. Her millions of poor must be supplied with bread, and what has become almost equally important, she must furnish employment to her laborers and manufacturers. Where can the necessary supply of cotton be procured? For, thank God! while we are making a sacrifice of that article, it goes to the injury of Great Britain, who oppresses us, and whose present importation is not equal to one-half her ordinary consumption. If the manufacturer is to be thrown out of employ, till that raw material which is now the hypothesis of the day, is produced from Africa, the ministry who are the cause of it will not long rule the destinies of that nation. No, sir, I am not alarmed about supplies of cotton from Africa. Nor am I to be frightened out of the embargo by a fear of being supplanted in the market, from that quarter; they must be but little read indeed in political economy, who can dread a competition with barbarians, in the cultivation of the earth.

Another strong inducement with this House to continue and enforce the embargo, is, that while it presses those who injure us, it preserves the nation in peace. I see no other honorable course in which peace can be maintained. Take whatever other project has been hinted at, and war inevitably results. While we can procrastinate the miseries of war, I am for procrastinating; we thereby gain the additional advantage of waiting the events in Europe. The true interests of this country can be found only in peace. Among many other important considerations, remember, that moment you go to war, you may bid adieu to every prospect of discharging the national debt. The present war of all others should be avoided; being without an object, no man can conjecture its termination; for as was most correctly observed by my friend, (Mr. MAÇON,) the belligerents fight everybody but one another. Every object for which the war was originally begun and continued to 1806, has since that time become extinct. The rupture in the negotiations of that day was made not on points affecting directly the British interest, but grew out of the indirect concern she felt in maintaining those urged by Russia, which Power, having since declared war against Great Britain, has obliterated the then only existing object of the war. Embark in it when you please, it will not procure you indemnity for the past; and your security for the future must ultimately depend on the same promises, which you can obtain by peaceable means. I have no disposition, sir, to hazard the interest of my country in a conflict so undefined, so interminable!

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

But, say gentlemen, it is certainly not submission to trade to those ports which the edicts of the belligerents have not prohibited us from trading with. Granted—I will not enter into a calculation on the subject, as to how much importance the trade would be of to us. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has told you it would be contemptible in amount; but, sir, I say this, because I consider it expedient to continue the embargo, to withhold our supplies from those who need them, I will not permit you to go to those countries. Repeal the embargo in part! No; sir. Give merchants one single spot anywhere out of the jurisdiction of your own country, as large as the square of this House, and they would carry away the whole of our surplus produce. Give them a little island on which to place the fulcrum of their lever, and Archimedes like, they will move your whole trade. Let them go to Demarara, to Gottenburg, or any other burg, and it is to the whole world. But the trade to Spain and Portugal has been held up as highly profitable to the merchants of the United States. The gentlemen who venture this opinion have not, perhaps, considered the subject with all the attention it is entitled to. It appears to me to be demonstrable from the documents, and the knowledge of circumstances which we possess, that Great Britain, with the extension of plunder the Orders in Council warranted, is not satisfied. She was not content that she had laid a snare whereby she intercepted our whole commerce to Europe. She then permitted us (no doubt from extreme moderation,) to trade with the French colonies, taking care, at the same time, to force a direction of that trade in a channel which could not fail to yield a tributary supply to her exchequer. She has now interdicted, by orders secretly issued, that commerce also. The language of Cochrane's proclamation cannot be misunderstood. What a harvest he would have reaped from the robbery of your merchantmen, had the embargo been raised, as was expected by the British Cabinet, at the commencement of the session. The Orders in Council would have taken all your property going to continental Europe, and those of the Admiralty would have swept the West India traders. I believe the idea of enjoying a free trade to Spain and Portugal is altogether illusory. Mr. Canning has told us, not in totidum verbis, but certainly in effect, that we should be permitted to trade with those countries, only under the Orders in Council. In answer to the proposition made by Mr. Pinkney to suspend the embargo as to Great Britain, for a suspension of the Orders in Council as to the United States, the British Minister replied in the most peremptory manner possible. Here let me observe, that had that suspension been agreed to, the embargo would have co-operated with the Orders in Council against France. It would have been even much more efficacious than those orders, inasmuch as our own regulations would have interdicted all commerce with France. The professed object of the Orders in Council, retaliation on the enemy, cannot therefore be real—they originated, as they have been executed, in a spirit of deadly hostility against us. That the operation of those orders would be extended to Spain and Portugal, should the embargo be repealed in part, I infer from this positive assertion of the British Secretary. "It is not improbable, indeed, that some alterations may be made in the Orders in Council; as they are at present framed; alterations calculated not to abate their spirit or impair their principle, but to adapt them more exactly to the different state of things which has fortunately grown up in Europe, and to combine all practicable relief to neutrals with a more severe pressure upon the enemy." Here is not only a denial of suspension, but a threat, that alterations will be made (no doubt in tender mercy to us,) not to abate their spirit, but to adapt their operation more extensively to our ruin. What is the state of things alluded to? Let every gentleman who seeks after truth, candidly inquire for himself, what is the state of things which Mr Canning considers has so fortunately grown up in Europe. Can it be anything but the revolutions in Spain and Portugal? If the Orders in Council are not to be impaired, but their operation rendered more applicable to the present state of things, a fortiori, you are to be cut off from the south of Europe, in the same manner as you are from France and her dependencies. And are you ready to repeal the embargo under such a threat as this? This note, sir, is sarcastic to the last degree; in it I read insult added to the atrocious injuries my country has received; there is but one part of it which can be looked at with patience, and that is the valuable admonition I have read.

Some gentlemen have gone into a discussion of the propriety of encouraging manufactures in this country. I heard with regret the observations of the gentleman from Virginia, on this subject. I will be excused by him for offering my protest against those sentiments. I am for no high protecting duties in favor of any description of men in this country. Extending to him the equal protection of the law, I am for keeping the manufacturer on the same footing with the agriculturist. Under such a system, they will increase precisely in that proportion which will essentially advance the public good. So far as your revenue system has protected the interests of your merchants, I am sincerely rejoiced; but I can consent to no additional imposition of duty, by way of bounty to one description of persons, at the expense of another, equally meritorious. I deplore most sincerely the situation into which the unprecedented state of the world has thrown the merchant. A gentleman from Massachusetts has said, they feel all the sensibility for the mercantile interest, which we feel for a certain species of property in the Southern States. This appeal is understood, and I well remember, that some of their representation were among the first who felt for our distressing situation, while discussing the bill to prohibit the importation of slaves. I feel all the sympathy for that interest now, which was felt for us then; but I ask if it is not sound policy to encourage the patriotism of our merchants to support still longer the sacrifices, which the public exigencies call for, with spirit and resolution? If they should suffer most from our present situation, it is for their immediate advantage that we are contending. I must be allowed in continuation to say, that, although I do not profess to be one of the exclusive protectors of commerce, I am as willing to defend certain rights of the merchant, as the rights of the planter. Thus far I will go; I will assist in directing the physical strength of the nation to the protection of that commerce which properly grows out of the produce of the soil; but no further. Nor am I therefore disposed to limit the scene of his enterprise. Go up to Mocha, through the Dardanelles, into the South seas. Search for gums, skins, and gold, where and when you please; but take care, it shall be at your own risk. If you get into broils and quarrels, do not call upon me, to leave my plough in the field, where I am toiling for the bread my children must eat, or starve, to fight your battles.

It has been generally circulated throughout the Eastern States, in extracts of letters, said to be from members of Congress, (and which I am certainly sorry for, because it has excited jealousies, which I wish to see allayed,) that the Southern States are inimical to commerce. So far as South Carolina is concerned in the general implication, I do pronounce this a gross slander, an abominable falsehood, be the authors whom they may. The State of South Carolina is now making a most magnanimous sacrifice for commercial rights.

Will gentlemen be surprised when I tell them, South Carolina is interested, by the suspension of our trade, in the article of cotton alone, to an amount greater than the whole revenue of the United States? We do make a sacrifice, sir; I wish it could be consummated. I should rejoice to see this day all our surplus cotton, rice, flour and tobacco burnt. Much better would it be to destroy it ourselves, than to pay a tribute on it to any foreign Power. Such a national offering, caused by the cupidity and oppression of Great Britain, would convince her, she could not humble the spirit of freemen. From the nature of her products, the people of South Carolina can have no interest unconnected and at variance with commerce. They feel for the pressure on Boston, as much as for that on Charleston, and they have given proofs of that feeling. Upon a mere calculation of dollars and cents—I do from my soul abhor such a calculation where national rights are concerned—if South Carolina could thus stoop to calculate, she would see that she has no interest in this question—upon a calculation of dollars and cents, which I repeat, I protest against, it is perfectly immaterial to her whether her cotton, rice, and tobacco, go to Europe in English or American vessels. No, sir, she spurned a system which would export her produce at the expense of the American merchant, who ought to be her carrier. When a motion was made last winter for that kind of embargo, which the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. KEY) was in favor of; for he says he gave his advice to do that very thing, which if adopted would cut up the navigation interest most completely, (an embargo on our ships and vessels only;) South Carolina could have put money in her pocket, (another favorite idea with the gentleman,) by selling her produce to foreigners at enormous prices; her representatives here unanimously voted against the proposition; and her Legislature, with a magnanimity I wish to see imitated throughout the United States, applauded that vote—they too said they would unanimously support the embargo, at the expense of their lives and fortunes. She did not want an embargo on our ships, and not on produce. No, sir; she knows we are linked together by one common chain—break it where you will, it dissolves the tie of union. She feels, sir, a stroke inflicted on Massachusetts, with the same spirit of resistance that she would one on Georgia. The Legislature, the representatives of a people with whom the love of country is indigenous, told you unanimously, that they would support the measures of the General Government. Thank God, that I am the Representative of such a State, and that its representatives would not accept of a commerce, even at the advice of the gentleman from Maryland, which would profit themselves at the expense of their Eastern brethren. Feeling these sentiments, I cannot but say, in contradiction to what fell from the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GIBSON,) I should deplore that state of things which offers to the merchant the lamentable alternative, beggary or the plough. I would say to the merchant, in the sincerity of my heart, bear this pressure with manly fortitude, if the embargo fails of expected benefit, we will avenge your cause. I do say so, and believe the nation will maintain the assertion.

It is with reluctance I feel compelled, before I resume my seat, to make a few observations in reply to what fell from the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. KEY) yesterday. The gentleman commenced his address by contradicting the statements made by a gentleman from Massachusetts, and my worthy friends from Virginia and Georgia (Messrs. RANDOLPH and TROUP.) He told you their districts could not feel the embargo most, as it was in his the sufferings were most severe. I shall not waste the time of the House by an inquiry into the truth of this assertion; nor, sir, will I enter into a competition of this sort. I aim at a distinction far more glorious. The State I represent in pari, bears the embargo the best. This it is my pride to boast of. There, sir, there are no murmurs, no discontent at the exertions of Government to preserve the rights of the nation. And as long as respect for the honor, and a hope of the salvation of the country exists, so long will they bear it, press as hard as it may.

The gentleman told you, in speaking of the Maryland elections, that the film is removed from the eyes of the people, and that in discerning their true interests, they saw it was the embargo, and not the Orders in Council, which oppresses them. He must feel confident indeed in the knowledge that he is two years in advance of his constituents, or he would not have ventured such an assertion. [Mr. KEY explained that he had said the film was removed, and the people saw that their distress arose more from the embargo than from the Orders in Council.] Mr. WILLIAMS continued: I have no intention to misrepresent the gentleman, but I understood him to say that the Orders in Council did not affect the continental market, but the Berlin decree; that the embargo caused all the pressure at home; that the Orders in Council had no part in producing that measure, and therefore I infer as his opinion, that the Orders in Council have not injured us. [Mr. KEY said that the few observations which he had made on this subject, were in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL,) that the people should be no longer deluded. In answer to this Mr. K. said he had observed that the people were not deluded—that the film was removed from their eyes, and that he then had gone on to show that the depression of produce arose from the embargo. But that he never had meant to say that the Berlin decree and Orders in Council were not injurious, because they lopped off a large portion of our commerce.]

I understood the gentleman to say (observed Mr. W.) that it was very strange we would not trust our merchants upon the subject of the embargo, who were the best judges. I wish to represent the gentlemen's sentiments correctly, and shall not consider him impolite, if I have mistated him, should he again stop me. Why, sir, is it strange? Are the merchants the guardians of the public honor? This I conceive to be the peculiar province of Congress, because to it alone has the Constitution confided the power to declare war. Will the gentleman trust the merchants with the guardianship of his own honor? No, sir, he chooses to protect it himself. And would he advise the nation to pursue a course disgraceful, and to which he would not expose himself? I will not trust the merchants in this case, nor any other class of men; not being responsible for the national character, they will trade anywhere, without regard to principle. So true is this, Desalines felt no uneasiness when informed of the law prohibiting all intercourse with St. Domingo; he replied, "hang up a bag of coffee in hell, and the American merchant will go after it." I am not sure that, in the evasions of the embargo, some of them have not already approached near its verge: certain I am, that, in a fair commerce, such is the enterprise and perseverance of their character, they will drive their trade as far as it can be driven. No, sir, I will not trust the merchant now, because he would do the very thing which the gentleman seems to wish, trade under the Orders in Council.

The embargo should be removed, because, says the gentleman, it has operated as a bounty to the British trade. I should be disposed to doubt this, if for no other reason than a knowledge of who advocates its removal. Before the embargo was laid, agricultural labor in the British West India islands, particularly on sugar estates, could scarcely support itself. I refer the gentleman to the documents printed by order of Parliament, and the memorials of the agent of Jamaica. He will find that the planters are in a distressed situation, not from their failure in the cultivation of the soil, but from the enormous duties on their produce in the mother country. Are the extravagant prices of articles of the first necessity, superadded to their former embarrassments, to operate as a bounty on their trade? I should be extremely gratified if the gentleman will inform us, what would have been the amount of bounty on the trade, if evasions of the embargo had not taken place. If the price of flour has been sixty dollars per barrel, and other articles in proportion, what would have been the price, had there been no evasions of the law? They could not have been procured at all: and yet we are told the embargo is a bounty on British trade! When the gentleman was, I had like to have said, justifying the Orders in Council, he should have favored us with a vindication of the smuggling proclamation also. Such a degree of corruption and of immorality never before, in any one paper, disgraced a civilized nation. The citizens of a country, at peace and in amity, enticed to evade their own laws! Is such an act calculated to induce the belief that the embargo operates as a bounty on British trade?

I shall not enter upon another question stirred by the gentleman, the constitutionality of the embargo law; the subject has become so stale, that even he could scarcely make it interesting. It has been laid asleep—a solemn adjudication has taken place and put it at rest. But the gentleman will excuse me for observing he made a most unfortunate allusion in the course of his argument. He said it was strange that, not having the power delegated to us to tax exports, we should undertake to prohibit them. The Orders in Council, which if the gentleman did not justify, he was certainly very tender of, do exercise that very power of taxing our exports, which by the Constitution we are prohibited, and that too when they are destined to a government equally sovereign and independent with that of Great Britain.

We have been referred by the gentleman to the history of the Revolution, and after a kind of encomium on the resources of Great Britain, the triumphs of her navy and her present imperious attitude, he demanded to know if we can expect she will yield to us now, when during the Revolution she maintained a war against the whole world, at the same time that she kept us at bay seven years and succeeded with every nation but her own sons—will she truckle at our feet now? The gentleman knows we do not seek to make her truckle at our feet; we wish her no injury; we ask of her no boon whatever; we only entreat her to let us alone; to abstain from wanton, unprovoked acts of oppression. What is the object of this language? Is it to tell us she never will redress our wrongs; or is it to divert us from a prosecution of our rights? The contest was very different with her at that time, from what it is now. She then contended against the dismemberment of her Empire. Will the gentleman say she values the principles of her Orders in Council, as she did the sovereignty of her colonies? What will the gentleman discover, by examining the history of the period he referred to? England, at that time, when France, Spain, Holland, and the United States, were opposed to her, when the armed neutrality in the north of Europe assailed her, when all these brought the principle of embargo to bear upon her, was nearer ruin than she ever was before or since. I refer him to Playfair's tables for the year 1781; there he will find the very principle proven, for which we are now contending. Does Great Britain now prize the plunder of your merchantmen, the impressment of your seamen, insult to your national flag, as much as she did the sovereignty of the soil? Certainly not; and yet she must, precisely the same, or she will not hold out now as she did then. When I recollect that her necessary annual expenditure is greater than the gross rent of all the landed property in her kingdom; that the armed neutrality affected her so materially, that the same principle is brought into operation again; that by withholding our custom, our supplies, our raw materials, we must necessarily destroy a large portion of her revenue, I cannot but hope, she will see her own interest in redressing our injuries. This is all we contend for, allow the experiment to be made; if not, at least propose some better remedy.

But said the gentleman, at the close of the Revolutionary war, we alone triumphed over the arms of Great Britain; defeat befell all the rest of the world. I will not contest that point with him, as he is old enough to speak from experience.

We were informed by the gentleman, that it was the Berlin decree, and not the Orders in Council, had destroyed our trade to the Continent of Europe. Here too we are directly at points.—The gentleman has not made himself master of his case, or has totally mistaken his evidence. I hold a document in my hand which, perhaps, the gentleman may object to, as coming from the opposition party in Great Britain; it is the depositions of sundry merchants of great wealth and respectability, taken before the British House of Lords, on the subject of the Orders in Council. Here Mr. W., read from the depositions the following questions and answers:

"If the American embargo were removed, and the Orders in Council still continued in force, in that case would the witness resume his shipments?"

"To a very small amount,

"For what reason?"

"Because I do conceive, that there would be such great impediments, indeed a total annihilation of trade from the United States of America to the Continent of Europe, that I could not expect to receive any returns for the goods I sent out; and another reason would be, my apprehension that a war between the United States and this country would be the consequence of those Orders in Council.

"What is the reason that the Orders in Council prevent the witness sending our cotton goods in ships in ballast?"

"I believe I stated my apprehension that they might produce a war between the two countries; another reason was, I could not expect to get remittances, and a total annihilation of the trade between the United States of America and the Continent of Europe, from whence a great part of my remittances must be derived.

"If the American embargo in general were taken off, and the Orders in Council to be continued, would his trade in that case revive?"

"I certainly should feel no inducement to export goods to America while the orders continued.

"Why not?"

"I should apprehend that hostilities between this country and America would be the consequence of continuing the Orders in Council.

"Would the Orders in Council have any other effect as to discouraging the trade?"

"They would have considerable effect in regard to our remittances.

"In what manner?"

"By bringing all the produce of America to this country, they must occasion such a vast glut in the market, that the produce would be worth little or nothing.

"In what degree would it affect the dealers in those commodities brought to this country, as to their remittances to this country?"

"The consequence I apprehend would be, that great part of the bills must go back protested; because the produce, for which the bills are drawn, would sell for scarcely the value of the freight and charges.

"Does the witness conceive, from his knowledge of the American trade, that if the whole of the American produce, which according to an average of years had been carried to the Continent of Europe, and to Great Britain, was now to be imported into Great Britain alone, and the Orders in Council to continue; whether it would be possible to export from Great Britain to the Continent, so much of the American produce as should prevent a glut of the American produce remaining in the market?

"I think it would be impossible.

"Have you lately written to your correspondents in America respecting shipments of American produce to this country?

"I have.

"To what effect have you so written?

"I have written that in case of submission to these Orders of Council, in case such a thing should take place, to suspend all operations.

"Did you give this advice to your American correspondents, upon the supposition that America would acquiesce in the Orders in Council?

"Certainly not, I stated it as a thing by no means likely; but, as there is nothing impossible in this world, that if it were so, not to move; that in case they were acquiesced in, not to attempt any business.

Considering (continued Mr. W.) these are the sentiments (delivered under the sacred obligation of an oath) of that very description of men, who the gentleman believes are the best judges and ought to be trusted, I am warranted in saying, they prove his position wholly unfounded. The gentleman's project last year was to lay the embargo on our ships and vessels, and to dispose of our produce, the effect of which would have been destruction to our own vessels, constant encouragement to those of Great Britain. I beg him to remember, that if two or three years hence, he should not stand as high with the American merchants as he could wish, it may be fairly attributed to this friendly protection of their immediate interests, which he would have extended to them.

The gentleman was equally unfortunate in saying, the destruction of St. Domingo had caused such a demand for sugar, that the cultivation of cotton in the British West India islands had been abandoned; he is not well versed on the subject, the fact not being as he has stated it. However great an impetus the destruction of St. Domingo may have given to the cultivation of sugar and coffee, in the British West Indies, it certainly had no effect in any way on that of cotton, the quantity of that article formerly exported from thence being too small to have any influence whatever. Our cotton will never be supplanted from that quarter. Could the sugar estates be converted to cotton plantations, so depressed has been their situation, that conversion would have been long since effected. Nor, sir, is it true, that the cultivation of cotton in the British West India islands has been abandoned; on the contrary, it has been regular though slow in its increase, compared with that of coffee. Crops of that kind are frequently precarious, owing to a natural enemy of the plant in those islands, and therefore the cultivation has not kept pace with the demand.

I heard the gentleman with pain and mortification, I repeat it, with pain and mortification I heard him declare that nations like individuals should pocket their honor for money. The act is base in an individual, in a nation infinitely worse. The gentleman was corrected by his colleague (Mr. NELSON) on this subject. He evidently, to my apprehension, expressed an opinion, that money was to be preferred to honor. He told us that honor in arbitrary governments was identified with the monarch, who went to war for his mistress; that in republics honor consisted in the opportunities afforded to acquire wealth, and by way of illustration said, we pocketed our honor for money in paying tribute to the Barbary Powers, for the security of a paltry trade. Does the gentleman mean to assimilate a tribute exacted by Great Britain with that paid to Algiers? Or does he mean to be understood as advising us, because we purchase peace with barbarians, involving no honorable consideration, to barter for a pecuniary reward, with Great Britain, our rights, our honor, and our independence? Detestable as this inference is, it results from his arguments. Repeal the embargo, throw open your trade to Great Britain; you can put money in your pocket by it. I want no substitute. Sir, if my tongue was in the thunder's mouth, then with a passion would I shake the world and cry out treason! This abandonment of our rights, this sacrifice of our independence I most solemnly abjure. Astonished indeed am I, that a gentleman so eloquent, so well qualified to uphold the honor and dignity of his country, should so abandon them! Is it possible such doctrine should be advocated on the floor of Congress? Has it come to this? Was it for this the martyrs of the Revolution died? Is this great Continent and the free millions who inhabit it, again to become appendages of the British Crown? Shall it again be held in its orbit by the attractive, the corruptive influence of the petty island of Great Britain? No. Sooner may you expect the sun with all the planetary system will rush from their shining spheres, to gravitate round a pebble. Remember, sir, it is no longer a contest singly about the carrying trade, or the impressment of seamen, or the insult to the national flag, but all united with the rights and attributes of sovereignty, even to the violation of the good old United States. You stand on the verge of destruction, one step, one movement backwards will stamp your character with indelible disgrace. You must now determine whether you will maintain the high station among nations, to which the virtues, the spirit of the people have elevated you, or sink into tributary vassalage and colonization. By all your rights, your duties, your awful responsibility, I charge you "choose ye this day whom ye will serve; but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

Mr. CULPEPPER spoke in opposition to the report.

Mr. Cook moved to adjourn. Mr. J. G. JACKSON called for the yeas and nays on the motion; but a sufficient number did not rise to justify the taking them. Motion to adjourn, negatived. Mr. Cook renewed the motion, observing that he had some remarks to make, which might occupy the House some time.—Carried, 54 to 50, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, December 10.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the establishment of a Turnpike Company in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act further to amend the judicial system of the United States," was read twice, and committed to Mr. MARION, Mr. HOLLAND, and Mr. KELLY, to consider and report thereon to the House.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee appointed the eleventh ultimo, on so much of the Message from the President of the United States as relates to the Military and Naval Establishments, presented a bill authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The House again proceeded to the consideration of the first resolution of the report made by the Committee of Foreign Relations.

Mr. Cook addressed the House at considerable length.

Mr. R. JACKSON said: Mr. Speaker, not having been in the habit of public speaking, it is with great diffidence I rise, to make any observations on the resolutions now under consideration, after so much has been said upon the subject. But, sir, knowing the deep stake that the portion of citizens which I have the honor to represent, and the United States at large, have in the present embarrassed state of our political affairs, was I to remain silent, sir, I should feel as if I was guilty of treachery to their interests. I shall not attempt to follow gentlemen in their arguments who have gone before me in the debate, but confine myself to make such observations on the resolutions and the state of our political affairs, as appear to me to be necessary and proper. By the first resolution we are called upon to declare "that the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain and France." Why we are called upon to make this declaration, I cannot conceive. I do not see the use of it, unless it is considered by the committee as a kind of test act, which they think ought to be administered to every member of the House, to ascertain whether they are of sound principles or not. I do not like such abstract propositions, I think them useless, as nothing can come from them in a legislative way; no bill can be formed from it; however I do not see anything at present to prevent me from voting for it. By the second resolution we are called upon to declare "that it is expedient to prohibit, by law, the admission into the ports and harbors of the United States of all public or private armed or unarmed ships or vessels belonging to Great Britain or France, or to any other of the belligerents having in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States; and also the importation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions of any of the said Powers, or imported from any place in the possession of either.

Here, sir, I shall take the liberty to dissent from the committee, for I do not think it to be expedient to join them in such a resolution as this. For I would ask, what are we to promise to ourselves from such a system as this; what will be the probable effects of it? Will it compel the great belligerent Powers to do us justice for past injuries and secure us for the future? If I thought it would, I would most cheerfully vote for it. But, sir, I have no reason to suppose it will, for we have now had considerable experimental knowledge of the effects of the embargo system, both as it respects ourselves and foreign Powers, and we have found from experience, that, as a coercive measure, it has had no effect. It has not compelled France or England to do us justice, or to rescind their unlawful edicts and decrees, issued against neutral commerce. And those nations having now experienced the effects of the embargo for nearly one year, whatever alarm it might have given them, when first laid on, that alarm has ceased. And we have it from high authority, that France cares nothing about it, and that in England, owing to the great events now passing in Europe, it is forgotten. And shall we still, with all this information and experience, adhere to this system, and still think we can legislate France and England into a committance to do us justice, and bring them to the bar of justice in this way? Far be it from me to censure any one, for the part they have taken in endeavoring to maintain the rights of our country, and giving security to the interest of our citizens. But, sir, I think, in the business of legislation, that the same line of conduct ought to be pursued, that we would pursue in the common and ordinary proceedings of life; for should any of us undertake to do anything, suppose it be to get a vessel afloat that had been stranded, and the means employed were totally inadequate to its accomplishment, should we not abandon those means and try some other? We have tried the embargo, and found it altogether ineffectual, and we have no reason to suppose, that by a further continuance of it, it will answer any of the purposes for which it was intended.

I will now take some view, as it appears to me, of what has been, and will be the effect of the embargo, if continued, as it respects ourselves. The burden of it has already been very great, on a large proportion of our citizens. It has been grievous, and very sore. For how otherwise can it be, when we consider, that all the navigation business, from one end to the other of these United States, is totally stopped, excepting a small remnant of our coasting trade, and that remnant under very great embarrassments; and all that numerous class of our citizens, dependent on commerce, deprived of their usual means of gaining a livelihood, and in consequence thereof thousands of them have been obliged to live on their former earnings, and consume that little property they had? treasured up for their future support and if the embargo is continued, the inevitable consequence must be, bankruptcy to many of our merchants, and absolute distress, misery, and want, to a large proportion of our citizens, who live in the seaport towns, and great embarrassments to all classes of citizens throughout our country. And if this system is continued, we must incur the hazard of having civil commotions in our country, for experience has proved, that when great distress prevails among the people, and that distress arises from political measures, which the people are divided in sentiment upon, the hazard is very great that civil commotions will take place. Some gentlemen have undertaken to show how much we have already lost by the embargo. But I shall not go into any calculation of this sort, for I am convinced that it defies calculation; it is impossible to follow it into all its turnings and windings. It is enough for me to know that the loss is immense, and that we have received such a shock by it, that it will require a long time to come, to recover from it. Gentlemen have also endeavored to point out such parts of the Union, as they think are suffering the most by the embargo. There is no doubt but that it does bear harder upon some portions than on others, and that it is unequal in its operation. But, sir, my idea is, that it bears the hardest upon that part of our citizens, where they are the most dependent on commerce for their living; and this being the case, in nearly as great a degree, perhaps, with the citizens of Rhode Island as in any part of the Union, it follows that my constituents are suffering as much as any portion of the United States.

But, sir, its pressure is upon the whole country, and it carries misery throughout our land; and if continued, the distress occasioned by it must still be much greater than it has been, and will become intolerable in some parts of the Union, and the consequences may be dreadful to the nation. And as to its effects on France or England, for myself, I am of opinion, that the Emperor of France and King of Italy is well pleased with it, for, as it is observed by Mr. Canning, "it certainly comes in aid" of his grand design, of destroying the commerce of the English, and trying to give that nation the consumption of the purse; and, until he is satisfied with that speculation, he will wish us to keep on the embargo. And since Spain and Portugal have refused any longer to be under the control of Bonaparte, and have bid him and all his hosts defiance, and have connected themselves with the English, I believe the English care nothing about the embargo, but would give us their free leave to keep it on forever; for, sir, it gives the greatest activity to their colonies of Canada and Nova Scotia, and must be the means of increasing their settlements with astonishing rapidity. Experience has already proved to them, that their colonies in the West Indies can be maintained without us, and Spain and Portugal and their colonies having become open to them, to vend their manufactures, and with what can be smuggled into the Continent and into our country, in spite of all the laws that can be made against it, will furnish them market enough; and our navigation being all laid up, and out of the way, their ships will obtain great freights from Spain and Portugal to the colonies, and from the colonies back to the mother country; and in consequence of our retiring into a state of dignified retirement, as it has been called, they will have nearly the whole trade of the world, in their own hands. And it appears to me, sir, in every point of view that I can place the subject, if we continue the embargo, it will operate to distress ourselves an hundred times more than it will any body else. I will now, as I have heard the call so frequently made, that, if you do not like this system, point out a better, and if it appears so, we will adopt it—I will therefore, point out, what appears to me, a better line of conduct for the United States to pursue, and if I am so unfortunate as not to find a man in this House of my opinion, I cannot help it, for I feel myself constrained, from a sense of duty to my suffering constituents, to inform this House and the nation, that I wash my hands of it, and protest against it. I therefore, sir, with great deference to superior abilities, propose that the law imposing an embargo on all ships and vessels of the United States, and all the laws supplementary thereto, be immediately repealed, and that we authorize our merchants to arm their vessels, under proper regulations, in defence of our legitimate and lawful commerce; that the Government from time to time afford the commerce of the country such protection as may be found necessary and prudent. If this was done, I have no doubt but that the citizens of the United States would soon be relieved from their present embarrassments and distress. This, sir, would produce a circulation in the body politic, our planters and farmers would immediately find a sale for their surplus produce, our merchants would find employ for their vessels, and all that numerous class of citizens who have heretofore been engaged in the active and busy scenes of commerce, would again find employ in our seaports. In lieu of beholding dismantled ships covered with boards and mats, we should see in them spars and rigging aloft, and the ports whitened with their sails, and again hear the cheering sound of industry. But it has been said that if the embargo was removed and our merchants should send their vessels to sea, most of the property would be taken by one or other of the great belligerent Powers, and thus be lost to our country; and that we have so little trade left that it is not worth our notice. But let us examine this, and see if it be so. Could we not, sir, in the present state of the world, trade to England, Scotland, and Ireland, to Sweden, Spain and Portugal, to some of the islands in the Mediterranean, and some of the Turkish ports on that sea; to nearly all the ports in the East and West Indies, to both sides of the continent of South America, and some other places, and have the obstruction occasioned by the embargo laws removed from our own coast? Is all this trade of no importance to trading people? Gentlemen have gone into statements to show, from our former trade, how much of our domestic produce could be exported to the different part of the world, under the present embarrassments, occasioned by the great belligerent Powers; but for myself I put no confidence in such statements. I consider trade may in some measure be compared to water; if the channel it has been used to run in becomes obstructed, it will find new channels to vent itself in. For instance, sir, suppose we should adopt the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MUMFORD.) He mentioned that we could trade to the little Swedish island of St. Bartholomews, in the West Indies. Now suppose we should look over our former exports to this island in any one year, what should we find the amount to be? I do not know, sir, perhaps one hundred thousand dollars, but double, triple it if you please, and what comparison would it bear, with the amount that would be shipped there, under his system? Would it not immediately become a distributing point for the whole of the West India islands, and the amount increased to an astonishing degree, when compared with what used to be exported there? And so it would be in other parts of the world. The articles will go where they are wanted, in a greater or less degree; and if they cannot be carried directly, they will find their way in an indirect manner. And as to the danger of the property being captured and confiscated, I think our merchants and underwriters are the most competent to judge of that. They do not wish the Government to become guardians for them in this respect. All they wish for Government to do, is to let them manage their own affairs in their own way; and the Government to afford the commerce of the country as much protection as shall be for the real interest of the whole nation. Have we not seen, in the Summer past, with what eagerness the merchants in the United States availed themselves of the special permission granted to fit their vessels in ballast, and go abroad to collect debts? And was not every old and obsolete claim hunted up, that existed in the country, to make out the amount necessary to avail themselves of this permission? Is not this proof that the merchants did not consider the risk very great? And was not several hundred sail of vessels fitted out under this permission; and have they not nearly all returned back to the United States in safety? Many of these vessels were insured to the West Indies, out and home, at premiums of about eight and nine per cent., and this in the midst of the hurricane season. This proves that the underwriters did not estimate the political risk at more than two or three per cent., for the natural perils in time of profound peace would be considered equal to six per cent. And the calculation of the underwriters has proved correct, for they have made money by the business. And was our embargo removed, I am of opinion, that the premiums of insurance would not be more than six or seven per cent. to any port in Great Britain, and about the same to Spain and Portugal. This, if correct, proves that the political risk is not considered to be very great by those who are the best judges of it. But, sir, it appears to me, there are many gentlemen in this House who think it will not do to trade, until all political risk is removed out of the way. If we wait for this, we shall never trade any more, for the natural perils of traversing the ocean always exist, and always remain nearly the same, allowing for the variation of the seasons. And the political perils always exist, but they vary according to the state of political affairs among the nations of the world. But, sir, I have repeatedly heard it said, and the same thing is expressed in the report of the committee, that our situation is such, that we have no other alternative than a war, with both Great Britain and France, submission, or a total suspension of our commerce.

The committee have sir, after a long statement, brought our affairs up to this point, and I do not like any of the alternatives, out of which they say we must make a choice, for I do not believe that we are reduced to this dilemma; and I will not agree to go to war with both England and France, nor will I agree to submit, or to totally suspend our commerce. But I will agree to give our merchants liberty to arm their vessels, under proper regulations, in defence of our legitimate commerce, and leave it to them to send their vessels for trade where they please; and if any of them are so unwise as to trust their property to France, or to any ports in Europe where the French control, let them fight their way there if they choose. I see no other course, sir, that we can pursue, that will be so much for the interest and honor of our country, as the one pointed out. The American people are a cool, calculating people, and know what is best for their interest, as well if not better than any nation upon earth, and I have no idea that they will support the Government in a ruinous war with England, under the present existing circumstances, nor in measures depriving them of all trade and commerce.

Mr. MUMFORD then offered a few observations in answer to the remarks of Mr. GHOLSON of Virginia. During the discussion, six different motions were made for an adjournment, the last of which, offered by Mr. GARDENIER, was carried—yeas 58, nays 48.

MONDAY, December 12.

Mr. MUMFORD presented a memorial of the surviving officers of the late Revolutionary Army and Navy of the State of New York, praying that they may receive the difference of the interest of six per cent. on their final settlement certificates for the years 1782 and 1783, and on the commutation certificates from the 1st of January, 1784, to the 1st of January, 1791, which were funded at three per cent.; also, ten years' interest upon one-third of the principal of their respective final settlement and commutation notes, which constituted the six per cent. deferred stock.

that there was anything improper in the motion itself—far otherwise—but because he was not perfectly sure whether, previous to making it, he ought not to request the galleries of the House to be cleared. But, inasmuch as the motion itself could convey nothing to the spectators in the galleries which would be improper to disclose, and it would be competent for the Chair to decide whether the discussion (if any should arise) ought to be carried on with closed doors or not, perhaps it would be better, in the first instance, to submit the motion with the doors open, because he knew what sensations the closing the doors of the House frequently excited. The public had already seen, by the supplemental journal of proceedings with closed doors, the fate of several motions made in order to give publicity to several communications from our Ministers abroad. They had also seen, he presumed, because he had seen in the public newspapers, a letter purporting to be written by a member of this House, (Mr. SAWYER,) containing what was stated to be a disclosure of those despatches in substance. It could not be forgotten that, during the discussion of propositions to give publicity to those communications, gentlemen, one in particular from Massachusetts, had conceived that nothing could be more unhappy than to give, substantially, their contents; that it would be infinitely better, in fact, to publish them verbatim, than to give what each individual might choose to call their substance. And Mr. R. said it was well known that his worthy friend from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) though zealous for their publication, had voted against giving permission to any individual to make public what he thought to be their substance.

It was with extreme reluctance, Mr. R. said, that he had drawn into question the name of any member of this House, particularly of one who was not present. He said he had deferred the motion which he was about to submit, in hopes that the gentleman whose name had been used by the public papers would be present to inform the House whether his name had been properly used by the public papers or not. He wished not to be understood as vouching for the proof of the fact; but the impression on the public mind was the same from that letter as if it had actually been written by the member in question; and it must be well known to every member of this House—and that, as far as it went, was a proof that it had not been written by the gentleman in question—that the letter did not contain, substantially, the amount of the despatches. He said he perceived in that printed letter that an important letter of General Armstrong, he thought of the 22d. of February, was not alluded to at all. He thought it important not only that the public should see what the members themselves had seen, that they should know what they knew, but that they should be apprized of what, in his opinion, was not of much less consequence, of what the House did not know. For this purpose, he said, he would again submit a motion to the House which had been once rejected, upon ground which, in his opinion, could not at this moment have weight, since the principal objection consisted in the impropriety of permitting anything purporting to be the contents of the communications to be known, on account of the misrepresentation to which they might be liable.

Mr. RANDOLPH then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy imposed on the communication from our respective Ministers at Paris and London, which accompanied the President's Message of the 8th instant, be taken off, with the exception of the extract of a letter from General Armstrong to the Secretary of State, dated Paris, December 27th, 1807.

The SPEAKER observed that, in his opinion, the rules of the House required that this resolution should be considered with closed doors.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the galleries were accordingly cleared, and so remained for about an hour and an half, when they were again opened. Whilst the doors were closed, the question on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion was taken, after debate, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Burwell Bassett, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, John Culpeper, John Davenport, jun., Daniel M. Durell, James Elliot, William Ely, Barent Gardenier, James M. Garnett, Edwin Gray, John Harris, William Hoge, Richard Jackson, Robert Jenkins, James Kelly, Thomas Kenan, Philip B. Key, Joseph Lewis, jun., Edward St. Loe Livermore, Matthew Lyon, Nathaniel Macon, Josiah Masters, John Morrow, Jonathan O. Mosely, Gurdon S. from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Andrew Joseph Villard;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The report of the Committee on our Foreign Relations being still under consideration—

Mr. GARDENIER commenced a speech against the measures of the present Administration generally, and the embargo in particular. When he had been speaking about an hour—

Mr. UPHAM observed that the usual hour of adjournment (about half past two o'clock) had arrived, and the gentleman appeared not to have nearly finished. He therefore moved to adjourn.

Mr. GARDENIER giving way for the purpose of permitting a question to be taken on the motion, Mr. J. JACKSON called for the yeas and nays on it, giving as a reason his desire that the public should know who were willing to protract public business thus. The motion for adjournment was negatived—yeas 47, nays 65.

After Mr. GARDENIER had spoken about twenty minutes longer—

Mr. QUINCY observed that the gentleman from New York appeared to be much exhausted, and renewed the motion for adjournment.—Carried—yeas 67.

TUESDAY, December 13.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of dividing the Indiana Territory; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. THOMAS, Mr. KENAN, Mr. BASSETT, Mr. TAGGART, and Mr. SMILIE, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the resolutions of the House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory, which were read and ordered to lie on the table on the fourteenth ultimo, were referred to the select committee last appointed.

Mr. MARION, from the committee to whom was referred, on the tenth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act further to amend the Judicial System of the United States," reported the bill to the House without amendment: Whereupon the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Andrew Joseph Villard," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what farther provision ought to be made by law, prescribing the manner in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings, of one State, shall be proved and given in evidence in another State, and the effect thereof; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. DAVID R. WILLIAMS, Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON, Mr. KEY, and Mr. QUINCY, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplemental to an act entitled 'An act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds, in certain cases, and for other purposes;'" also, a bill, entitled "An act to change the post route from Annapolis to Rockhall, by Baltimore to Rockhall;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The report of the Committee on Foreign Relations still under consideration—

Mr. GARDENIER occupied the floor, in continuation of his observations of yesterday, for four hours.

The following is Mr. GARDENIER's speech entire:

Mr. Speaker, I had intended to defer the delivery of my sentiments upon the second resolution, until that resolution should come before the House. But the course which the debate has taken, has produced a change in my original intention.

That the first resolution is an unnecessary one, because no clear, definite, practical results can flow from it, appears to me self-evident. Are the people of this country suspected of an intention to abandon their rights or their independence? Indeed, sir, they are not. Why then is it, that we are called upon to make a new declaration of independence? Or was the Administration conducted in such a manner as to make the firmness and patriotism of the nation itself doubted abroad? Even I, sir, who am not suspected of a blind confidence in our rulers, will not advance such a charge.

The true question is not, Is the matter expressed in this abstract proposition true? But, Is it necessary that a resolution containing it should be passed by this House? I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. CAMPBELL) that it would be no less ridiculous to pass this resolution than to pass one that the sun shines. Allowing both to be true, both are equally unnecessary to be embodied in a resolution of this House. Begin this system of abstract legislation, and where are you to stop? Sir, it partakes too much of the character of disturbed, revolutionary times. To such a blasphemous height was this notion of voting abstract propositions or declarations, or truisms (call them what you will) carried at one time in France, that their Convention very gravely decreed "that there was a God!" This was a self-evident truth; and being so could not become more so by being decreed. And if the edicts of Great Britain and France go to the destruction of our "rights, honor, and independence," our voting that such is their operation, makes it neither more nor less true.

But, it is said, a select committee have placed the resolution before us, and we are bound to vote whether the assertions it contains are true or false. Why, sir, if I should offer a resolution that at this moment the sun shines, and some one should second me, would it be contended that this House ought gravely to proceed to the question? and if any member should say, "I vote against this resolution because it is too true to be made more so; and because, therefore, I think it unnecessary to be passed," that he, sir, should be considered blind?

DECEMBER, 1808.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

Again, gentlemen, some too with whom I am in the habit of acting, say, at the worst, the resolution is harmless—it ties you down to no specific course, and therefore you may as well vote for it; that to vote against it, will afford a handle against our popularity—that the resolution itself is an artful one—a trap set to catch the Federalists, as it will hold them up to suspicion, if they vote against it—for the vote will appear upon the Journals, when the argument is not to be found there. Well, sir, if it be in truth a trap to catch poor Federalism in, I, for one, sir, am willing to be caught. I never deceived the people whom I have the honor to represent, either by giving a vote to the propriety of which my judgment was opposed, or by professing opinions which I did not entertain; and, sir, I trust in God, I never shall. The applause of my constituents is dear to me. But I would rather strive to deserve it—than, not deserving, to receive it. Yes, sir, my course shall be always a plain one—a straightforward course. I have not acquired the confidence of my constituents by increasing their delusions. I have always labored to disperse them. At my first election to this House, a decided majority of them were opposed to my politics. The thought has often distressed me. But the cause of that distress exists no longer. And, therefore, sir, I will go on discharging my duty with the most scrupulous obedience to my judgment, and where the weight of a hair ought to turn the scale, it shall turn it.

But if I had no other objection against this abstract, "harmless" resolution, there is one which would be decisive: I would reject it on account of "the company it keeps." The committee, for reasons which I shall not stop to disclose, have thought it important to introduce this, by way of propping the second one. That second one, sir, the undoubted object and inevitable tendency of which my whole soul recoils from, which I abhor and deprecate, as fatal to the prosperity and happiness of my country—as the grave of its honor—and I fear I do not go too far when I add, of its independence! that resolution is not alone submission to France; but, under the pretence of resisting her infractions of the laws of nations, her violations of the sacred rights of hospitality, her laughing to scorn the obligation of treaties—it makes us submit to all—to encourage a perseverance in all. Nay, sir, it throws the whole weight of our power into her scale, and we become not only the passive, but, to the whole extent of our means, the active instruments of that policy which we affect to abhor. This, sir, unhappily, is capable of the most clear demonstration; and, in the proper place, it shall appear so. I enter now upon the discussion of the second resolution. And although I am aware how little professions of sincerity and embarrassment are generally regarded; and, indeed, how little they ought to be regarded, yet I cannot approach this awful subject without declaring that I feel as if I was about to enter the sanctuary of our country's independence; and I tremble with the same fearful distrust of my powers, the same distressing perplexity which would embarrass me if I had entered the labyrinth in which was concealed the secret of that country's honor, prosperity, and glory. I do feel, sir, that we should enter upon the discussion of this question divested of all the prejudices and passion of party—no less than all foreign predilections and animosities—with clean hearts, sir; yes, hearts seven times purified, to prepare them for the discharge of the sacred, the holy duties of this awful crisis. He who can come to this debate with other motives than to save his country, placed as it is on the brink of a dreadful precipice, deserves to be heard nowhere but in the cells of the Inquisition. The sound of his voice should never be suffered to pollute the Hall of the Representatives of the American people. But he who, thinking that he has traced the causes and the progress of our misfortunes, and that he may, perhaps, point the nation to a path which may lead it back to the prosperous position it has been made to abandon, would be a traitor to the State, if any considerations could keep him silent.

In my view, sir, we have gone on so long in error—our affairs have been suffered to run on, year after year, into so much confusion, that it is not easy to say what should be done. But if it is magnanimous to retract error, certainly it is only the performance of a sacred duty, which their servants owe the people, to abandon a system which has produced only disappointment and disasters hitherto, and promises only ruin and disgrace in future.

The time, sir, has been, when the Government was respected at home and abroad, when the people were prosperous and happy, when the political body was in high, in vigorous health; when America rejoiced in the fulness of her glory, and the whole extent of the United States presented a scene unknown in any other country, in any other age. Behold now the mournful contrast, the sad reverse! We are "indeed fallen, fallen from our high estate!" The nation is sick—sick at heart. We are called upon to apply a remedy; and none will answer which shall not be effectual. No quack prescriptions will answer now. And the cure, to be effectual, must not persevere in a course which has not only produced no good, nor promises any; but which has brought the patient (if I may use the figure of the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. NELSON) to his present forlorn condition. Such a perseverance may seem to argue great hardihood, or, if you please, spirit; but, after all, it is nothing but the desperate frenzy of a losing, half-ruined gambler.

It becomes, therefore, at last, indispensable to take a retrospective view of our affairs. And if, in taking this view, we should find the cause of our disasters, we must not fear to contemplate it, to hold it up; and, having grown wise by experience, we must not be prevented by false pride, from profiting by it; we must not shrink from the exercise of a virtue because it is also an imperious duty. And I hope that no gentleman who hears me is unwilling to sacrifice the popularity of the Administration to the salvation of the country.

Permit me then, sir, to go back to that period in our history which immediately preceded the adoption of our present form of Government. What was then our condition? The people were poor—for there was no commerce to assist agriculture—there was no revenue for general objects. Many States were hardly able to collect enough for State purposes. And, of course, there was no such thing as public credit, although there was an immense floating debt. We had no reputation abroad—there was no confidence even at home. But, sir, we had a WASHINGTON, and we had the pupils of WASHINGTON, men whom he knew to be faithful, in the Cabinet, for he had found them faithful in the darkest stages of the Revolution. The nation, happily, had not been deluded—they knew their friends by their deeds—they had not yet yielded to the sweet fascination of the seductive popular declamations of these latter times. Men were known by what they did, not by what they said. These men, sir, had the sagacity to discover the secret springs of our prosperity and happiness and glory. And they were able to strike them with a powerful hand, and with a powerful hand they did strike them; and, instantly, as if by enchantment, the scene changed. Suddenly, agriculture raised her drooping head, for commerce beckoned her to prosperity. Your people began to pay their debts and to become rich. Public credit was restored; the Treasury began to fill readily. Sources of revenue were explored, certain of continually increasing, equally certain of being never exhausted, except by folly and madness. Indeed, sir, so perfect was the financial machinery that it admitted of no improvement. It required no more skill in the successors of the illustrious Hamilton to make this instrument “discourse most excellent music,” than it would a child to play a hand-organ. An end was put to our Indian wars; our Algerine captives were redeemed—our reputation was established abroad, and the United States assumed their just rank among the nations of the earth! This was, indeed, a work worthy of the illustrious patriots who achieved it. It was the result of that profound practical wisdom, which, never yielding to the deception of brilliant theory, saw the public interest, with a clear eye, and pursued it with a firm and steady step; and it was no wonder that it was successful. Let me add, too, that all this was accomplished without taxation being felt by the people.

But this great prosperity was not without interruption. It received a stroke, sir, deep and dangerous, and almost mortal, from the tremendous system of spoliation commenced by Great Britain in 1793. Misfortunes cast themselves across the path of nations as well as individuals. They are often unavoidable, and no nation can hope to be always exempt from them. The wisdom of the human mind is displayed in putting an end to them in private affairs, and in public that statesman only is great who can overcome and disperse them, who, though he cannot avert the bolt, can prevent the ruin it threatens. At the period of which I speak, we had such statesmen. Yes, sir, the alarm was depicted on every countenance—though the nation staggered to its centre under the severity of the blow it had received, yet was the Administration equal to the dreadful emergency—it had brought the nation into existence and prosperity, and it was equal to the preservation of both. And they showed it, not by venting their rage in idle reproaches, but by applying efficient remedies to the diseases of the country.

Let it be remembered that justice was to be obtained from Great Britain; from that Power which is now represented and held up to our indignation as “proud, unprincipled, imperious, and tyrannical;” and which certainly was at least as much so then; for then she had on her side all Europe engaged in combination against France, and France was alone as England is now. In short, she was then on the continent of Europe what France is now. Yet, from this same country, did our Government succeed in obtaining not only reparation for the spoliation committed, but a surrender of the Western posts also. I repeat, sir, all this was accomplished when Great Britain was not less imperious in disposition, but more formidable in power than she is now. And surely all this ought to appear strange and wonderful indeed to those who have been deluded into the idea that, when Great Britain was struggling, gasping for existence, the same thing was impossible: that has with ease, and under more inauspicious circumstances, been accomplished, which the men now in power pretend they have attempted in vain. Still, strange as it may seem to them, it is a fact—it is history. Well, sir, how was this miracle brought about? By a process very plain and simple. The Administration was sincerely desirous of peace; and, that single object in their eye, they exerted their abilities to obtain it, and consequently did obtain it. The instructions of the Minister breathed a desire of peace—of reconciliation upon terms compatible with the honor of both nations. The Administration did not send with their Minister a non-importation act, a proclamation, or a permanent embargo, by way of exhibiting their love of peace. The refinement in diplomacy which sends with the negotiator a new cause of quarrel for the purpose of accelerating the adjustment of an old one, was not yet invented. No, sir, Mr. Jay, (and the name of that stern, inflexible patriot and Republican, I always repeat with delight and veneration, because he is a patriot and a Republican)—

[Here Mr. UPHAM took the advantage of a pause made by Mr. G. to observe that, as the gentleman appeared considerably exhausted &c., he would move an adjournment, which was taken by ayes and noes, and lost—ayes 47, noes 65—Mr. G. voting in the affirmative.]

Mr. G. continued.—Mr. Jay had no disposition to bully the British Government into justice; he had no objection that they should have all the merit of returning voluntarily to a sense of justice, provided his country might have the benefit of substantial reparation. The stern sage of the Revolution became the courteous Ambassador, and, appealing "to the justice and magnanimity of His Britannic Majesty," he demanded redress and he obtained it. The British Government saw that ours was sincerely disposed to be at peace with them, and, pursuing the natural direction of their interests, there was no difficulty in making peace. Our plundered merchants were compensated—paid, sir, bona fide. We did not purchase redress; we did not pay for the surrender of the Western posts, which were our right, and out of the purchase money indemnify a portion of our own citizens. No; the payment was to all; and in right old-fashioned "British gold," all counted down on the nail. I wish that I could, with equal truth, say the same thing of more modern treaties.

And now, sir, compensation being made by Great Britain for the spoliation on our commerce, the Western posts being surrendered, a commercial treaty being established, the dark cloud which obscured our prospects being dispersed, the sun of our prosperity once more burst forth in all its radiance, and again all was well.

I care not what were the objections of the day, begotten in the brain of faction, and cherished in mobs; under the treaty we were prosperous and happy, and that one fact is enough for me. Bad as the treaty was represented to be, and the worst feature of it most probably was, that it was a British Treaty—bad as it was, the continuance of its existence has been precisely coextensive with the progress of our prosperity—it made our people rich and happy; and, bad as it was, they would have cause to rejoice indeed if the present Administration had furnished them with just such another.

France saw with uneasiness the return of a good understanding between America and Great Britain. And she, in her turn, let loose her plunderers upon our commerce. Again, the wisdom of our Government was called into action, and again it produced the most happy result. What did they do? An embassy was despatched to France, redress was demanded, but the Ministers were not received, nor could be, till a doucen—a tribute—was paid. From a nation which returned such an answer, redress could not be expected; and there was an end of negotiation. Britain and France had acted toward us with equal injustice—the disposition of our Government, its desire of peace, was the same with both. Its conduct was the same to both, but France would not even hear our demands. The American Government were at no loss how to act. The case was a plain one. One nation robs another—that other demands reparation—prevarication is the reply. It requires no skill to see, in such a case, that, to coax the offender into reparation is impossible. Accordingly, our Government did not hesitate as to the course it should pursue; they did not wait to be spurred on by any Government to an assertion of their rights; they would not leave it one moment doubtful whether they had the disposition and the courage to assert them. They proceeded immediately to annul the French Treaty, to pass non-intercourse laws; they built ships of war, and sent them upon the ocean, to protect our commerce. They were not so obstinate but that they could receive instruction, even from the author of the "Notes on Virginia," who, in that work, so judiciously recommends a navy. Our little armament picked up the French cruisers, great and small; the coast, the sea, was soon cleared of them. And our commerce again visited every clime in safety.

I will here remark, sir, that, during all this time, the staple commodities (particularly of the Northern States) suffered no diminution, but an increase in price. Well, sir, France very soon discovered that she had nothing to gain, and we nothing to lose by such a state of things. Even then, when she had some naval power, she discovered this. She was, therefore, very soon disposed to change it. A treaty was patched up, in the end, and something like the appearance of redress provided for.

Now, sir, for the result. A former Administration were able to settle our differences with Great Britain, although she governed all Europe, although she was unjust, haughty, and imperious. Now the same thing is said to be impossible! A former Administration were able, after a fair negotiation had failed, to bring France, who had then some maritime power, on her marrowbones. And now, when she has none, again the same thing is impossible! How happens all this? Sir, I am afraid your Administration have committed most capital mistakes. They have been unwilling to learn wisdom from the experience and success of their predecessors. I do fear, and I shall be obliged to prove, that, on the one hand, they have been actuated by, certainly they have never (following the example of a former Administration) manifested a sincere disposition to accommodate our difficulties with Great Britain. And, on the other hand, they have in no instance shown to France that bold front which, in more unpromising times, brought the terrible Republic to her senses. These two errors, these wilful, wanton aberrations from established policy, are the true causes of all our misfortunes. It is owing to them that we have, if we believe the Administration sincere, two enemies who are already at war with each other, and we, the only instance of the kind, since the creation of the world, are to step out a third and distinct belligerent, a sort of Ishmaelite belligerent; our hand against every nation, and every nation's hand against us. We are in a situation which defies hope, one in which we have but a single miserable consolation, that though it promises nothing but ruin, yet it is so ridiculous, so ludicrous, that we can but smile at it.

These remarks are extorted from me a little out of their order. I return to the period of the restoration of peace between the United States and France.

The Administration now (1801) passed into the hands of other men. They received a country, rich, prosperous, and increasing in prosperity. A people contented and happy; or discontented only with those who had been the authors of their prosperity. They received a Treasury full and overflowing, giving a vigor and a spring to public credit, almost unknown before, and to the reputation of the country a dignity unsullied; they found us in peace and friendship with all nations, our commerce whitening every sea, and rewarding agriculture for all its industry, and every one sitting in peace, under his own vine and fig tree. Our country presented to the animated philanthropist one uninterrupted display of liberty, of gaiety, and of felicity. Oh! happy, happy period of our history—never, never, I fear to return. And, if ever truth dropped from the lips of man, it was when the nation was declared to be in “the full tide of successful experiment.” Never were the destinies of a nation in more wonderful prosperity committed to men. That prosperity had been acquired at a price no less unparalleled, at the expense of the destruction and disgrace of those whose wisdom and energy had produced it.

The new men, sir, were not required to bring order out of confusion; that had been done already.

They were not called upon to lay the deep and strong foundations of national prosperity and happiness; that had been done already.

They were not enjoined to “multiply” the talents committed to their stewardship; that was unnecessary—they were merely commanded to preserve them undiminished.

They were not required to create a paradise—but to keep uninjured that which was committed to their guardianship.

They promised, indeed; they were so rash, in the fulness of their exultation, as to promise to do more; but folly alone could believe them; and for breaking this promise I forgive them, for to do more was impossible. And if they had but preserved unimpaired, if they had not totally destroyed the inestimable treasures intrusted to them, I would have endeavored to overcome my resentment, my indignation, and my despair.

In performance of their lofty promises, in disregard of sacred duties, what have they done? In what condition do they leave the country, which, eight years since, “in the full tide of successful experiment,” fell into their hands? They present to us, sir, the gloomy reverse of all it was. The people discontented and distressed—all becoming daily more and more poor—except, indeed, that class of rich speculators, whose wealth and whose hearts enabled them to prey upon the wants of their countrymen. The despair and dismay of 1786 are returned! The prosperity of twenty years is annihilated at one stroke! The sources of revenue are dried up. The Treasury, indeed, may be now full—but it must continually diminish—and, without its usual supply, it must soon be empty. We have still some credit. But how long, sir, can that be maintained, when it is known that we have no longer the means, allowing us to possess the disposition, to fulfil our pecuniary engagements? When you cannot collect a cent upon imposts, and dare not lay a direct tax, how far you will be able to obtain money on loan, is, to say the least of it, very questionable. But, I will hasten to finish the contrast I was about to make. Commerce, sir, has perished, and agriculture lies dead at her side—for these twin-sisters must flourish or die together. No nation in the world is our friend—our paradise is becoming a wilderness; our soil is stained with the blood of our own citizens; and we look around us, in vain, for one solitary benefit to compensate us for all the dreadful effects of the present system.

Perhaps, sir, I may be answered: “Though all you have said be true, though our former prosperity exists no longer, it is ungenerous, it is unjust to impute the change to the agency of the Administration. What has happened could not be prevented.” Though such a rebuke were reasonable, I will still insist that the Administration, if they deserve no censure, are certainly entitled to no praise, and can ask for no confidence. If they have not been the authors of the public calamities, they have not, like their predecessors, discovered the ability to prevent them from coming thick upon us. If their hearts are honest, their heads have not discovered much soundness. No set of men, however ignorant, however stupid, could have placed the country in a worse or a more deplorable situation. The truth is plain and palpable. Judging of the wisdom of the Administration by the result of its measures, I cannot sing praises to them for their skill and ingenuity in diplomacy. No, sir; I delight in that diplomacy which makes the poor rich; which makes industry prosperous; which spreads contentment through the land, and happiness among the people. I delight in the diplomacy, whose skill and wisdom can be read in the countenance of my countrymen, and makes the face of my country the evidence of its prosperity. I like not, I abhor that diplomatic skill which can be found only in a book! which has produced nothing but calamity, and whose praise is written in the blood of my countrymen.

But, sir, how happens it that we still remain under the distresses occasioned by the belligerents? Is there, indeed, a physical impossibility of removing them? From Great Britain, and that, too, when she had the whole Continent on her side, we could once obtain justice, not only for the past, but security for the future. From France, too, we could once obtain justice, but now we can gain justice from neither. What change, sir, has occurred in the state of things to produce this strange impossibility? Our commerce is more an object to Great Britain now, than it was formerly—and France can oppose to us no resistance on the ocean. And yet no remedy can be found for our calamities! Sir, I will not be the dupe of this miserable artifice. What has been done once can be done again by employing the same means.

The Administration have committed greater errors. They have conducted all their affairs in such a style as to leave Great Britain no room to doubt that, when they asked for peace, they wanted it not. To this cause may be traced all our difficulties, so far as they proceed from that Power. As it regards France, I fear that they have not acted the proper, the manly part. In short, sir, they have not pursued toward England the policy which saved us in 1795, nor toward France the policy which was successfully opposed to French rapacity and French obstinacy in '93.

I think an error was committed, when, affecting to desire an amicable arrangement with Great Britain, instead of treating with her as a nation not to be intimidated, much less bullied, the non-importation act was passed. For, sir, if she was so proud, so haughty, so imperious, as some gentlemen delight to describe her, then to bring her to justice by assuming an attitude of menace, was evidently impossible. When, therefore, you passed the non-importation act, under a pretence that it would be a successful auxiliary to friendly negotiation, what could you expect but to alarm the pride, and the haughtiness, and imperiousness of that nation? And, doing that, how could you expect an amicable result? No, sir, it was not, and it could not be expected. You obtained a treaty indeed—but it was from a Fox Ministry. Yet such as it was, it was not so good as a Jay's Treaty, and the Executive rejected it without so much as laying it before the Senate.

In support of the embargo system, gentlemen say, if we suffer our commerce to go on the ocean, or wherever it goes, it will be crippled either by France or Great Britain. Although this is not true in the extent laid down, yet it will hold tolerably true as respects the European seas. From what gentlemen are pleased to represent as the impossibility of sailing the ocean with safety, results (say they) the propriety and necessity of the embargo system. And they say, it is not the embargo, but the decrees and orders which are the true cause of all we suffer; that the embargo, so far from being the cause of, was devised as a remedy for the evils we endure. Well, sir, for the sake of the argument, be it as they say. Has the embargo answered? Is there any probability, the slightest indication, that it will answer? Has it operated, to any perceptible extent, except upon ourselves, during the twelvemonth it has been in existence? If, then, neither the remembrance of the past, nor the prospect of the future, gives the least encouragement to hope, why will gentlemen persist in the system? And that too, sir, at an expense, to their own country, so enormous in amount? Will they go on obstinately amid all the discontents, or clamors (as gentlemen in very anti-Republican language, call the voice of the people) in the Eastern and Northern States? And that from mere obstinacy—an obstinacy not encouraged by the least glimmering of hope? If I could be pointed to a single fact, produced by the operation of the embargo, which would prove that it had any other effect on the disposition of Great Britain than to irritate—or any other on France than to please, than to encourage her to a perseverance in that system of injustice, which we pretend to oppose, but to the policy of which we give all our support with an infatuated wilfulness, and which, therefore, increases the hostility Great Britain has felt from the measure—if they could show me, sir, that the embargo will bring either to terms, I would abandon the opposition at once, and come heart and hand into the support of your measures. The other day, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) almost persuaded me that it ought to operate upon Great Britain; but I looked and I found it did not, and I was convinced it would not.

But, have gentlemen reflected that, if all the evils were drawn from Pandora's box, to vex Great Britain, you could have hit on none so well calculated to call out all her resistance, and all her obstinacy, as this same expedient, the embargo! If she yields to us, under the pressure of such a system, she discloses to us the secret of her independence! Sir, the embargo is war; it was intended as such against Great Britain. And she understands its meaning and its character too well for us to disguise it, under a pretence of its being a mere precautionary municipal measure. Its efficacy as a coercive measure has been too often and too loudly boasted of in this House, to make its real object a secret to her. Nay, in so far as the great and prominent feature of war is coercion; in so far as war is always intended to make the adversary yield that which he will not yield voluntarily; in so far, are the embargo and the non-importation act, war. Each was intended to coerce Great Britain to yield to us points, which it had been ascertained she would not yield voluntarily. It was a system of coercion, a new-fangled sort of philosophical experimental war; novel, to be sure, in its character, but, to all substantial purposes, war. Instead of bloodshed, there was to be ink shed—instead of bayonets, pens—instead of the bloody arena, huge sheets of paper! Whenever Great Britain shall yield to the coercion of the non-importation, embargo, or non-intercourse system, she virtually tells the people of the United States "we are in your power whenever you choose to make a claim upon us, whether just or unjust, threaten us with an embargo and a non-intercourse, and you bring us to your feet." Does any gentleman believe, even allowing the pressure of the embargo to be great upon her, that she can yield, that she can afford to yield? That she can admit that we have her always perfectly in our power? Sooner would she give up in battle—sooner would she see her soldiers retreating before our bayonets; sooner would she see her armies perish under our valor, than acknowledge herself the slave of this magic wand. Her children might grow to be men, and she might try the fortune of another day; the hair of Samson might grow on again, and his strength be renewed; but in yielding to the chance of the embargo, she places her existence in our hands, and becomes dependent upon our will for the existence of her sovereignty. Sir, the King of England cannot, he dare not yield to our embargo.

But, sir, he has not told us that he considers our embargo hostile to him; nor has our Government ever told him that it was; such a declaration has never been put to paper. No, sir, when you look into the correspondence, it would seem that the embargo was never intended as a coercive measure, nor even understood so by Great Britain. Everything on both sides is conceived in a sincere spirit of "friendship." Our non-importation act, our proclamation, our embargo, are all acts of friendship and kindness toward Great Britain, for aught we find there. And Great Britain issues her Orders in Council in a reciprocating spirit of amity toward us. She is not offended with our non-importation act, nor our embargo. Not at all. Her orders are not intended to harm us. She means nothing in the world, but simply to retaliate upon France—and she is sorry that almost the whole force of the blow falls upon us, but it is unavoidable. She, by the laws of nations, has as perfect a right to retaliate upon France as we have to make our innocent municipal regulations—and she is full as sorry that her retaliation system should wound us, as we are that our municipal regulations should incommode her. Sir, this diplomatic hypocrisy (began, I acknowledge, by us) is intolerable. Sir, there is not one word of truth in the whole of it, from beginning to end. The plain state of the case is this: Anterior to the non-importation act, the British Treaty had expired—there were points of dispute, particularly concerning the impressment of seamen, which could not be adjusted, to the satisfaction of our Government. In this state of things, either we ought to have gone to war, or we ought not. If we had intended to do so, stronger measures should have been resorted to than a non-importation act. If we had not intended to do so, the act should never have been passed. Those who passed it could have but one of two objects in view; either to coerce Great Britain to the terms we demanded—or, by vexing and irritating her, to raise up in due time an unnecessary fictitious quarrel, which (as this country is known to be extremely sensitive of British aggression) might ultimately end in a real old-fashioned war. No men could have been so weak as to calculate upon the first result. As to the other, the wisdom of the calculation is pretty strongly proved by the situation in which we now find ourselves. Sir, this is the whole mystery—and it must be explored—it must be exposed. We must understand the real character of our controversy with Great Britain—the real character, intent, and aim, of the different measures adopted by us and by her, before we can hope to heal the wounds our peace has received, or to restore the prosperity we have been unnecessarily made to abandon. I know, sir, how difficult it is to overcome matured opinions or inveterate prejudices; and I know, too, that, at this time, the individual who shall venture to lay open "the bare and rotten policy" of the time, makes himself the butt of party rancor, and strips himself to the unsparing "lacerations of the press." But these are considerations too feeble to deter me from my duty.

[Mr. G. appearing much exhausted, and Mr. QUINCY having intimated to the House, that Mr. G. suffered under a pain in the side, moved for an adjournment. The SPEAKER inquired whether Mr. G. yielded the floor? Mr. G. replied, he had himself little inclination to continue his remarks, but the House appeared so eager to hear him, (a laugh,) he hardly knew what answer to make. However, he said, he would give the floor. The House then adjourned.]

The object, sir, of our present deliberations is, or ought to be, to relieve our country from the distresses under which it groans; to do this, we should be prepared to legislate with a single eye to the welfare and happiness of the nation. It is of the first necessity that we should deliberate with calmness, if we mean to apply an effectual remedy to the diseases of the State. In the remarks which I had the honor to make yesterday, I was constrained to draw a contrast between the measures and prosperity of former times and those of the present times. Under circumstances of the same character, we were formerly able to overcome our misfortunes. Now we are not. And I did this for the purpose of impressing upon the House an opinion, that if the Administration had practised upon the principles of their predecessors, all had been well; or, that if retracing their steps, or relinquishing the path of error and misfortune, they would still be the learners of wisdom and experience, it would not even now be too late to retrieve the affairs of the country. If I know my own heart, I did not make the comparison from any invidious purposes; but merely to turn the minds of gentlemen back to former times; that they might reflect upon the perils and calamities of those times, and the means by which an end was put to them; but in doing this, I could not avoid paying the tribute of deserved praise and of sincere gratitude to the men under whose agency we prospered abundantly. In contrasting the conduct of the present with that of the former Administration, I meant to subvert no purposes of party. Nay, sir, I could have much desired to have been spared the necessity of presenting that contrast before the nation. I could have wished to have avoided these references, lest I might excite party feeling in others; lest I might appear to be governed by them myself. But truth could not be attained by any other course, and I have been compelled to take it.

It will be remembered that I have spoken merely with regard to the exterior relations of the country. I have not forgotten that the men then in power were accused of being enemies of liberty, friends of monarchy, and all that. I shall not go out of my way to expose these accusations, sir, because they have nothing to do with the subject I am examining. The positions I would establish, are these: The former Administration conducted wisely, and their perfect and entire success proves it. The men now in power have departed from the path which, as experience demonstrates, led to success. They have spurned the wisdom of experience; they have not conducted wisely, and their defeat, the misfortunes and the distresses of the country prove it. We must abandon the present disastrous and ruinous system, therefore, and return to the old one, if we are sincerely disposed to restore the nation to prosperity.

Sir, the former Administration sought honorable accommodation with Great Britain with so much sincerity, with such a single eye to that object, that they were accused, even when WASHINGTON was at their head, of undue partiality to Great Britain; but success was the consequence. That charge has never been brought against its present rulers, and never will. Happy would it have been for our country, if they had not always exhausted their ingenuity in multiplying obstacles against the adjustment of the difficulties between us and England.

If foreign nations have an interest in cultivating friendship with the United States, it is, because that friendship is in some respect of other advantageous to them? And on what account, sir, is our friendship advantageous to them. On account, I answer, of our commerce. Well, sir, Great Britain exists by commerce, and the benefit of ours she cannot have, unless we are in a state of friendship. Her interest, then, (and no one doubts she is much governed by that) will always induce her to seek that friendship for the sake of that commerce. Indeed, sir, the very laying of your embargo was on the ground that your commerce was essential to the existence of Great Britain. She will, therefore, on the one hand not throw it away lightly. But on the other, she will not purchase it with disgrace; she will not sacrifice her independence to obtain it. And this our Administration knew very well; and on the knowledge of this I fear they have acted. Sir, the gentlemen from the Eastern States have told you, and I have no doubt told you truly of the dreadful condition of the people in that section of the United States. Those from the South have represented to you the deplorable condition of the tobacco, and rice, and cotton countries. Nor have those of the Middle States been wanting in lively descriptions of the sufferings of their constituents. And the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) has, with great ability, depicted the distresses of the people of England; all resulting from the suspension of our commerce. Now, sir, what does all this prove? Why, simply this: that if both countries suffer so much from this suspension of our commerce, both are deeply interested in its restoration; and, of course, that the present state of things is an unnatural one, growing out of artificial causes; and, for that reason, a state of things which wise and honest men could easily change. It was from this very cause that it was so easily changed in former times. And on account of differences growing out of the commercial spirit of the two nations, and the animosity which the Revolutionary war had called forth, we are now engaged in a contest in which each is to evince his fortitude by depriving himself of the mutual benefits resulting from an amicable intercourse; and if neither is to give out before he feels it impossible to exist without the other, there will never be an end of the contest. We know that this country can hold out forever, and we ought to know that Great Britain can do the same; and must, sir, if from no other consideration, yet from this, that we must not be encouraged in the notion that she cannot exist without us.

I have intimated my opinion, sir, that Great Britain has all along been induced to believe, that it was the policy of our Administration to be in dispute with her, and that they have been only solicitous to veil their true object from the American people. Such, sir, is my own opinion, and therefore I will not hesitate to declare it. I shall give my reasons for it, and if I am incorrect, shall be extremely pleased to see my arguments refuted—for I entreat gentlemen to be assured that I am not more desirous of affording light to them than I am to receive it from them.

The proof in support of my position, derived from the correspondence on the affair of the Chesapeake, is to my mind conclusive. The people of the United States, viewing it as the authorized act of the British Government, broke forth into the most ardent execrations. There was not a heart, sir, which did not feel all that the warmest could feel. What has become of the spirit of that period? Whither has it fled? And why has it subsided? Why are its murmurings heard nowhere but in the war speeches of gentlemen on this floor? Sir, the reason is very simple. When remonstrances upon the subject were made to the British Government, and indeed before that, they abandoned the principle upon which alone the outrage, if it had been authorized, could have proceeded. Nay, they declared, unasked, unsolicited, that the principle had never been contended for by them. There was, therefore, no danger of a repetition of the outrage, and our people settled down into quiet, from a sense of security.

But let us review the negotiations to which the event itself gave birth, for we can derive from them a perfect knowledge of the temper and character of our Government.

The first intimation received in England of this unfortunate occurrence, was by the English Government itself; and before our Minister knew anything of it, Mr. Canning gave him the information in a manner evincing the most friendly disposition, and the most perfect willingness to make the most ample reparation. I do not desire to be understood to say, that the British entertain any friendship for us, sir. They have little cause for that, for friendship to be friendship must be mutual. But a sense of interest must always induce them to desire an immediate commercial intercourse with us.

To minds which are not wholly poisoned—to those who do not believe that all virtue and patriotism consists in utterly hating Great Britain, as to believe she can do no right, even when her interest should induce her; to all candid men, sir, it must be plain, that at the outset, at least, the British Minister did all that we could have expected or desired.

Mr. Monroe, in a note dated July 29, not having then heard from his Government, tells Mr. Canning, that "by accounts which are entitled to full confidence, it appears that the Leopard attacked the Chesapeake, with a view to assert and enforce the unfounded and the most unjustifiable pretensions to search for deserters." And after detailing the circumstances, and though he reminds Mr. Canning of "other examples of great indignity and outrage," he goes on to say, very properly and very honestly, "but it is improper to mingle them with the present more serious cause of complaint." He then proceeds to demand a frank disavowal of the principle and the punishment of the officer. On the third of August, Mr. Canning replies, that "His Majesty neither does nor has, at any time, maintained the pretension of a right to search ships of war, in the national service of any State, for deserters." And that, if the attack "shall appear to have rested on the simple and unqualified assertion of that pretension, His Majesty has no difficulty in disavowing that, and will have no difficulty in manifesting his displeasure at the conduct of his officers." And then he concludes with agreeing with Mr. Monroe, that other causes of complaint should not be involved in the present question, regretting that allusions should be made to them at all.

Both Ministers then harmonized in the opinion that the subject of the outrage should, in the negotiation, be kept as single, as in its indignity and enormity, it was solitary; and if it had been so kept single, if other topics of complaint had not been "mingled" with it, by our Administration, to prevent adjustment, ample reparation, I have no doubt, would long ago have been received for it. Sir, let me entreat gentlemen to look at this part of the correspondence once more. Mr. Monroe calls on the British Government for a disavowal. There is not a moment's hesitation in making it. Not only the act itself was at once disavowed, but the declaration was spontaneously made, that the pretension never existed. Even Mr. Monroe himself, in his letter to the Secretary of State, of the 4th of August, says that Mr. Canning's reply "may be considered as conceding essentially the point desired." Let it be remembered that, as yet, Mr. Monroe has received no instructions from our Executive on this subject. And if ever man felt a confidence and a pleasure at the certain prospect of healing the wounds his country's honor had received, and of dissipating the gloomy apprehensions which he well knew disturbed and kindled to wrath his high-minded countrymen, our Minister at London was the man; but he was ignorant of the subtle policy of the Cabinet at home, as he was confounded at the intelligence contained in Mr. Canning's note of the 8th of August. He is in that note, and it would seem, for the first time, informed of the proclamation prohibiting British armed vessels from entering our ports. And Mr. Canning very properly requests to be informed "whether it is the intention of the Government of the United States to carry into effect the measures stated in the proclamation of the President, without requiring or waiting for an explanation on the part of the British Government with respect to the late unfortunate affair upon which the determination to resort to these measures is professed to be founded."

This question, sir, though very pithy, is one which the proclamation would necessarily draw out. Its plain English is this: "Do you mean to ask for reparation, or do you mean to take reparation into your own hands by this retaliating measure? Do you mean to rely upon the disposition of this Government to do you justice (and which you know them to have declared unasked) or do you mean to force us to do you justice? We do justice sometimes, but never on compulsion." The point of this inquiry Mr. Monroe evaded, by saying that he had no information from his Government on the subject. He, it seems, did not exactly comprehend the object of the inquiry. for in another letter to the Secretary of State, of August 14th, he could not conceive "why it should be made, if some unfriendly measure, such as an embargo, was not intended." In that letter, also, as well as in the one of August 4th, he speaks of the existence of a strong war party in England, and he was therefore—peace being really and truly his object—induced to adopt the most pacific course possible.

The 7th of September put an end to all Mr. Monroe's dreams. He had now received instructions from his Government. If the information of the President's proclamation had shaken his hopes of success, these instructions extinguished them. The application for redress came to England not only with an offensive proclamation on its back, but encumbered with a condition that that redress should not be received unless the subject of impressments was arranged at the same time. A subject, sir, which years had been wasted in vain attempts to arrange. Hear the Secretary himself, and let gentlemen say whether such satisfaction was either reasonably to be demanded, or expected. If they say it was, they say more in favor of the desire of Great Britain to do us justice than I shall ever do. Before I proceed, let me cast one glance more at this proclamation. Could it form, could it be intended to form, part of a specific, sincere system of gaining reparation? No. It was creating a new ground of dispute, instead of leaving the old one single. If the Cabinet had intended to pursue pacific measures, they should have pursued them and them only; or, if coercive, the latter alone. A system partly pacific and partly hostile, is always a miserable one. It is always wise to get rid of one quarrel before you create another. One is enough at one time, and he who is ever getting into new quarrels, by way of accommodating old ones, may be as certain as our Administration are, of never coming to a friendly conclusion about any. But he who loads his demands of reparation as the Secretary did, cannot but pant for ill success. The Secretary, in his letter to Mr. Monroe of July 6th, 1807, instructs him to insist on a "formal disavowal of the deed and restoration of the four seamen to the ship from whence they were taken, as things of course and indispensable. As a security for the future, an entire abolition of impressments from vessels under the flag of the United States, if not already arranged, is also to make an indispensable part of the satisfaction?" That is, another and a distinct matter, already proved, incapable of arrangement, must be first adjusted before he would condescend to receive satisfaction for the specific outrage on the Chesapeake; and not only must that matter be first adjusted, but in the very words of the Secretary, "it must be on terms compatible with the instructions" formerly given on the subject. We will not receive satisfaction for this horrible outrage, unless our own terms be yielded us in relation to another very difficult point "as part." It was a strange idea, sir—"as part, an indispensable part, of that satisfaction."

On such terms, I venture to assert no compromise was, because none could possibly be expected. I will now put a question to gentlemen. When Mr. Monroe was instructed by the Cabinet to make the adjustment of the subject of impressments "an indispensable part of the satisfaction," for the attack on the Chesapeake, could it be done with any other expectation, any other view, than that the reparation affected to be pursued should never come at them? Conceding, for the sake of argument, that the terms demanded by our Government in relation to impressments were just, had it not been proved that, on these terms, an adjustment could not be effected? Mr. Monroe, previous to the receipt of his instructions, had paved the way for almost certain redress for the outrage on the Chesapeake. But our Cabinet well knew, that so surely as the water flows down the stream, so surely could the affair of the Chesapeake never be settled by the mode they pursued. No, sir, there never was, and I am afraid never will be, a sincere desire in the Administration, for anything but difficulty and dispute and war with England. But for this, not only the unfortunate affair of the Chesapeake, but every other matter in controversy might long ago have been settled, much to the satisfaction and more to the prosperity of both countries.

I cannot but compassionate Mr. Monroe for the situation in which he was now placed. Our poor Minister having pursued a plain and certain policy—having gained the assent of the British Minister to his opinion that this affair should be kept single—was suddenly obliged to eat his words; he was obliged not only to mingle other matters with this all-important affair, but to mingle with it one which his own experience convinced him placed adjustment utterly beyond the reach of hope.

I am now, sir, safe in advancing as an incontrovertible fact, that before the proclamation was known in England, the Government of that country had shown every disposition to do us justice, at least in the affair of the Chesapeake. They had declared themselves innocent of all participation in the act; they had promised the punishment of the officer; or, in more courtly language, "His Majesty's displeasure." But the proclamation arrives. Immediately the tone is changed. You have taken (say they) reparation into your own hands. You have studied to prevent the people of your country from seeing that we are capable of doing justice voluntarily. We will not make the reparation, before this proclamation, which we consider a hostile act, is taken off. But in that case we will give the most ample satisfaction.

The Secretary is a wise man. He had very distinctly foreseen that on the proclamation the negotiation would split. But the Secretary is moreover a prudent and a provident man, and therefore, lest the desire of peace and commercial intercourse with this country which its interest dictates to England, might induce the Ministry to disregard this obstruction to reparation, he, to be more secure, fortified himself with another which could not be possibly overcome:—"The matter of impressments must be settled beforehand." That he knew to be impossible. Less prudence, however, would have been sufficient. For although Mr. Canning, in his letter to Mr. Monroe, of September 23, 1807, says, that "it is a matter of regret that you should have been instructed to annex to the demand of reparation for the attack of the Leopard upon the Chesapeake, any proposition whatever respecting the search for British seamen in merchant vessels; a subject which is wholly unconnected with the case of the Leopard and the Chesapeake, and which can only tend to complicate and embarrass a discussion, in itself of sufficient difficulty and importance," although in his letter of the 29th of the same month, he says that the British Government "is willing to look to one subject only, the late aggression, and to provide for it," yet it is evident from the instructions given to Mr. Rose, that the proclamation would of itself have been a sufficient obstruction to the approach of reparation.

Although Great Britain appears to have been determined not to do even justice, while there was any appearance of her having been forced to it, yet she sent a special Minister to this country to offer atonement. That Minister, soon after his arrival, had an interview with Mr. Madison, in which he stated to the Secretary, that he was "expressly precluded by his instructions from entering upon any negotiation for the adjustment of the differences arising from the encounter of His Majesty's ship Leopard and the frigate of the United States the Chesapeake, as long as the proclamation should be in force."

Previous to the actual arrival of Mr. Rose, it had been understood here that he was coming out as a special Envoy, for the express and sole purpose of making satisfaction for the outrage committed in our waters. If I am incorrect, sir, in this assertion, I hope some gentleman will set me right, for I desire to travel along the great highway of truth and fact. Under a knowledge of this fact, then, the President recommended the laying of an embargo, ostensibly for the purpose "of keeping in safety our essential resources," but in reality, as in the course of the discussion of the embargo bill has been asserted by our embargo gentleman from Virginia and another from Pennsylvania, to operate on Great Britain. And Mr. Rose, on his arrival, was actually cheered by this new evidence of the sincere desire (I believe that is the slang, sir) of our Administration to restore and cultivate the friendly relations so important to both countries! Our Cabinet seems to have been afraid that the proclamation and the demand concerning impressments, with the affair of the Chesapeake, would not be a sufficient protection against Mr. Rose's importunities to give us reparation. To be perfectly secure, therefore, they barricaded themselves by this omnipotent embargo. And now I have no doubt Mr. Madison thought that if the special Envoy could force his satisfaction upon the Administration, in spite of all these fortifications, the very device must be in it. Mr. Rose then arrives—makes the disclosure of his instructions which I have already mentioned, and of which he reminds Mr. Madison in his letter of January 20, 1808. Withdraw your proclamation, so that the reparation we make (such is the substance of the offer) may have all the merit of being voluntary, and I promise you the reparation shall be unobjectionable. But while that proclamation continues in force, the dignity of my Government forbids a disclosure of what that reparation shall consist of. Mr. Madison having now ascertained with precision the instructions which tied down the special Envoy to a defined and prescribed course from which he could not depart, assumes all at once the appearance of great mildness, and abandons the high tone, comes down from his lofty demands, and says that the adjustment of the subject of impressment shall not form "part, an indispensable part of the satisfaction"—nay, he is so little obstinate even about the proclamation, that in his reply of the 8th of March, he says that the President, "adhering to the moderation by which he has been invariably guided, and anxious to rescue the two nations from the circumstances under which an abortive issue to your mission necessarily places them, has authorized me in the event of your disclosing the terms of reparation which you believe will be satisfactory, and on its appearance that they are so, to consider this evidence of the justice of His Britannic Majesty as a pledge for an effectual interposition with respect to all the abuses against which the proclamation was meant to provide, and to proceed to concert with you a revocation of that act bearing the same date with the act of reparation to which the United States are entitled." This was diplomatic skill indeed! If you, Mr. Rose, will do what we very well know you cannot do, we will abandon our high ground. Only be so good as to perform impossibilities—do what you yourself told us you are forbidden to do—and we will complete the miracle by giving fact in evidence to prove our desire of being in amity with your country. Who after this very ingenious and honest offer of our Cabinet will dare to question its sincerity? Who will dare to deny that they sought, since they proved their desire to obtain, satisfaction by pursuing a course so well calculated to obtain it! Alas! sir, all that can be said of it is, that they kept their original object steadily in view; but the frankness with which Mr. Rose had communicated his instructions, enabled them to make a very specious offer, and which was only made with a view to their own popularity. For however plausible the offer might be, it was no less certain of being unproductive of good, than their former extravagant conduct had been. They were still secured as effectually as ever against the intrusion of reparation.

But it has been said there was a point of honor involved in the question. If that has indeed been so, the case would be varied. But let us examine it, and I venture to assert there was no such thing in it.

The Secretary, in his letter of the 6th of June, already referred to, has said the proclamation was a mere matter of precaution, and could not be considered as a hostile act. And he tells Mr. Monroe, "the scope of the proclamation will signify to you, that the President has yielded to the presumption, that the hostile act of the British commander did not pursue the intention of his Government." These, let it be remembered, are Mr. Madison's own words. At the outset then, he, as well as the President, did not believe the attack on the Chesapeake pursued the intentions of the British Government. And believing it did not, the proclamation could never have been justified as a hostile act. It could be defended only on the ground of its being a precautionary one. And on that ground, as has been seen, Mr. Madison did place it in this letter of June 6th. I will not at this time say, sir, whether the issuing the proclamation for the purpose of preserving tranquillity in the ports and harbors of the United States, was a necessary, or a political step; I will not stop now to examine whether this was the real or the ostensible motive. But I will prove that the keeping in force that proclamation, if it was in truth merely a measure of precaution, was, after the disclosure of Mr. Rose's instructions, the height of folly, to say nothing worse of it.

The President was willing to withdraw the proclamation, if Mr. Rose would disclose what were the terms of reparation he was instructed to offer, and if those terms should be satisfactory, in that case such disclosure of such satisfactory terms would be a pledge given by Great Britain that there should be no recurrence of abuses—and, then, the withdrawing of the proclamation and the act of reparation should bear one date. No, sir, in all this time from June 6, 1807, to March 5, 1808, the proclamation had been represented and justified by our Government, on the mere plea that it was necessary as a precaution—any measure—that it was necessary to the maintenance of the tranquillity and security of our harbors. Whenever, therefore, the danger in this respect ceased, the cause of the proclamation ceased; and, of course, the proclamation itself might well cease too. Whether it should continue or not, was not a point of honor; it was a point of calculation merely; and therefore ought to have been continued or discontinued, as upon sound calculations one course or the other should promise most advantage. But surely no point of honor was to be preserved by keeping it on, nor was to be sacrificed by taking it off. Before I looked into the correspondence, I had given into the general idea that the Government had acted right; for I had understood that they persisted in the proclamation, because in some way or other (I had like most others not understood how) their honor or that of the nation required it. But a calm examination, in which I did not permit my feelings to run away with my judgment, has completely convinced me that there is certainly no point of honor in the matter. When Mr. Rose, therefore, disclosed his instructions, which prevented him from negotiating while the proclamation was in force, the only question to be decided by our Cabinet was, will the withdrawing it be more dangerous to our harbors than advantageous in promoting a restoration of harmony? Is it, on calculation, best to withdraw it? It does appear to me, sir, that the question admitted of no doubt. The proclamation at the outset possessed no magic force; it could not keep a fleet out of our harbors. Whether, therefore, it was in existence or not, the physical power of the interdicted ships to enter remained precisely the same. Our vessels might have been attacked, and our defenceless seaport towns might have been battered down about our ears with the same facility as if the proclamation had never been issued.

But the departure of the squadron which annoyed us was prior to—certainly cotemporary with—the arrival of Mr. Rose in this country. There were during the winter no other British vessels off our coast. If, then, the proclamation could by some secret charm keep out of the harbors vessels on the coast, yet as none were on the coast, its suspension for a few days could work no practical mischief. And there could, therefore, be no substantial argument, if in truth it was what the Secretary himself declares, “a mere measure of precaution,” in favor of keeping it on, as an obstruction to that satisfactory reparation which Mr. Rose declared himself ready to make as soon as it was removed. It follows, therefore, inevitably, either that the Administration has deceived the nation as to the cause and object of the proclamation; or that, if in this respect they have spoken the truth, their calculations have been silly and whimsical. Whatever be the truth, the wound our country’s honor has received from this outrageous attack has been suffered to fester till it has grown old, and seems now as incurable, as it is unhealed.

I will present this subject in another view. If the proclamation had been withdrawn, Mr. Rose was to have disclosed the terms of reparation. Suppose in that event that these terms had not been satisfactory. The proclamation might have been suspended for perhaps three days. And will any one say that the suspension of this wonder-working instrument for three days would have endangered the tranquillity of our ports and harbors? For gentlemen will see, that as soon as the reparation was decided to be unsatisfactory, the proclamation might have been revived.

I will detain the House, sir, but little longer on this subject. This matter has presented itself to my mind so clear, that I have had little difficulty in presenting it in a strong light before the House. And when gentlemen come to answer me, and I hope they will, I entreat them to answer these arguments. I have endeavored to convey them in as plain a manner as I could, for I wish to see them refuted, if they are false. I acknowledge my obligations to the House for hearing me so patiently. I know, sir, a great many fine things may be said about honor, and independence, and all that. But if gentlemen answer me, I must beg them to forego the temptation of these brilliant topics, and to answer my arguments.

If the honor of the country, sir, had required an adherence to the proclamation, I should have been among the last to condemn the Administration. But the Secretary himself yielded this ground when he declared the proclamation to be a mere measure of precaution. And if there was after that any point of honor in the case, it was not by persisting in a course which could be productive of no good.

But the voice of the country, sir, has decided that Great Britain has done all that could be expected of her to repair the injury committed by the Leopard. And it is therefore in vain to attempt to raise a war spirit by empty declamations on that topic.

Sir, that the British Ministry and the British nation are at this moment unfriendly to the United States, I will not deny, for I do not doubt it. It would be strange, indeed, if it were otherwise. Our people, sir, nay, even the members of this House, have had their ears so dinned with the cry of British enmity, that we have at length so acted as to make enemies of those who at first felt no hostility towards us. It was impossible they should feel any. As well might the merchant be the enemy of his best customer. But let gentlemen lay their hand upon their hearts; let the people of this country look into their own bosoms and say whether they find there no feeling of enmity towards Great Britain—no relics of ancient animosity—nothing of that scrutinizing, unforgiving, jealous hostility, which they have been working into a belief that Great Britain feels towards us. After such a great revolution as that which has been accomplished in this country, during which the leading statesmen found it essential to success to keep the public exasperation at the highest point possible, it is not to be wondered at that much of the old feeling should remain; but it will be most sincerely to be deplored, if this feeling should overcome the good sense of the nation.

I will not deny, nor am I surprised, that Great Britain is now endeavoring to do us all the harm in her power short of commencing actual war upon us. Nor can I bring my mind to believe that retaliation upon France was either the sole or the principal cause of her Orders in Council. She knew these orders must, and I cannot doubt but she intended they should, operate principally upon this country. And I will go farther, sir; I will say that in issuing them she has done no more than what our Administration has made her do, and is delighted at her having done, because it brings them so much nearer to the accomplishment of their favorite object—a war with Great Britain!

Sir, I am not surprised at seeing Great Britain attempting to do us harm. That attempt is the natural result of our own system. The French decrees were not the cause of, but merely a plausible pretext for it. By passing the non-importation act, the Government commenced a system of commercial warfare against Great Britain. They meant by it to make her do that which without compulsion she was unwilling to do. What is the reply? A counteracting measure of commercial warfare. The matter of impressments and the carrying trade could not be settled to our satisfaction. Great Britain would not do us justice willingly. We meant then to coerce her to our terms; and accordingly the non-importation act was passed. If not for the purpose of coercion, for what purpose was it passed, sir? And being passed, what was Great Britain to do? Either on the one hand to say, this talisman is irresistible, and therefore I yield to its power; or, on the other, I cannot yield to it. But if you can pass non-importation acts, I can reply to them by Orders in Council; if you can injure my manufactures and commerce (and you certainly can) I can suppress your trade. Sir, resistance to the measure by which we attempted to coerce necessarily produced these consequences. And "the desire of His Majesty to do all in his power to restore to the commerce of the United States its wonted activity," expressed so sarcastically in Mr. Canning's letter, was merely a better way of telling us that His Majesty was playing our own game back upon us; that he could make his paper-shot tell as distinctly as we could ours, and rather more so. Yes, sir, it will not, it cannot be denied that the non-importation act was a hostile one, because intended for coercion. The British Government always viewed it so. And my position is, that ever since the passage of that act we have been at war with her—not the old-fashioned sort of war, but a new-fangled, philosophical kind of commercial war! We thought we played a strong card, and now we are outrageous because our antagonist has been able to play above us! Great Britain, it turns out, is not only able to resist the force of your system, but to make you feel the distresses incident to a reaction of that system. With the experience of its effect it ought instantly to be abandoned. It originated in passion, miscalculation, and imbecility, and should not be pursued. We were in affluence and prosperity when it commenced. Where are we now?

A gentleman from Maryland (Mr. K.) has taken great pains to prove that the embargo is the cause of the present low price of produce. Another gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Williams) has asserted no less stoutly, that the Orders in Council are the true cause. If the last assertion be correct, it is a very unfortunate one for the policy of the embargo system; for, sir, it yields the ground to the adversary—it acknowledges that she has the best of the battle—that she has beat us at our own weapons. And yet instead of discontinuing the "unprofitable contest," we are called upon to plunge deeper and deeper into it. I have been astonished to find those gentlemen, who talk so much of the patriotism of our own people, unwilling to believe that there is patriotism in Great Britain too. If we are willing to bear, so are they. If we would sacrifice everything to our country, so would they too, whenever it becomes a question which shall hold out longest. And, sir, it has come to this already. Much spirit and acrimony is mixed with the contest. Put the case to an Englishman, Will you, to regain the American commerce, confess that that commerce is essential to your existence? Will you consent that, yielding to the embargo and non-importation and non-intercourse system, your Government shall accede to demands which otherwise they would not accede to? What would one of those Englishmen, of whose pride and haughtiness we have heard so much on this floor, say to it? Well, sir, if you cannot then bend the English Government to your terms, and if, instead of making their people your instruments to act upon the Government, you excite an unconquerable spirit of resistance even in them, how is the embargo to be operative? How can you hope that it will bring your enemy at your feet? And if it did not in the end produce this effect, all your sufferings under this delightful experiment will have been to no purpose.

Let me detain the House one moment to inquire what is the character of the war, which is now carried on in Europe? It is on one side a war for conquest, for universal dominion—on the other for self preservation. At the commencement of the French Revolution it had the same character. France fought for self preservation; the combined Powers for conquest. But the parties have changed sides. I take a delight, sir, in remembering that the same feelings which governed me then I yet preserve. I wish neither Power to be able to break down the other. I fear the power of either, when the other shall have been broken down. Therefore, and not because I think more justice or kindness is to be expected from one than the other, I cannot but hope that Great Britain may maintain her ground. Yes, sir, that country is indeed the barrier between Bonaparte and universal empire, not because her morals have undergone any change for the better since she combined her force with the Powers of the Continent; but from necessity, from fortune of war. And she is the only Power which can hope successfully to resist the strides of France. She is the defence of the world! Not because she cares much about the world, but because, in defending herself, she necessarily protects all others, who stand behind her. They cannot be reached, until she is first broken down. But that done, the power of France overwhelms the universe. And, sir, should we be then more safe than we are now? Should we be then more safe when the tiger of the land shall mount the shark of the ocean, and having swept the sea, assail our shores with a rapacity unsatiated and an ambition incapable of repose? Let it not be believed. The only Republic which has escaped the fury of him who has subverted the Republics of all countries, even of his own, the ruins of which are the basis of his imperial throne!—No, sir—indeed we could hardly escape the Great Destroyer. I rely much on the patriotism, the bravery, and the perseverance of my countrymen; but I hope they may never be under the necessity of meeting Napoleon, when, having broken down Britain, he is borne upon her navy to the shores of our own country.

But I have been drawn insensibly from my course. It is a war of ambition. And what is the part which we take in it? Have we, sir, not thrown in our whole weight to aid and render effectual the pressure by which France meant to crush her enemy? Have we not done all that we could, when English commerce was excluded from the continent of Europe, to exclude it from the United States also? Napoleon, finding that he could not conquer England by force, had resorted to the expedient of closing up the world against her commerce—well knowing that commerce was her life-blood. The continent of Europe was subject to his nod. No potentate dared to disobey. America was still open, and still free; and we closed America too. America subserved to the utmost extent of her means the French policy! We did all that France, knowing our means, could have reasonably asked; for we did all we could to destroy the commerce of England, although in doing it we sacrificed the prosperity of our country! We passed the embargo act—an act which all the enemies of Great Britain rejoice in—which the French Minister eulogizes and Napoleon applauds. If we intended to aid France, we could have done no more than we have done. If we meant to coerce Britain to our own terms, we have exhausted our means in a single effort.

But what have we done to bring France to justice, to coerce her? What strong measure has been adopted to compel her to rescind her decrees? At the outset, was a single step of dignified and imposing character taken? But gentlemen say, the decrees were not immediately enforced, they were not immediately acted upon; and there was no cause either for resentment or alarm. Because the Orders in Council were expected from Great Britain, the embargo was necessary; and this makes no little figure in the list of arguments in its support. But the French decrees, though promulgated, were to be considered as a mere joke until they were acted upon! Let me remind gentlemen of the alien law. That, though an act of their own Government—though never acted upon, was long a topic of most brilliant declamation. And those whom that law terrified almost into madness, were perfectly tranquil under a decree violating not only the laws of nations, but the more sacred obligation of treaty. But the Administration, forsooth, flattered itself the decree of Berlin would never be enforced—that it had issued only in sport, and was as harmless as any of our paper-shot! Little could they know of Napoleon who thought so, and little could they wish to know of him. The nation was made to look on with composure; the edge of its indignation was taken off, and the good understanding between the two Republics continued. An embargo on the trade to France was not thought of; our merchants were not even warned of their danger. But at length the decree, and more than the decree of Berlin, was enforced. English Orders in Council were expected—but what they would be no one could exactly tell. Instantly, however, appears the necessity of an embargo—an embargo to coerce England, as was at the time declared on this floor. And not until this session has it been thought expedient to let off some hard words at France—for words is all we have used towards her—throughout there is manifested an anxious solicitude to conciliate France on the one hand, and on the other to irritate and render incurable the wounds we have received from Britain.

You passed the embargo to bring Britain to your feet. The praises of this legislative charm were rung through the country; its magical power was the topic of every Administration print, and for a while the people believed. The "credo quia impossibile est," was never more devoutly acted upon. But twelve months have elapsed, and what has it produced? The mountain has been in labor, and I look in vain even for the mouse. The embargo, however, being passed, did the Administration wait until Great Britain cast herself at their feet imploring relief from the pressure of this intolerable measure? No, sir, after some time, a little time, too, wondering why she did not begin to groan under the burden, the Administration (taking them at their own word) sent a messenger to England to inquire if she was not pretty well tired of the embargo? that if she was, they were. If you will quit we will, was the purport of the message. And what was the result of this wise project? What might have been expected. The authors of this irresistibly coercive measure, did play their parts most clumsily. The British Minister could not doubt they were coming to, and no man in his situation would have thought differently. If the offer made to Great Britain was fairly and sincerely made, its rejection only proves that a more miserable plan of coercion than the embargo could not have been devised. And, sir highly praised as this specific has been, I much doubt whether the prayer of the petitions on your table would not have been complied with, if the Administration could have done so without acknowledging their folly, and sacrificing their popularity.

But as to the proposition, and to speak of it in the sober sadness it deserves. What answer did it receive? Your Minister was told, that if the Orders in Council should be revoked, it would appear to the world as if the British Government had, by the embargo, been forced to abandon them. We cannot, therefore, consent. Since we have gone on so far, we will show to France and to you that we cannot, we do not, even fear to be subdued in this way; the experiment may be as properly made now as at any time, and you may make it till you are satisfied of its inefficacy.

If, sir, our Administration had been sincerely disposed for peace, and acting wisely, had rescinded the proclamation, and repealed the embargo and non-importation acts, and then said now do us justice, the interest which Great Britain, as well as this country, has in the restoration of amicable commercial intercourse, would have left no chance for refusal. And if she had refused, the American people would have rallied round their Government; and I know, sir, that that portion of them with whom I act, forgetting how they had been persecuted, would have sacrificed their resentment at the shrine of their country's independence.

Sir, is it not true that the national animosity towards Great Britain has been so much nourished in this country that it is a test of patriotism even with the Administration? It could not, therefore, be reasonably expected that the British Ministry could have any confidence in mere intimations of returning good will. Nor could any safe calculation be made on the impartiality or spirit of an Administration which had discovered no indignation at the Berlin decree, whose entire resentment has been directed to one of the belligerents only, while its co-operation with the other was manifest and intended to be decisive.

That such were throughout the real feelings of the British Government—nay, that such is the fact, can hardly be doubted by any one who will peruse dispassionately Mr. Canning's letter to Mr. Pinkney of September 23. "If," says he, "the embargo is considered a measure of hostility, His Majesty cannot consent to buy it off." He could not consistently with diplomatic decorum tell Mr. Pinkney in plain terms: Your Government has all along attempted to deceive, when they represented this as a mere municipal regulation for municipal purposes; although he might have brought the speeches of the members of this House in support of the position. But his putting the case even hypothetically, lets you at once into the knowledge of his opinions concerning the motives and the temper of our Government. And he fastens upon them the charge of duplicity, with great civility indeed, but most logically, by putting the case the other way. "If, as it has more generally been represented by the Government of the United States, it is only to be considered as an innocent municipal regulation, which affects none but the United States themselves; and in which no foreign State has any concern, His Majesty does not conceive that he has the right or the pretension to make any complaint of it, and he has made none. But in this light there appears not only no necessity, but no assignable relation, between the repeal by the United States of a voluntary self-restriction, and the surrender by His Majesty of his right of retaliation against his enemies." Probably I shall not make Mr. Canning's meaning more plain, but it is important that his true meaning should be correctly understood.

If your embargo is hostile, inasmuch as it is designed to be coercive, then we will not "buy it off;" you may make the experiment of its efficacy thoroughly.

If it is "an innocent municipal regulation" merely, for mere municipal domestic purposes as to yourselves, and which was never intended to operate upon us, what "reciprocity" is there in offering that if we will give up our retaliation on the enemy, you will give up a measure which you say does not concern us? But your very offer could go only on the ground that your embargo was injurious to us, that you so considered and from the first intended it, and hence it results that you always misrepresented its real character. We are brought, therefore to the first point. Your very proposal leaves no doubt that as it is now, so it was at first, a measure of coercion. And if was so intended originally, we consider it of the first importance to our country, that the futility of this notion of coercing us by this kind of war in disguise—this commercial war, should be proved—for, then it will never be repeated. Though we can stand it, yet it is injurious to us. The greater, therefore, is the wisdom of that policy which determines us to give your system, since it is commenced, a complete trial. For if it fail, as fail it must, we need never apprehend a repetition of it; for the repetition, though not ruinous, must be always inconvenient and unprofitable to us.

If gentlemen will accompany me a little further in this letter, the truth will be still more evident.

"The Government (adds Mr. C.) of the United States is not to be misinformed," (that is they know very well, and always did know very well.) "that the Berlin decree was the practical commencement of an attempt not merely to check or impair the prosperity of Great Britain, but utterly to annihilate her existence through the ruin of her commercial prosperity. They know that in this attempt almost all the Powers of the European Continent have been compelled, more or less, to co-operate." I entreat gentlemen to attend to what follows—"And your Government know that the American embargo, though most assuredly not intended for that end, by some unfortunate concurrence of circumstances, without any hostile intentions; (Sir, the sarcasm is most severe,) "the American embargo did come in aid of the blockade of the European Continent, precisely at the very moment when, if that blockade could have succeeded at all, this interposition of the American Government would have contributed to its success." If I might be indulged once more in a paraphrase, I would represent Mr. Canning as saying: "Your Government knows that the embargo did come in aid of the system by which France meant to destroy us. Allowing your Cabinet intellect, and allowing they knew what they were about, we must suppose they intended to aid France in her plan to destroy us. And we are the more certain of this, because the embargo was passed at a moment, when if the French plan could have succeeded at all, your 'interposition' would have given us the finishing blow."

Such sir, is the plain English of Mr. Canning's letter; such too, is the real truth; and it is time, high time, that the people of the United States should understand that the enmity is not exclusively on the side of Great Britain. It is all important that they should know that under the plausible pretext of an embargo, "an innocent municipal regulation," their rulers seized upon a critical moment, to press upon Great Britain in the only manner they could, and at a time when their hostility would have been effectual, most probably, if the Spanish revolution had not intervened. If we have cause of complaint, as certainly we have, they have much greater. If we have cause to complain of the violence and injustice of their naval commanders—if our resentment has been inflamed to madness by the attack on the Chesapeake, and the murder of Pierce—they can owe us little kindness, when they know that our Government threw at a critical turn, their whole weight into the scale of France.

The whole of this very masterly letter of Mr. Canning is entitled to most attentive perusal. It is a key which opens to us the secret of the strange and mysterious situation into which we have been brought. It should be carefully read, and that again and again.

I will conclude, however, by soliciting your attention particularly to that part of it in which he says, with a liberality that does him honor, and a sincerity which I cannot doubt, because it is clearly true, on the one hand, "the prosperity of America is essential to the prosperity of Great Britain." And therefore, on the other, "the strength and power of Great Britain are not for herself only, but for the world." This, though it has not always been, is now certainly true.

Looking to the future, he observes, "When those adjustments shall take place, to which, though unfortunately not practicable at this moment, nor under the conditions prescribed to Mr. Pinkney, the undersigned nevertheless confidently looks forward, it will perhaps be no insecure pledge for the continuance of the good understanding between the two countries, that they will have learnt duly to appreciate each other's friendship, and that it will not hereafter be imputed to Great Britain, either on the one hand that she envies American industry, as prejudicial to British commerce; nor on the other hand, that she is compelled to court an intercourse with America, as absolutely necessary to her own existence. His Majesty would not hesitate to contribute, in any manner in his power, to restore to the commerce of the United States its wonted activity. And if it were possible to make any sacrifice for the repeal of the embargo, without appearing to deprecate it, as a measure of hostility, he would gladly have facilitated its removal."

One more translation of this diplomatic language, and I have done with the letter. I understand Mr. Canning as saying, at some period or other, our disputes will be settled; your people will then be convinced, that if they can injure us in one way, we can injure them as much in another—that it is as impossible that we should regret your prosperity, as it is that a merchant should repine at the wealth of a planter, fond of luxury, and his constant customer. But, on the other hand, you will not again undertake to quarrel with us under the idea that we cannot live without you. Still we are willing to acknowledge, that your commerce with us is extremely desirable; and therefore if you will enable us, by relinquishing your coercive system, to restore the intercourse between us without our appearing to have yielded to that system, "without our appearing to deprecate it as a measure of hostility," we will make any sacrifice. Relinquish your plan and you shall hear no more of our Orders in Council.

Yes, sir! I do not doubt and I confess I am surprised any one should doubt of the real cause of our difficulties with Great Britain. As our coercion system produced her resistance and retaliation, so would the abandonment of it restore that commercial intercourse which is so inseparably connected with our prosperity. And Mr. Canning gives the assurance of it in terms as unequivocal, as under all the circumstances could be possibly expected, or reasonably desired.

I have said before, and I repeat it again—valuable, important, as our commerce indisputably is to Great Britain, on account of that very value and importance, her Ministry cannot and dare not suffer the present experiment to terminate in a conviction, or even a doubt, of its being essential to her existence. If I am understood, sir, there cannot but be an end of the hope of coercing Great Britain to terms, in this way, until she is no longer able to resist us, and she passes under the dominion of France. And then our condition will be fearful indeed! If you cannot count fairly on the success of the experiment, on the one hand, and if on the other that state of things which alone can bring success may plunge us in overwhelming ruin, our whole system ought to be abandoned.

"The new state of things which has arisen in Europe," the revolution in Spain, has had a most unfortunate effect on the success of the embargo experiment, inasmuch as it has enabled Great Britain to incorporate, to identify herself with the Spanish people, and that in both hemispheres. And, sir, that which she has gained, not only enables her to bear up under our embargo, but much of it which we might have had is probably lost to us forever. Sir, I should have risked much, to secure the friendship of that nation at this time. If, as a freeman, and the Representative of a free people, I had been inaccessible to the sympathies which all such should feel, for a people deceived and betrayed, rising at length in their might and opposing their whole undivided force, with one great and noble and simultaneous impulse, to resist the subjugation attempted by a foreign tyrant; if I could without emotion have witnessed the march of the gloomy host, to "victory or death;" if without concern I could have seen millions of my fellow-beings, with unbroken firmness, and an unwavering desperation, "struggling in the storms of fate;" yet at least I should not have been induced by any considerations to have abandoned the interest of my own country, when the support of those patriotic heroes was so intimately connected with that interest. But, sir, it has so happened, that from the same cause which makes us mourn our departed prosperity, we have suffered England to unite herself with the hardy yeomanry of Spain, and to oppose, perhaps for the last time, a bold and formidable front, to the overwhelming power, of the conqueror of Europe. If fortunately, sir, instead of following up commercial experiment, we had set our trade at liberty, and, by sending supplies to Spain, had done all we could to assist in her enfranchisement, by enabling her to hold out in her great and noble and glorious purpose; if we had availed ourselves of this auspicious moment, to fasten ourselves upon the affections of an honest and faithful people; not only would our immediate prosperity have been advanced, but we should have bound them to us in a bond of union, strengthened and sanctified by the awful circumstances under which it was formed. Recur, sir, to the services, the assistance which the ill-fated monarch of France rendered us in the Revolution. What have been their effects upon this people? So great, sir, that the gratitude they excited has been transferred from our benefactor to his murderers!—Because they were Frenchmen! And not even yet, sir, has the sentiment ceased to operate upon the American mind. If then, instead of permitting Great Britain to go on without a competitor, "stealing the hearts of the people" of Spain, we had extended to them all the friendly offices in our power; if we had shown an anxiety to make up in the desire of doing what we lacked in the ability, the name of an American might have sounded in Spain like that of brother on this great Continent. We should have formed a union, founded on the sincerity of fraternal attachment, which would almost have made us one people. But if Spain be able to resist, we have lost an opportunity which will never recur. If her restoration to independence shall give to her people any new sentiment towards us, it will not be that of gratitude. For, judging of the feelings of the nation by the apparent indifference of the Administration, and the language of its immediate partisans—ignorant that there was in the country a humbled and persecuted band, who loved their own independence too much not to wish it to every brave and virtuous people—they will perhaps never be persuaded that there existed here anything but ill will towards them. The unhappy consequences of such an opinion it is unnecessary to expatiate upon.

But a gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. TROUP,) in the course of his observations the other day, remarked that, perhaps, at the very moment he was addressing you, the people of Spain might be imploring mercy at the feet of the conqueror. This presents us with another view of the subject; but a view which ought to have more imperiously coerced our Government to the course which they have neglected. Well, sir, let us suppose it. After resisting, till their means of resistance have perished—their countrymen cut up, and murdered, and destroyed—the remnant of the people of Spain receive the yoke. Suppose the triumph of insatiable ambition complete. Behold Joseph Napoleon, after having marched from Bayonne to Madrid, over the dead bodies of the Spaniards, amid the groans and the shrieks and the execration and the despair of the widows and orphans, behold him seated at length, all over covered with human gore, on the throne of Spain. And what then? Can you doubt that the colonies in South America will be from that moment independent? Or do gentlemen know so little of human nature, so little of Spanish character, as to think it possible that the inhabitants of Spanish America will rush forward to kiss the sceptre which has no ornament but the blood of their brethren? That they will be eager to pollute themselves with the horrible embraces of the murderers of their kindred? No, sir, it is impossible.

The moment, then, that Spain is conquered, her provinces on this continent become independent—and, as things have been managed, under the guarantee, and in the most cordial alliance with Great Britain. We shall have in them, of consequence, hostile and dangerous neighbors; while Great Britain will monopolize their trade, and if our present difficulties continue, perpetually instigate them to hostility against us. All this might have been prevented, if, in relation to Spain only, our Government had pursued the proper course. The merchants applied for leave to resume their commerce with Spain, but a deaf ear was turned to them. Disposed as Great Britain is to do us "harm," she may yet make use of the Spaniards on this continent for that purpose. And though these Spaniards have been long considered as contemptible, let it be remembered that a nation is always regenerated by a revolution. It assumes in such cases always a new and elevated and fearful character. Let us then beware how we make enemies of this people. Let us do all we can to conciliate their friendship. It is not perhaps even now too late to retrieve the advantages the Administration have overlooked. A change of conduct may regain us the affections and friendship which have been unnecessarily lost. And this, sir, is to be more desired, when we look forward to what is likely to be the situation of the European Continent if Spain is conquered. It will then be subject to the will and despotism of Napoleon. It will groan beneath that iron sceptre, in the circuit of whose influence no virtue can live, and every effort of liberty is idle. The seat of empire is from that moment transferred from Europe to this continent. There ignorance, and poverty, and hopeless vassalage will draw on a monotonous existence; or if ever they rise, it will be to be crushed by the irresistible hand of power. Europe, impoverished by its long continued wars, and the frequent insurrections to which it will be subject, will no longer be able to cultivate the arts of peace. It will be here then, on this regenerated continent, they may hope to find repose and protection. Let us not sacrifice the bright prospects before us to a visionary experiment.

It is time, sir, that we should retrace our steps. The course we have been running has produced no good; it certainly can produce none. Yet it seems, instead of going back, we are perpetually urged forward. This great measure which was to have restored, secured, and extended our commerce, has entirely destroyed it. Satisfied as the Administration are of its inefficacy, they seem determined to follow it up by a non-intercourse; and that, sir, that is to do wonders indeed! Why will gentlemen suffer themselves to be deceived? The embargo when it had been twelve months in operation was itself a non-intercourse to all substantial purposes; for it is very evident that if we cannot send anything out of the country, we can pay for nothing which is brought into it. The non-intercourse is the old thing after all. It is the old shoe new-ramped.

Sir, my heart bleeds for my poor country, when I see gentlemen determined to persist in this pernicious course—not a beam of hope brightens the prospect. All is darkness and ruin and misery before us. Is it possible we are going on in this way? that we are not to abandon our feeble system till Great Britain yields? It does indeed seem so, sir; for we have been told by a gentleman that when the embargo was laid on, Government did, by doing it, give a pledge to the nation that they would persevere until the ends intended were answered. If, sir, the embargo was such a pledge, the passing of this bill will be a new pledge to the same effect. I warn gentlemen, therefore, to be cautious. If the course they are pursuing be indeed a wrong one, promising no happy result, let them bear in mind, the farther they proceed the more difficult will be their return.

The gentlemen who opposed the system now in operation, have been called upon by the majority to say which would they do—they have been asked for their substitute for the embargo. And I confess I have been somewhat surprised to perceive a little embarrassment in giving the answer. As a Representative of the people, sir, I consider it my duty, as well as my right, to answer the question. And if the Administration should, in doing what I shall advise, retrieve the good opinion of the people, I will not regret it. What, say the majority to us, what would you do? What would you have us do? I will tell them, sir, what they should do. I will not withhold my feeble aid from them in their distress, I should not think it manly, fair, or humane to do so. We are all embarked in the same ship, and must sink or swim together; and although I am but a green hand, and before the mast, I will do all in my power to keep the vessel from going down. What would you have us do? say gentlemen. Sir, I would have them undo all they have done. Yes, sir, all—and at one smack! I would return to the policy of WASHINGTON. I would cut up this embargo system, root and branch. If this prescription be not followed soon, it will be too late. We shall be in a condition in which we shall be able to take no medicine whatever. I know, sir, I am prescribing a bitter pill for the Administration—but it is the only one that will answer. Let them take it therefore, and it will soon work miracles for the good of the country. Instead of going on accumulating the obstacles to accommodation with Great Britain, let us act an open part. Apply the sponge to your embargo, and proclamation, and non-importation; and I will venture to say there are no difficulties between us which honest men could not settle in three hours. Restore us to the policy of the great Father of his Country. We have had enough of theory and experiment and whim. Let us at last have a little old-fashioned practical wisdom.

But gentlemen say this would be submission. How submission? Because we have at last found out that by our system of commercial warfare we cannot coerce Great Britain, is an abandonment of that system submission? God help us, sir, if such positions require argument to refute them. No, sir; if, under the operation of our system Great Britain yields, she submits. And can we expect that she will do what we will not? Let us at length open our eyes to the truth. It is not submission to abandon an inefficacious project. Let us discard our prejudices. Hatred and love render men equally unfit to pursue wise counsels. If Great Britain was to come to your terms in consequence of the embargo, what would you say? that the embargo had done it! And if the embargo had done it, would the submission not be on her part? Under the pretence that we will not submit, considering submission scandalous, we are made to suppose our own conduct very fair, and kind, and generous, when we ask others to do what we shudder at. There is no disgrace in giving up an impracticable project; and "it is noble even to fail in great attempts." Let the Administration have the credit of having failed in the great attempt of coercing Great Britain by an embargo—for a great attempt it certainly was. But as it has failed, there can be no justification for persisting in it; else, that which was a charming speculation at the outset, will in the end degenerate into downright obstinacy.

Repeal the embargo and non-importation acts, rescind the proclamation, and send these resolutions out of the House, and we shall have a chance at least for peace—for a restoration of the general prosperity. The Orders in Council will not, cannot be persisted in, when you go to the source of our misfortunes—when you lay aside the miserable project of coercing Great Britain by an embargo—when, by resisting the French edicts, you show a determination to defend your rights against the real, because the first aggressor.

Before I sit down I beg leave to call the attention of the House to the course which is meditated to bring France to justice. The second of these resolutions discovers the manner in which it is to be done. But, sir, will France feel the effects of this measure; will she be even displeased at it? Indeed she will not. It will press upon England only. And in the same proportion that it is more powerful than the embargo, in the same proportion will it please, because it will accord with the policy of Napoleon Bonaparte. And in the face of the world you have already received the plaudits of Napoleon Bonaparte for your embargo. Can that, then, be called resistance to the injustice of a foreign Power, which, if she could dictate your course, she would order to be done? Sir, I am at a loss for words to express my astonishment at hearing that very conduct which France wishes us to pursue, to aid her in her projects upon England, called resistance! Gentlemen are eloquent enough when they speak of French injustice and perfidy; but not one of them has ventured to show how the embargo has, or the non-intercourse will operate upon her. The first resolution, indeed, says, that we will not submit to France; but the second, which is to show the kind of resistance we are to make use of, absolutely pledges the nation to that course which France particularly desires! She praised you for imposing the embargo; and if non-intercourse be stronger than embargo, so much the more will your praise be increased. Nay, I should not wonder if you should be rewarded by a volume of French poetry, in praise of your wisdom, virtue, and sincerity. Certainly it will be deserved. Sir, let us not be trifled with in this manner. Let us no longer be dealt with thus unfairly. Do we, by the adoption of these resolutions, resist Great Britain and France? No, sir, they know we do not; and therefore I will not put my trust in the deceivers, who "keep the word of promise to our ear, but break it to our hope." The conduct pursued towards France I will not call submission; that word does not describe its character. It is much worse than submission. We have all along aided her. We are about to aid her by the very measure which is called resistance to her. Is this conduct calculated to coerce France to justice? Sir, it would be insulting to the House to waste words on this subject—I say words—because the absurdity of the proposition is too palpable to admit of argument.

When I pointed out to gentlemen in conversation, the impropriety of professing to resist France, when we have really become her auxiliaries; they have answered, that it cannot be helped. It is calculated they say to strike upon England, and if the lash be not quite long enough to reach France, we cannot help it; that is not their fault. But I entreat them to reflect that the more they wound England, the more do they make it the policy of France to resist; and that if they wish really to have the edicts of both annulled, they do not come a step nearer their object—for whatever England loses by our system, France gains. In a state of war the loss of the one party is the gain of the other. Thus, though we may injure Britain, her sufferings will not tell for us; but for France, we do all we can; but we gain nothing by it. We "rob Peter to pay Paul."

Sir, by embarking against England at this time, we can promise ourselves no good. If we fail, all will agree that our condition will be deplorable. But if we succeed, we are ruined! Our only safety will be in defeat. I have already proved that England cannot, dare not acknowledge the efficacy of any commercial coercion. You have seen enough to know that she cannot yield to you, until she becomes incapable of resistance. Then she falls—into whose hands? Ours? No, sir; into the hands of France. She will cease to exist as a nation; and will you then turn round and fight France? For what? To compel her to let you trade with England, when there is no England to trade with. Your utmost success gives England to France, and you have gained nothing. The whole naval and military establishment of Europe is then at the disposal of Bonaparte. You will indeed have mounted the tiger upon the back of the shark for your own destruction. Yes, sir, your animosity may be gratified by overwhelming the Philistines in one general destruction; but remember you must yourselves be crushed in the ruins of the Pagan temples.

I could have wished that it had so happened that the policy of Washington, in 1794, had been the policy of the last year. I would now implore the House and the Administration to return to it. No beam of hope can cheer us in going forward. Peace cannot be attained by the present course, on the contrary it must lead us to open war. It is not dishonorable to retrace our steps. No country will dispute our pride; we have displayed enough of that; let us at length be persuaded that prudence and wisdom are not the lowest of national virtues; and that prosperity, liberty, and happiness, are not the lowest of national objects.

I have not addressed you, sir, on this occasion because I wished to wound the sensibility of those who are opposed to me in political opinions. I have believed that the present course could bring us to no result but that of disappointment and disgrace, and perhaps ruin; and I have been compelled to give my reasons for the belief. If the past has been indeed wrong, let us not obstinately plunge on in our error. It is honorable to abandon error. I conjure gentlemen to pause one moment before they proceed, that they may attentively survey the present and the future. The path of happiness from which we have strayed may be easily regained; and God grant we may have the magnanimity to return to it.

Mr. FINDLEY spoke for twenty minutes in reply.

The first resolution, contained in the following words, was divided, so as to take the question first on the part in italic:

"Resolved, That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain—and France."

The question was then taken on the first clause of this resolution, and carried—yeas 136, nays 2, as follows:

The question being about to be put on the remaining part of the resolution, viz: on the words "and France"—

Mr. RANDOLPH inquired whether it was in order to put a question on these words, as they expressed no definite meaning, containing of themselves no specific proposition to which a response of ay or no could be made?

The SPEAKER declared that it was in order.

Mr. RANDOLPH appealed from this decision, and called for the yeas and nays on the appeal; alleging, as a reason for making it, that no resolution or motion could be divided, except where the sense naturally divided it; and the words "and France," taken separately, contained no proposition which could either be affirmed or denied.

Much desultory debate took place on the appeal from the Speaker's decision; when

Mr. GHOLSON appealed from the decision of the Speaker, permitting the appeal by Mr. RANDOLPH after a question had been taken (on the first clause of the resolution) under the decision appealed from.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. GHOLSON, viz: "Is the decision of the Speaker, permitting an appeal, correct?" It was determined in the negative—yeas 16; and thus the question of order was decided.

The question then recurred on the second member of the first resolution; and the same being taken, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 2, as follows:

The main question was then taken that the House do agree to the said first resolution as reported from the Committee of the Whole, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the edicts of Great Britain and France:"

And resolved in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 2, as follows :

WEDNESDAY, December 14.

A Message, received from the President of the United States on the thirteenth instant, was read, transmitting a report of the Commissioners appointed under the act of March 29th, 1806, concerning a road from Cumberland to Ohio, being a statement of the proceedings under the act, since their last report communicated to Congress.—Referred to Messrs. JEREMIAH MORROW, JOHN G. JACKSON, LLOYD, LYON, and REA of Pennsylvania.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds, in certain cases, and for other purposes,'" was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to change the post route from Annapolis to Rockhall, by Baltimore to Rockhall," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The House proceeded to consider the second resolution reported by the select committee appointed on that part of the President's Message, at the commencement of the present session, which relates to our foreign relations, and to which the Committee of the Whole reported their agreement on the first instant; which said second resolution is contained in the words following, to wit :

"Resolved, That it is expedient to prohibit, by law, the admission, into the ports of the United States, of all public or private armed or unarmed ships or vessels belonging to Great Britain or France, or to any other of the belligerent Powers having in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States; and, also, the importation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the dominions of any of the said Powers, or imported from any place in the possession of either."

Mr. MILNOR opposed the resolution in a speech of about an hour; and Mr. FISK supported it in a speech of an hour and a half; when the House adjourned, without taking the question.

THURSDAY, December 15.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, presented a bill authorizing a lottery to raise a sum of money for the purpose of building a church in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, for the use of the Episcopal Congregation in the said town; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. JESS B. THOMAS,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory; and that the said committee have leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. THOMAS, CULPEPER, GOODWYN, BLAKE, and SLOAN, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. THOMAS presented to the House sundry resolutions of the Legislative Council of the Indiana Territory, relative to an extension of the right of suffrage therein; which were read, and, together with such parts of the resolutions of the House of Representatives of that Territory, presented on the fourteenth ultimo, as relate to the same subject, referred to the select committee last appointed,

Mr. LEWIS presented to the House a representation from Samuel H. Smith, Robert Brent, and Thomas Corcoran, a committee appointed by the Levy Court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; praying that the said Levy Court may be vested with full power to lay out and repair public roads, and to erect and repair bridges in the said county, under such conditions as the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

The said representation was read, and, together with a copy of certain proceedings of the Levy Court aforesaid, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. L. also presented a petition of the Vestry of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the City of Washington, praying that the petitioners may be authorized by law, to raise, by way of lottery, a sum not exceeding eight thousand dollars, for the purpose of finishing the building of a church in the said city, and the payment of debts already incurred on account of the same.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. ERPES presented to the House certain returns or statements relative to the amount of free male inhabitants, and the number of votes taken at elections held in the counties of Randolph and St Clair, in the Territory of Indiana, together with the depositions of sundry persons in that Territory, relative thereto; which were referred to the committee appointed, on the thirteenth instant, "to inquire into the expediency of dividing the Indiana Territory."

On motion, of Mr. JOHNSON, the letter and representation of Thomas Paine, presented on the fourth of February last, was referred to the Committee of Claims.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The House resumed the consideration of the second resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole on the first instant, which was depending yesterday at the time of adjournment.

Mr. UPHAM spoke against it for about three quarters of an hour. The following is the concluding portion of his speech, being all which the compiler has been able to recover.

This embargo system, said Mr. U., will indeed destroy our commerce, as far as it can be done by human laws. And this I verily believe to have been the object of those who projected and recommended this system. Yes, sir, I do believe that the object of those who projected and recommended this system was, and now is, to annihilate your active commerce—to form this into a Chinese country. How far and to how many they have exposed "the whole ground," I will not pretend to say. The object, in their view, was unquestionably a laudable one. They undoubtedly had in view the permanent happiness of their country. This, sir, I am bound to suppose—for I must not, I do not call in question their motives. They considered, that the seeds of war between this and the other nations of the earth, were sown on the ocean—that the foundations of all our national conflicts were laid in the prosecution of commerce; that such was the relative situation of this country, separated from the great belligerent Powers of the world by the Atlantic ocean, that it was scarcely possible for us to be involved in war, if we should adopt and scrupulously preserve the scheme of "a dignified retirement,"—a terra-pin system—if we should draw and keep ourselves within our shell.

The projectors of this system, although they might be fully sensible of the advantage of commerce, in raising a revenue and in enriching the nation, yet they might be convinced, that its disadvantage, as a source of war, was far greater. They might calculate upon a ten years' war, say once in fifty years. They might place the advantage of commerce to its credit, and the disadvantage of war, as a consequence of commerce, to its debit, and make up very honestly a footing against it. However fallacious and utopian, and indeed ridiculous this sort of calculation may appear to me, I am convinced of its being very honestly adopted by those who recommended the embargo system, under the present reign of political philosophy or philosophical policy.

I am, sir, induced to believe, that the real object of those who projected and recommended this system, was to destroy our commerce, because they must have had some object, and it could not have been intended as a precautionary measure, so far as it respects any apprehensions from the British Orders in Council—for they were not known in this country to exist at the time the President recommended the first embargo law, the 18th of December, 1807, nor when the law was passed, the 22d of the same December. I say, sir, in the face of the House and in the face of the nation, that the British Orders in Council were not known in this country to exist when the first embargo law was passed. I say so, because I attended, with much interest, to the whole of the debate upon the passage of the law, and the orders were not once mentioned. If the advocates of this law had known of the existence of the British orders, we should surely have heard of them on this floor. If they had been known to the President, his knowledge, in some form or shape, would have found its way within these walls.

The object then of this measure was not precautionary, so far as it respects anything to be apprehended from the British Orders in Council. And as to the decrees of France, nothing, as I have before suggested, very serious, was to be feared from them. So long as England with her navy was at war with France, it certainly would not have been thought necessary to lay a general embargo as a precautionary measure against the decrees of the latter, whatever might be considered prudent in case a permanent peace should take place between these nations—an event which will happen when—and not before—the millennium shall commence. As to any expectation of coercing to terms by the embargo, those two great belligerent Powers, or either of them, who have so long maintained the balance of power among all the Powers of the earth, the expectation never could have been entertained by any rational man. No, sir, the real object was neither precaution nor coercion, in my belief. It was to destroy our active commerce—to form this country into a China.

Again, sir, if the measure was intended solely as a precautionary measure, why make it permanent? Why not a temporary embargo upon your ships and vessels? An honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. MUMFORD,) I very well recollect, moved an amendment so that the law should be temporary and not perpetual. He moved an amendment so as to limit the embargo to sixty days. But his amendment was lost. Nothing but a general and perpetual embargo would do.

I ask again, sir, if "the act was a measure of precaution only, called for by the occasion," why make the law perpetual, instead of temporary? If it was "strictly a measure of precaution, required by the dangers incident to external commerce," why was not the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MUMFORD) adopted?

As further evidence, Mr. Speaker, that the embargo, was intended as a permanent measure—a measure to destroy commerce—I will refer you to the answer of the President of the United States, to the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire. With your leave, sir, I will read an extract from this answer, speaking of the embargo: "It gave us time to make a last appeal to the reason and reputation of nations. In the meanwhile, I see with satisfaction that this measure of self-denial is approved and supported by the great body of real citizens; that they meet with cheerfulness the temporary privations it occasions, and are preparing with spirit to provide for themselves those comforts and conveniences of life, for which it would be unwise ever more to resort to distant countries."

Now, sir, this can be understood but one way. It admits of no comment. It speaks for itself. "I see with satisfaction" that "the great body of real citizens are preparing with spirit to provide for themselves those comforts and conveniences of life, for which it would be unwise ever more to resort to distant countries."

But, Mr. Speaker, the persisting still in this system, and we perceive by the President's Message at the commencement of the present session of Congress that he does persist in it, is enough of itself to convince me that the object is the annihilation of your commerce. Yes, sir, it is conclusive and irresistible evidence to my mind.

There never was before, sir, a general and perpetual embargo laid in any country from the beginning of the world. There was never an embargo before, general or special, perpetual or temporary, continued for the length of time our own has been continued. It is almost a year since the law imposing this embargo was enacted. And, sir, it is not to be repealed. The system is to be persisted in. It is to be executed more vigorously. Sir, can any person doubt of its object?

However, Mr. Speaker, commerce in this country cannot be destroyed by human laws. No, sir, the commerce of this country cannot be annihilated by your embargo laws. These laws will be evaded; they will be violated; they are in derogation of the common and national rights of the citizens. The suspension of commerce and navigation is so at variance with all the feelings, the customs and habits and interest of the people of the Northern States, that they will evade, they will hazard the penalties, and violate your laws suspending the means of their existence. They will consider that to do it is no malum in se, but merely malum prohibitum. It is time to speak out; these laws cannot be permanently enforced.

I will not say as my honorable colleague, who sits before me, (Mr. QUINCY,) has said, however true I believe it to be, I will not say, that you may as well enact and execute laws to control and counteract the laws of nature, to control the elements of Heaven. That you may as well make and enforce laws to prevent the flowing of the water, the circulation of the air, &c. But this I will say, sir, that you may as well, by your laws, induce the people of New England to abandon forever their springs and their wells as to abandon forever the ocean. You may as well attempt to deprive them of the use of their fresh as of their salt waters. They have been as long and as constantly in the use of the latter as of the former. Yes, sir, you may rely upon it, you may as well coerce by law the people of New England to abandon permanently the use of their springs and their wells in their ordinary culinary concerns, as to coerce them by law permanently to abandon the use of the ocean. Why, sir, they have been constantly in the use of this common and national privilege ever since their ancestors landed on the shores of Plymouth. The ancestors of the people of New England early employed themselves in fishing, and transported their fish, with their lumber, to the West Indies, which were settled before that country, and there exchanged them for the "comforts and conveniences of life."—Their posterity has ever since been extending their commerce, "it has grown with their growth and strengthened with their strength." No, sir, they cannot—they will not give it up.

But it is said, sir, to give up this embargo system, is submission—disgraceful submission.

The whole state of our foreign relations seems to be brought by your committee on so much of the President's Message as respects those relations to a sort of triplebranch alternative—submission, embargo, or war with both nations. As to war with both nations at the same time, while those nations are engaged in an inveterate and deadly war with each other—this has been set in its proper ridiculous point of light by other gentlemen. I shall say nothing about it. Its total impracticability has been sufficiently illustrated.

But for my life, I cannot distinguish between the embargo and submission. I cannot see how gentlemen conjure with the embargo so as to make it other than submission.

A gentleman from Virginia, who spoke early on this subject, (Mr. CLOFTON,) observed, that to navigate the ocean and pursue our commerce as pointed out by the belligerent nations, in their orders and decrees, would unquestionably be submission abject submission; but to relinquish navigation, and to give up entirely our commerce, in consequence of these orders and decrees, is no submission at all. Now, sir, I do not understand this. My neighbor orders me to build and repair the fences around my farm in a certain way; in some places, he directs me to erect walls, in others, to make what we in our country call Virginia fence. He also prescribes in what manner I shall till and cultivate my farm, and with what seeds I shall sow and plant it. Now, according to this gentleman from Virginia, if I follow the orders and the directions of my neighbor, it is submission; but if, in consequence of his interference in my concerns, by his commands and directions, I repair and build no fences at all around my farm and forbear to put any seeds into my ground or to till or cultivate my farm in any way—if in consequence of his orders I permit my farm to go into decay and my lands to lie fallow and common—if, indeed, I abandon my farm altogether with all its profits, this forsooth is no submission!

Again, Mr. Speaker, what is the subject-matter of all our controversy, with France and England? Surely it will be agreed, that the subject-matter of all our difficulties with these nations relates to our rights to navigate the ocean and carry on our commerce. They say the ocean must be navigated by us under certain restraints, and that our commerce must be managed under certain limitations and conditions. We say these limitations and restraints are contrary to the laws and usages of nations. All agree, at least in their speeches on this floor, that the use of the ocean, that our commerce, is of the utmost importance to us—that our seamen are employed by it, fed they and their families are by it, fed and clothed and made happy; that our citizens are enriched and our national exchequer caused to overflow. Now, sir, what can we do? Why, sir, by our embargo laws, we abandon the ocean and give up our commerce, and still talk about embargo or submission. By the embargo we submit to yield up all our rights on the ocean, and still present to the nation the alternative of embargo or submission. In consequence of the British orders and French decrees, we abandon all our rights on the ocean, everything in dispute, and in the same breath we say—we vote—we gravely and solemnly resolve, we cannot, without a sacrifice of our rights, our honor, and our independence, submit to these same orders and decrees.

But, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen ask us for a substitute. They inquire what measure is to be adopted, if the embargo is to be given up. Why, sir, I think we are on sure ground as to that. There is no hazard. The country cannot be in a worse situation than it now is, borne down and groaning under the present system. We are, sir, committing a national suicide.

To inquire for a substitute, is like a man in the very act of committing suicide asking in what other way he shall preserve his life. Yes, sir, like a man in the very act of cutting his own throat, upon being solicited to desist, inquiring in what manner than by cutting his throat he can save his life.

I have done, Mr. Speaker. As I am convinced that your embargo has not answered and will not answer any of the avowed purposes of its advocates; as it oppresses no nation but our own; as its object, in fact, is to destroy our own active commerce; as to continue it is infinitely greater and more disgraceful submission, than to repeal it, I hope most earnestly it will be repealed.

Mr. LIVERMORE followed in opposition to the resolution, in a speech of about an hour.

Mr. BOYD spoke in support of it, for about twenty minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR followed, on the same side, in a speech of about an hour.

Mr. COOK spoke a few minutes, in explanation of his former remarks.

A motion was made to adjourn, and negatived—54 to 49.

Mr. PITKIN said, that he wished to deliver his sentiments on this important subject, and did not wish to commence at this late hour; and renewed the motion to adjourn; which was carried—57, to 51.

FRIDAY, December 16.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the charter of Alexandria;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. JOHN MONTGOMERY, from the committee appointed, on the 15th ultimo, "to inquire if any, and what, compensation ought to be made to Captain Pike, and his companions, for their services in exploring the Mississippi river, in their late expedition to the sources of the Osage, Arkansas, and La Platte rivers, together with their tour through New Spain, made a report thereon; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Mr. JOHN MONTGOMERY, from the same committee, presented a bill making compensation to Captain Zebulon M. Pike and his companions; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report, and sundry statements marked A, B, C, and D, prepared in pursuance of the "Act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Treasury Department,'" which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and two thousand copies of the report, and three hundred copies of the letter and statements accompanying the same, ordered to be printed for the use of the members.

Mr. THOMAS presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Knox county, in the Indiana Territory, in opposition to the prayer of petitions of the inhabitants of the counties of Randolph and St. Clair, presented on the 6th of April last, for a division of the said Territory into two separate governments.—Referred to the committee appointed, the 13th instant, on the expediency of dividing the Indiana Territory.

On a motion made by Mr. GARDENIER, that when this House adjourns, it will adjourn to meet on Monday next; the question was taken thereupon, and passed in the negative—yeas 43, nays 58, as follows:

The House resumed the consideration of the second resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole, on the 1st instant, which was depending yesterday at the time of adjournment.

Mr. NEWTON supported the resolution and the report generally in a speech of about two hours and a half; when the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, December 17.

On a motion made by Mr. ALEXANDER WILSON, that the House do now adjourn until Monday morning, 11 o'clock, the question was taken thereupon, and passed in the negative—yeas 5, nays 39, as follows:

YAYS—Abram Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, Archibald Van Horn, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, and Alexander Wilson.

NAYS—Willis Alston, jun., Joseph Barker, William W. Bibb, John Blake, jun., William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, John Clopton, John Culpeper, James Fisk, Meshack Franklin, Francis Gardner, Edwin Gray, Isaiah L. Green, John Harris, William Helms, Daniel Hsley, Thomas Kenan, John Lambert, Nathaniel Macon, William Milnor, Daniel Montgomery, jun., Jeremiah Morrow, John Morrow, Roger Nelson, Thomas Newbold, Timothy Pitkin, jun., Josiah Quincy, John Rhea of Tennessee, Jacob Richards, Ebenezer Seaver, Jedediah K. Smith, John Smith, Clement Storer, Benjamin Tallmadge, John Taylor, John Thompson, Geo. M. Troup, James I. Van Alen, and Robert Whitehill.

It having appeared by the foregoing vote, that a quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole number of members, was not present, a motion was made by Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, that the SPEAKER be requested to direct the Doorkeeper to send for absent members, for the purpose of forming a quorum to proceed on the business before the House; and the question being taken

YAYS—John Davenport, jun., David Holmes, Robert Jenkins, Edward St. Loe Livermore, Philip Van Cortlandt, Archibald Van Horn, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Alexander Wilson, and Richard Winn.

NAYS—Willis Alston, jun., Joseph Barker, William W. Bibb, William Blackledge, John Blake, jun., William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, John Clopton, John Culpeper, John W. Smith, Samuel Smith, Clement Storer, Benjamin Tallmadge, John Taylor, John Thompson, Abram Trigg, George M. Troup, James I. Van Alen, Robert Whitehill, David R. Williams, and Nathan Wilson.

A sufficient number of members to form a quorum having appeared, and taken their seats in the House, Mr. Lewis, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act authorizing the erection of a bridge over the river Potomac, within the District of Columbia;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to provide for arming, manning, and fitting out for immediate service, all the public ships of war, vessels, and gunboats, of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. BURWELL reported a bill to establish an uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States. He observed, that it would be recollected that he had suggested a modification in this bill, but the committee had not been able to concur in opinion on the subject, and he reported the bill in the same form as it was proposed last session, intending to propose his modification in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for Monday three weeks.

IMPORTATION OF SALT.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, that from information received from various parts of the United States, it appeared that the article of salt, so essential for public support, was very scarce, and had risen in his country 100 per cent. that is, to two dollars per bushel. He was, therefore, induced to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of permitting certain vessels to depart from the ports and harbors of the United States for the purpose of importing salt; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

The House agreed to consider the resolution—58 to 25.

Mr. CUTTS said, that he observed by a paper containing the price current, that the price was but 6s. 6d. per bushel.

Mr. BACON said, that as this was a subject on which an instantaneous decision should not be made, he should move that it lie on the table.

Mr. LIVERMORE said that the price of this article was rapidly rising, and it was extremely desirous that vessels should be permitted to go to Turk's island for the purpose of bringing in salt.

The motion that it lie on the table was carried—ayes 51.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The unfinished business of yesterday was taken up—the question being on the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to prohibit, by law, the admission into the ports of the United States of all public or private armed or unarmed ships or vessels belonging to Great Britain or France, or to any other of the belligerent Powers, having in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States; and also the importation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions of any of the said Powers, or imported from any place in the possession of either.

Mr. RHEA of Tennessee supported the resolution in a speech of near two hours.

Mr. TAGGART said: Mr. Speaker, not being much in the habit of addressing this House, I feel a degree of diffidence on the present occasion. But as I have listened with patience and attention to the lengthy discussion which has taken place, and as the subject itself is all-important, embracing nothing less than the dearest interest of the nation, and perhaps involving in its consequences the existence of our independence itself, I shall make no apology for obtruding some observations on the House even at this late stage of the debate.

As I find that gentlemen have not strictly confined themselves to the positions contained in the resolutions on which we are called to vote; nor to the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, on which these resolutions are predicated; but have extended their views to the whole subject of our foreign relations, I shall beg the indulgence of the House, while I attempt to pursue the same course. Indeed it seems to me proper that the debate should take this direction; for, if I understand the reasoning of the Committee of Foreign Relations, the adoption of these resolutions is connected with, and come in aid of the present system, now in operation; I mean the embargo.

Some gentlemen, who have preceded me, have observed that they did not enter on the discussion expecting to effect any alteration in the sentiments of a single individual in the House; intimating, as I understood them, that the discussion was rather designed for the public than for the House of Representatives. At this late hour of the debate, and after the lengthy and brilliant display both of eloquence and argument, which has been made, and which has, probably, had but little effect in altering opinions already formed, it would be a piece of vanity which I should not wish to possess, should I address you with any such expectation. But as I shall probably record my name in a small minority, on the several questions which will be taken, and as that portion of the community which I represent has the same stake at issue with their fellow-citizens in the decision of the present question, some explanation of the reasons of my conduct may be due to them.

While I express my dissent, in toto, from the course which has been pursued, and which it still appears to be the determination to follow, and enter my solemn protest against all responsibility for the consequences, I shall probably decline the call often made upon the minority, by members in the majority, to submit resolutions, propositions, or measures, which in our opinions ought to be pursued in preference to the present. It must be familiar to the recollection of gentlemen that during the last session of Congress, when the subject of the embargo was under consideration, propositions submitted by the minority were uniformly refused so much as a consideration by the House. This gives but poor encouragement for the submission of any propositions at present.

I shall not take up the time of the House by entering into an historical detail of the wrongs and injuries we have received from the different belligerents, from time to time. This has been repeatedly done in the course of the debate. The injuries, particularly of one of the belligerents, have been descanted upon with all the glow of the most impassioned eloquence, and the whole catalogue of the aggressions of many years have been collected into a focus, for the present occasion. We have not only had the full catalogue of actual wrongs enumerated, but to these have been added a great number of intentional injuries, and we have ventured to penetrate into her views and motives, not only in what she has actually done, but in what, it has been discovered some how or other, that she intended to do. The injuries of the other Power have been commented upon more briefly, but some pretty strong lines of the picture have been exhibited to view. Could we by the aid of a magical wand, or in some other way, transport the rulers of Great Britain into our galleries, to hear our debates, in which they might have all their political sins brought to their remembrance, possibly it might bring them to repentance, and we might see the end of our difficulties. Could Bonaparte, and a few of his Princes, Dukes, and Ministers of State, be made of the party, it might be worth while to fill up the strong outlines which have been given, with the proper coloring, if any hope existed that it might have a similar effect. But all this would have but little to do with the discussion of the subject now before the House. The inquiry now is, not what injuries we have received from one or both the belligerents, from time to time, but what measures are proper for us to adopt in the present crisis, in order to secure our liberties and independence, and guard our maritime and commercial rights, against the present and future encroachments of both.

Nor shall I inquire, with metaphysical nicety, which of the belligerents have done us the greatest injury, or whose conduct has been the most outrageous—that of Great Britain, in throwing such obstacles in the way of our trade to France and those European nations which are in alliance with her, by her Orders in Council, as, taken in connexion with the French decrees, amount to a prohibition of all trade to that part of the continent of Europe which is under her control, while the colonies are left open; or that of France, who interdicts all commerce with Great Britain and her dependencies, and declares an American vessel which had been so much as visited, or even spoken to by a British cruiser, to be a good prize, and the ship denationalized; and in the execution of her decrees, takes, sequesters, and confiscates our vessels and cargoes, or scuttles and burns them on the high seas. I think it must be allowed that there is a shade of difference, at least in the manner in which the two nations execute their systems of aggressions. Great Britain is, I believe, not in the habit of confiscating vessels under her Orders of Council; at least, I have heard of but few complaints on that subject. Nor will it be necessary to inquire which of the belligerents has done us the most actual harm. It is readily granted that Great Britain, on account of her maritime superiority is capable of doing us the most injury in that part in which we are the most vulnerable. I am however far from submitting to the accuracy of the calculation of gentlemen who tell us of the almost countless millions she would put into her own coffers, as a tax upon the industry of the United States, in consequence of her Orders of Council. These calculations are bottomed upon the supposition, that sales, as extensively as formerly, might be made on the continent of Europe, after paying the tax or tribute imposed by the orders. But is this the fact? I believe not. Independent of the Orders in Council, the French decrees amount to a virtual prohibition of all commerce to France and her dependencies; for what prudent merchant would send a cargo to France, and what insurance company would underwrite one, liable to confiscation on all the arbitrary, capricious constructions of these decrees, and subject to all the vexatious proceedings under them? These decrees, as fortified by the Orders in Council, amount rather to a prohibition of this commerce, than a tax upon it. A gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) asked the question some days since of a gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. R. JACKSON,) at what rate of premiums a vessel could now be insured to France, subject to the risk of the British Orders in Council. Meaning, as I supposed, to convey this idea, that the whole risk was owing to the Orders in Council. But, if it can be ascertained what the rate of insurance would be if the orders should be repealed, while the orders continued in force, only between that and the present rate, whatever it may be, would be justly chargeable to the Orders in Council. But Great Britain imposes a tax or tribute on cargoes coming from France and her dependencies, and bound to the United States. Admitted; but few or no vessels can enter during the continuance of the present system: certainly few will come out. Consequently no great sums could come into the British coffers. But in certain cases we are permitted to burn our property. I have no knowledge of this fact, only what is obtained from statements on this floor. Admitting it to be correct, it certainly must be much worse than any of the proceedings of France. The one gives us the trouble and pain of burning our own property; the other, in her superior kindness, takes that trouble off our hands, and kindly burns it herself.

I shall also waive, as foreign to the present discussion, any inquiry whether our Administration has or has not discovered any undue partialities for or against either of the belligerents, contrary to that rigid impartiality towards nations at war, which is the true policy of neutrals. Much has been said about a French party and a British party in America. I would fondly indulge the hope that we all belong to an American party; for whatever may be our party bickerings at home, I think we can, at present, have but few motives to attach us to the conduct of either nation, as it respects us. As it respects the cause for which the two nations are contending with each other, there may be an honest preference. But a man who would cherish an attachment to any foreign nation, to the prejudice of his own country, is one with whom I have no fellowship; and I would be loth to impute such a predilection to any gentleman of this House. But as these things do not bear particularly on our present subject, and would lead to a wide field of unprofitable discussion, I shall leave them.

My remaining observations shall be directed to the system which has been adopted with a view to extricate us out of the difficulties in which we have been involved, by the clashing interests of the different belligerents. As a permanent part of the system, we are stared in front with the embargo. I will not call it Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum; I will call it by its own proper name—Embargo—that all-powerful engine of bloodless war, as it has been called, which was to coerce the nations of Europe into an acquiescence in our demands. This embargo we are now told is almost forgotten in Europe, at least all attention to it is said to be absorbed by the superior glare of passing events. But, my word for it, half a century will not obliterate the remembrance of it in America. It is true, none of the resolutions proposed by the committee, at the close of their report, makes express mention of the existing embargo. But, in the reasoning of the committee, this is mentioned as one of the evils out of which we have to make a choice; for it seems, we have only a choice of evils, and the resolutions seem to be intended further to fortify the measure.

DECEMBER, 1808.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

After the lengthy discussions which have already taken place, it will be almost impossible, in directing my observations to this subject, to avoid repeating some observations already advanced. Here I must claim the indulgence granted to others.

In adverting to the subject of the embargo, I shall consider it—1st. In respect to its constitutionality; 2d. In respect to its expediency and utility, or the probability of its producing upon foreign nations any of the coercive effects contemplated.

As it respects the constitutionality of the embargo, I am sensible that I tread on very tender, delicate ground. I shall, therefore, endeavor to step over it lightly. I am sensible that I shall be met in the threshold with the opinions of our courts of law, some of which have decided the embargo to be Constitutional. I have a high veneration for judicial decisions, and am always disposed to bow before them with becoming reverence. Perhaps a perusal of the reasonings on which these decisions were founded, would remove my objections. But never having had that opportunity, and knowing that such decisions are not always infallible, for this plain reason, that they oftentimes clash with each other; knowing also, that such decisions, even with regard to your embargo laws, are not always relied on as the true construction, but a different cause has been adopted for carrying their provisions into execution; I hope I shall be permitted to express my doubts of the constitutionality of a law imposing a permanent embargo. In what clause of the Constitution is this delegation of such a power to the Congress of the United States, either expressed or implied? Here it will be perhaps necessary to beg pardon of some gentlemen for using the term "permanent embargo." But I cannot retract it. I know that several gentlemen who voted in favor of the law, have declared, on the floor of this House, that they had no idea of an embargo as a permanent measure. So far as it respects their own intentions, I am bound to give full faith and credit to the declarations of gentlemen. But supposing that every member of the House was to express individually on the floor that such was his intentions, would that alter the nature of the law? I believe not. I have very little acquaintance with the modes of procedure in courts of justice; therefore I hope that, in what I am about to state, professional men will set me right, if I am incorrect. But I take it to be a maxim of jurisprudence that, in the decision of important causes, resort must be had to the best evidence the nature of the case admits. An affidavit is considered as an inferior kind of evidence to that of a witness examined in open court. There are many cases in which affidavits cannot be admitted, particularly in criminal cases, where life or limb is at hazard. But the evidence of a solemn, public, regularly authenticated record, is superior to parole testimony, and cannot be shaken by it, because it is a higher and more conclusive kind of evidence. Among all public records, none can claim a higher authority than the statute book of the United States. Appealing thus to your statute book, Mr. Speaker, as to evidence of the highest kind, and finding no clause in the law itself which indicates that it will expire by its own limitation, as is the case of temporary laws, I think I am authorized to denominate it a permanent embargo. By this I do not mean that it is irrevocable, or like the laws of the Medes and Persians which alter not. The repeal of it, however, is not within the control of this House, even although an unanimous vote should be in favor of the measure, and the circumstance may occur that it cannot be repealed by both branches, without the concurrence of two-thirds of each in favor of the measure.

In the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, power is given to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, between the several States, and with the Indian tribes. In the ninth section of the same article, Congress is expressly prohibited from laying a duty or tax upon the exports of any State. And in the tenth amendment to that instrument, which has been ratified by the several States so as to become part of the Constitution, we find it stated, that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved by it, to the States respectively, or to the people. Congress may regulate commerce. If a power to interdict or annihilate commerce, is a necessary appendage to the power of regulation, then; it must be confessed that Congress possess that power. But, Mr. Speaker, supposing you should hand your watch to a proper artisan, in order to have it regulated, and he should dash it to pieces in your presence, would you call this regulating? I believe not. But might he not plead in his justification the construction put upon the power vested in Congress, by the Constitution, to regulate commerce? Supposing the affair did not proceed that length. Supposing he only removed the mainspring, and laid it aside, to consume with filth and rust, and told you that he would replace it again, and reduce all the wheels into order, so as to make it an excellent watch, on the happening of certain events entirely without his own control; would that be considered as a legitimate appendage to his power of regulating? I believe not. But could he not prove that he possessed this right, by the construction put upon the Constitution of the United States? Congress is expressly prohibited by the Constitution from laying a duty upon exports, to the amount of so much as one single cent. Can it be supposed that the same instrument containing that prohibition should, upon any principles of fair construction, authorize the total interdiction of exports? Supposing that an express article for the purpose of empowering Congress to interdict all foreign commerce, say for one, two, or three years, or permanently, had been agitated in the Convention which framed the Constitution; can it be supposed that that body, tremblingly alive to all encroachments, either upon personal liberty or State rights, would have acceded to such an article? No, it would have been spurned with contempt, as containing, not the mere germ, but the very quintessence of despotism; and no idea was, I trust, then entertained by what far-fetched construction, a justification of such a measure would be attempted hereafter. What would be thought of an interdict upon agriculture? Would any person suppose that Congress possess legitimate powers to say to the inhabitants of any one district, you shall hereafter abstain, either permanently or during the pleasure of the Government, from plowing, sowing, reaping, &c. Is there any person who would attempt to justify the issuing of such a mandate on Constitutional grounds? I believe not. But commercial pursuits are equally lawful and laudable with agriculture, and the merchant is equally entitled to the fostering care of Government with the man who cultivates the soil. Nay, were it not for a market for surplus produce, and for the reception of such articles in return as are furnished by the merchant, where would be the prosperity of agriculture itself? The farmer would be deprived of the most powerful stimulus to industry. A controversy between the merchant and the agriculturist would, pretty much, resemble the controversy in the fable between the hands and the feet on one side, and the belly on the other. Withdraw the support from the latter and all the members will languish.

But waiving any further consideration of the constitutionality of the embargo, I take it for granted that it is, on all hands, allowed to be a great evil in itself. It can only be endured in the expectation that it will be the means of procuring some great future good, or for the sake of avoiding a still greater impending evil. I shall not consider its comparatively greater pressure upon one part of the United States than another. I shall make no comparison between Northern, Southern, or Middle States. All I believe find its pressure to be sufficiently hard. I shall not pretend to say that it bears harder on that section of the country which I have the honor to represent, than it does upon other parts. I believe it does not. Although it is very sensibly felt, yet, in a district inhabited principally by farmers, settled on small plantations, enjoying a tolerably fruitful soil, which yields a competency to the hand of industry; and where domestic manufactures are probably as far advanced as in most places, we can bear it as long as our neighbors. I presume it is much more distressing on our seaboard. I wish to consider it as affecting the whole, and there are two points of view in which it presents itself:

1st. As a measure of precaution as it respects ourselves.

2d. As a measure of coercion in respect to the different belligerents against whom we have causes of complaint.

In both these points of view I shall attempt to consider it. As a precautionary measure, we are told that it has preserved our ships and seamen, and an immense property, which I think the chairman of the Committee on our Foreign Relations estimated at upwards of one hundred millions, that would otherwise have fallen into the hands of the enemy.

As it respects our ships, if their laying at our wharves at the annual loss of seven or eight millions, the estimated amount of freight alone, while the decay is quite as great, probably greater, than if they were wafted over every part of the Union, can with propriety be called preservation—so far as the loss by capture would have been greater than that occasioned by their present inaction and decay, their preservation may be ascribed to the embargo.

As it respects the preservation of our seamen, I doubt the fact whether they may be at all considered as preserved by this measure. Our seamen have disappeared; and it is the opinion of men possessing favorable opportunities for information, that if the embargo was now raised it would be with the greatest difficulty that seamen could be found to man half our ships. Not only have British seamen, who were cloaked under fraudulent American protections, deserted our shores, but many Americans have emigrated with them. The correctness of this fact I find disputed, particularly by a gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) who has made a very high encomium on the patriotism of American seamen. They are now, says the gentleman, in the bosom of their country; the moment their services are wanted, they will flock to your shores. No doubt, some are in this situation. But I seriously doubt, whether their number would be sufficient to answer any sudden emergency. Many of our seamen have no other means of subsistence than the ocean, and, having always been accustomed to that mode of life, are unfit for any other species of industry. You may as well change a carpenter into a watchmaker, as transform a sailor into a cultivator of the soil. Deprived of their customary means of support by an exclusion from the ocean, they have no alternative left, but either to beg or commit depredations on the property of others. Their spirits are too high to brook the first, and their honesty proof against the last. I make no doubt but the patriotism of American seamen is equal to that of any other seamen in the world. But sine Cerere et Baccho friget Venus, saith the poet. Put this into plain, homely English, and apply it to patriotism, i. e. without something to eat and drink, aye, and something for clothing too, patriotism will soon cool. Mere patriotism will be found worse than soup maigre, or water gruel, to satisfy the cravings of hunger, nor will it clothe the naked. It will not transform your sailors into chameleons, and enable them to live upon air. It is not then justly a matter of wonder, if many of our seamen—deprived of subsistence by the operation of your laws, in the only way in which they have been accustomed to obtain it, should seek that employment and support in a foreign country, of which they are unjustly deprived in their own; the whole weight of their patriotism to the contrary notwithstanding. Our system is at least of this advantage to the British nation: they obtain our seamen without either the trouble or odium of impressment. I will suppose the patriotism of the gentleman from South Carolina equally warm, equally glowing with that of any other gentlemen in this House, perhaps in this nation. But supposing Government should interdict the only occupation by which he could gain a subsistence, and by an act, of which he could neither see the necessity, the justice, nor the policy, reduce him to the situation of making the choice between begging and emigration; his love of country would cool. And as I find he sometimes quotes scripture, I shall take the liberty of suggesting a passage which would, in such a state of things, probably occur to his mind: "if they persecute you in one city, flee to another."

As to property supposed to have been saved by this precautionary measure. This has been, I believe, stated by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to amount to more than one hundred millions, equal to the total of our exports of both foreign and domestic articles for one year. But predictions, permit me to say, of what might have happened in a different state of things, are but little to be regarded. That property to a limited amount may have been saved, I do not dispute. But so far as we can ground our calculations on matter of fact, the amount is greatly overrated, probably one thousand per cent., or it may be more. Our valuable India ships which were at sea, and exposed to the ravages both of the British Orders of Council and the French decrees have, I believe, escaped capture, and returned in safety, as well as many other ships of different descriptions, and many that chose not to return, in order to keep out of the clutches of the embargo, still navigate the ocean in safety. But, as their safety will be ascribed to their sailing under odious and detestable British licenses, I shall leave them out of the account, and mention another description of ships. I mean such as have sailed by special permission of the President of the United States. I have heard no particular complaint of vessels of this description, and if the business had not been found to be profitable, so much eagerness to obtain these permissions would not have been discovered. So far as we, therefore, from having saved property and shipping to immense amounts by our embargo, that I think it quite problematical whether, had commerce been permitted to take its usual course, the United States would not have been richer at this moment than they are by the course we have adopted; the whole amount of captures to the contrary notwithstanding.

As a measure of coercion, which, as appeared from the declarations of the advocates of the law, was intended to operate principally against Great Britain, I think it must by this time have spent its force, and has completely failed. It appears that we have entirely overrated our importance both to Europe and the West Indies, and that the idea of starving them into a disposition to respect our rights, is wholly visionary. We were to starve the West Indies, raise insurrections among the British manufacturers, and to compel them to grant us peace on our own terms, and also to compel France to rescind her obnoxious decrees. But after a whole year's painful experience—I say painful, on our part—what has it done? Has it starved the poorest negro on the poorest plantation in the West Indies? Has it extorted a single concession from either of the belligerents? If you cannot starve a man to death, or at least bend him to your will in one year, I shall not hesitate to pronounce that man to be ever hereafter proof against starvation. What do the belligerents do? After tendering the offer of repealing the embargo to the British Government, as an equivalent for its rescinding the Orders of Council, what are we told? The sarcastic British Secretary tells us, it is a mere municipal regulation of your own, in which we have no right to interfere, nor have we made any complaint. He tells us "that His Majesty would not hesitate to contribute, in any manner in his power, to restore the commerce of the United States to its wonted activity; and if it was possible to make any sacrifice for the repeal of the embargo, without appearing to deprecate it as a measure of hostility, he would gladly have facilitated its removal as a measure of inconvenient restriction to the American people." Whatever may be our opinion of the pity expressed, all must, I believe, feel the force of the sarcasm.

From France, it is said, we have received no answer to a similar proposal. That we have received no direct or explicit answer to a communication made on that subject to the French Government, by our Minister at Paris, is readily admitted, and that for the best of all possible reasons. I do not find, from any document in the possession of the House, that any such direct application has ever been made. But that we have received such a virtual answer as must carry conviction to every mind so forcible that he who runs may read, is, I think, evident from the general complexion of the correspondence of our Minister at Paris, particularly from his letter of August 28, 1808, printed in our public documents. If from the knowledge he had of the temper of that Court, he either dared not make the application direct, or was fully persuaded that to make it would be not only fruitless but injurious; no further answer was necessary.

Other evidence is also before the nation, which clearly shows the light in which our embargo is viewed by the Emperor Napoleon. Newspaper evidence, it is true; but evidence, the authenticity of which has not, that I know of, been called in question. I allude to the report of one of the Ministers of State, whether of exterior relations, war, marine, or finance, I do not now recollect, in which he compliments our dignified retirement by means of our embargo, in a manner rather warmer, and manifesting greater interest than I would wish to see in the agent of a foreign Government. Had the embargo been a measure which His Imperial Majesty Napoleon wished to have removed, because disagreeable to him, what Minister is there under his control who dare to make such a report? No, it rather appears that he views it as a measure not at all hostile to his views, but as calculated to aid his system of humbling the naval pride, and destroying the commercial superiority of Great Britain. Bring up the non-intercourse to the aid of the embargo, and we more fully meet the wishes of Napoleon, and second, in the only way, perhaps, within our power, his views of universal domination. If the embargo, then, during the space of one whole year, in which it has been in operation, and in which it must have spent its principal force, as it respects foreign nations, has had no coercive effect upon either of the belligerents, what prospect is there that it will have any such effect in future?

But, say gentlemen, this effect has been hitherto defeated by evasions of the law, by which partial supplies have gone out, and by the clamor which has been raised against it by a factious, discontented minority. Only let us persevere with steadiness, and make it manifest to the nations of Europe that we will adhere to our system, and enforce it with such strictness as to prevent evasions in future; and those who have injured us will yet be compelled to abandon the ground they have taken. Foreign nations have, hitherto, flattered themselves that the United States would relax, therefore they have persevered. As soon as they are convinced of their mistake they will recede. Here let us notice the consistency of gentlemen: Onewhile the opposers of the embargo are a very small, a very inconsiderable minority. Nineteen out of twenty at least were, last winter, stated to be in favor of the measure. Strange, that such a small, inconsiderable minority, and those, of course, composed of the most worthless part of the community, should all at once become so powerful and influential as to defeat the effect which the wise measures of Government were calculated to have upon foreign nations. There is the proclamation of the President of the United States, stating that, at an early date, the ordinary proceedings of our courts of justice were insufficient to carry the law into effect. The proceedings in the Legislatures of several States, some in stopping, and others in attempting to stop suits at law for the collection of debts, on account of the pressure occasioned by the embargo. Have we any such evidence as these that the measure bears hard upon foreign nations? No doubt your embargo laws have been evaded to a certain extent. Probably they will continue to be evaded, in spite of all the vigilance of Government. Probably the loudest declaimers in favor of the system have had their full share in these evasions. Perhaps these statutes may be carried into complete effect; but, perhaps, it cannot be done without the prostration of your liberties. It is impossible to impress upon the minds of the people at large that the same degree of moral turpitude is attached to the violation of such laws as your embargo, which they feel at the violating of statutes which, by the common consent of mankind, are at all times and in every change of circumstances, calculated for the well-being of society. In proportion as penalties are multiplied, and increase in severity, public pity towards the sufferer will be excited, and indignation will be roused against the law itself.

Need I remind gentlemen of the majority, of the sedition law? Whenever a crisis arrives in which the good sense of the virtuous part of the community is not sufficient to aid the civil power in the execution of your laws, and it is found necessary to have recourse to the military, I shall tremble for the liberty of my country. I hope that, so long as the law is in force, it will be executed, and will be productive of no convulsion. But, should it be necessary to resort to a military force to execute our laws, in our Republican Government, it would much abate the pleasure and pride which I feel in being a citizen of a free country. Nothing can, in my opinion, have a greater tendency to defeat the effect of your laws upon foreign nations, and impress upon them the belief that we cannot long submit to them, than a knowledge of the means to which it is found necessary to resort in order to carry them into execution. The execution of your laws has already been written in blood, and it is probable that it must soon be stained with a deeper crimson die. This blood will call for vengeance somewhere. From the measure still contemplated to carry them into effect, I turn with horror. Look at the bill on your table, now pending before the Senate; look at the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, proposing ways and means for their more complete execution with the whole apparatus of gunboats, revenue cutters, standing troops, &c. Foreign nations are well acquainted with the nature and genius of our Government, as well as with the attachment of our citizens to personal liberty. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at if they should harbor an opinion, that a system savoring so strongly of despotism could not long be submitted to by a free people.

But while we think it strange that foreign nations should be so unwise as to calculate on our receding, let us reverse the picture, and see upon what kind of evidence it is on which we calculate that the pressure of our embargo will be so great as to compel them to abandon their orders and decrees. A speech made in favor of a petition against the Orders in Council; a pamphlet, written by a popular opposition member of Parliament, deeply concerned in the American commerce and funds; extracts of private letters from several places in Great Britain; paragraphs of news, stating some advance in the price of cotton, or that flour is high in some part of the West India islands, or the account of an insurrection of a score or dozen weavers in Manchester, are caught with avidity and considered as evidences strong as proofs from Holy Writ that Great Britain cannot much longer adhere to her orders, although, perhaps, a fair balance might be struck confronting letter against letter, pamphlet against pamphlet. Does this appear anything like evidence on the subject? But, of late, we are told of the failure of the crop of wheat in Great Britain, and this, it is thought, will work wonders in our favor. On this subject, I allude to no secret communications submitted to Congress. I shall be cautious how I tread on that ground; I allude to news communicated in some of our public prints, and verbal information received from a gentleman of this District, who spent the principal part of the last Summer in Great Britain. Other gentlemen have received letters from correspondents, perhaps equally well informed, of a different complexion. Perhaps both accounts may be correct, so far as they go. It is by no means uncommon for crops to fail partially in some districts in a country, and be abundant in others. But, admitting the report of a failure to be true, in the fullest extent, would the repeal of our embargo grant them such relief that, in order to obtain it, they would be compelled to relinquish what was viewed to be a great national measure? By a statement to which I have had access, and which I believe to be mainly accurate, I find that the greatest exportation of wheat and flour from the United States, amounted, in one year, to within a fraction of one hundred and sixty-eight million pounds of flour. The population of Great Britain and Ireland, including the navy, is estimated at about sixteen and a half millions of souls. Allowing one pound of flour per diem to each person, the whole quantity we could export would afford a supply of bread but for little more than ten days. Considering the necessary waste in that article, this would not be an extravagant allowance. How great a relief from the horrors of famine would a supply of bread for ten or eleven days afford? Twenty or thirty days, at short allowance, would make up the balance. Such are our means of coercion in the article of flour.

I will now go upon the supposition that our embargo is about to be carried into complete effect, and that we can shut ourselves up so close, that no article whatsoever can escape from our ports. Let us inquire whether there would then be a probability that it would have the coercive effect contemplated? I go upon the supposition that firmness in favor of a system is equal on both sides of the water. This comparison will render its coercive effect problematical at least. In our embargo system it is necessary to keep in view two things—its action upon the different belligerents, and its reaction upon ourselves. I think it to be a sound position that the European world, taken in connexion with the West Indies, must be of more consequence to the United States than the United States can be to any one European nation. There is no one nation but what can do better without us and our commerce than we can do without the whole commercial world. Of course the reaction of our embargo upon ourselves must be stronger than its action upon any other nation. Supposing it, then, to act upon any one European nation, say either France or Great Britain, with five degrees of force, and react upon ourselves with twenty degrees, instead of humbling other nations, and bringing them to our feet—if you choose that phrase—we will teach them to do without us, and must, in the end, shrink from the unequal contest. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) has said, not that the existence of the West Indies, (for it appears that, after a year's experience, the idea of absolute starving is pretty much given up,) but the profitable existence of the West Indies, as it respects Europe, depends upon supplies produced from this country, and he has instanced the article of lumber, an article of indispensable necessity to the West India planter. As the West Indies have been in the habit of obtaining supplies from this country, no doubt but a temporary inconvenience is felt; but the bitterness of this, I should suppose, to be in a great measure past. Is there no other country from which these articles for the West India market can be procured? May not the hitherto but partially explored forests of Canada and Nova Scotia afford, at least, a partial supply? Where is the vast Continent of America subject to Spain, many parts of which are so contiguous to the West Indies? Does that country contain no forests affording lumber? As the soil of that country is fertile, and the climate adapted to the raising of a great variety of productions, nothing is wanting to that country but industry and more extended cultivation, to enable it to supplant us entirely in the business of furnishing supplies for the West Indies, and that want the continuation of our embargo will supply with rapidity. But the gentleman says that he would rather burn all the surplus cotton, rice, flour, tobacco, &c., than export it during the present state of things; and that such a measure, by showing we were determined to persevere at every hazard, would soon bring the belligerents to their senses. I admire the spirit of the gentleman, without subscribing to the correctness of the opinion. In some cases it is a good rule for a man to judge another by himself. When that gentleman feels a spirit spurning at coercion glowing in his breast, it will, I should think, lead him to suppose that a similar spirit, spurning indignantly at our coercive system, may glow in the breasts of the inhabitants of that country, which is the land of our forefathers' sepulchres. If, then, a determination to submit to partial and temporary inconveniences rather than be coerced to abandon measures, which either a sound or mistaken policy has led them to adopt, be equally strong in the inhabitants of both countries, and the embargo system reacts upon ourselves with much more force than it acts upon either of the nations we would wish to affect by it, we must be the principal sufferers in this kind of warfare. So far am I from believing that we can coerce either Great Britain or France by our embargo, it is my decided opinion that, if we keep it on until either one or both these nations become our humble petitioners to remove it, we will keep it on forever. Great Britain, in particular, might then calculate on enjoying the commerce of the world unrivalled.

Having examined what consequences may reasonably be expected from our embargo as a measure to coerce foreign nations, it is time now to take a glance at some of its most obvious effects upon ourselves, especially if its duration should be much longer protracted. And here permit me to consider what I view to be its bearing, not merely on our present but our future commerce. At present we see it prostrated, and the danger is that it will be destroyed, past all hope of revival. Another gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. TAYLOR) has represented the embargo to be an act of kindness to our merchants, in preserving them from destruction. Congress has acted toward them the part of a kind, indulgent parent, in preserving them from ruin. I believe that gentleman to be a friend to the mercantile interests of the country. He is incapable of uttering a sentiment of that kind, which he does not feel. But I fear that, in this instance, his tenderness for merchants and commerce will prove too much like the kindness of the ape for her young, who, out of mere tenderness and affection, squeezes them to death. In one point of view, commerce may be compared to a virtuous young lady whose esteem may be acquired and preserved by kindness and attention, but when once her esteem is forfeited and her confidence lost by improper treatment, it can hardly be regained. The American commerce, although very extensive, yet, as to age, is but in its infancy. Handle it a little roughly, and it may be banished forever from our shores; for when once it is directed to other channels, it may be impossible to bring it back to its old course. The history of commerce, since its revival in Europe, is in point. We have seen Florence, Venice, Antwerp, Brussels, and other places in the Netherlands, in their turn, the emporiums of foreign commerce. More lately Holland, and still later Great Britain, have been places where commerce was most flourishing, but we do not find that when once commerce had forsaken or been driven from a place, that it has ever returned.

Were it not that gentlemen appear to have so great an aversion to reckoning by dollars and cents, I would also make an observation or two upon its consequences with respect to our revenue. This has, however, been done some time ago, in a manner, which, to me, appeared unanswerable by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) Indeed, I have heard no sober answer attempted, but abundance of declamation about patriotism, love of country, as superior to all calculations, spirit of 1776, &c. But, would it not be well enough, here, instead of all this unmeaning declamation, to have a little cool matter-of-fact calculation. However the contempt of dollars and cents may be a popular theme for declamation, yet, in a national point, they will be found to be far from so unimportant as they are represented. We are said to be on the eve of a war. I fear this may soon prove to be our real situation. Are we to suppose that patriotism, or the spirit of 1776, so much talked of, of late, will raise, clothe, march, and support an army? Or can the wheels of Government be kept in motion without the aid of dollars and cents? Where shall we get a supply in future, if the embargo is to be continued, and followed up with the proposed non-intercourse? There was something observed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) which I did not hear, and therefore only know, by report, about the extent to which our embargo, by cutting off supplies from the West Indies, would affect the British revenue, which, I understand, he estimated at one third of the whole amount. This, he considered as a pressure she was ill able to support, and would probably oblige her to relax her orders. That it would affect the British revenue to half that amount, remains to be proved. But can the gentlemen tell to what an extent a continued suspension of commerce would affect the revenue of the United States? More than one-third, more than two-thirds, and, I believe, more than four-fifths. But, we have fourteen millions in the Treasury. Very well; a full Treasury is a very good thing. But, how long will that sum carry on a war, and defray the other necessary expenses of Government? We are playing the part of the boy in the fable, who had the hen that laid the golden eggs. We have got golden eggs in our Treasury, but, with some want of foresight, we are strangling the hen that lays them from day to day. Shall we resort to direct taxes? The experiment has been tried, with what success is familiar to the House. But we must be sensible that, if obliged to resort to that expedient, during the continuance of the embargo, it must be under circumstances much more disadvantageous than formerly; for, during the entire suspension of foreign commerce, which is the only channel through which we are furnished with a circulating medium, where is the farmer or planter, who has no market for his surplus produce, to obtain money to pay his taxes? and the very name of loans has of late been so very odious that no man, I conclude, would think of applying to that resource. And even this resource would soon be dried up by a continued embargo, for where will be the funds to support public credit, in order to facilitate the procuring of loans?

Let us next view the consequences of the system as it respects our liberties. In no way are the liberties of a people more endangered than by clothing a Chief Magistrate with new, unusual, or unconstitutional powers. Here I am far from intending any reflection, either upon our present Chief Magistrate, or upon the present Secretary of State, who is I suppose the Chief Magistrate elect. I only observe, that the more popular a Chief Magistrate is, the more dangerous it is to invest him with unusual powers. A precedent naturally grows out of it, and power once delegated, is with difficulty resumed; and that which was at first a temporary benefit becomes at last an incurable evil. Such were the consequences of the Roman Dictatorship. When Cincinnatus was brought from his plow to be invested with the office of Dictator, and returned to his plow again after he performed the requisite service for his country, the Romans experienced no inconvenience. But under a Sylla, a Marius, a Pompey; and a Cæsar, the city, as well as the fairest provinces of the republic, were deluged in blood, shed in civil wars; multitudes of the most distinguished citizens destroyed by proscriptions and massacres, and a set of monsters, under the name of Emperors, successively swayed the sceptre over a degraded and enslaved people. Another instance we have in point of Gustavus Vasa, or Gustavus the First, of Sweden. He was the Washington of Sweden, who, after delivering his country from a most cruel bondage and vassalage to Denmark, was constituted first Administrator, and afterwards King of Sweden, and at length clothed with almost unlimited power. The virtuous Gustavus was the father of his people. The Swedes were happy under his government. But his son, clothed with the same authority, proved an odious tyrant. It will not be a sufficient pledge to assure us that we are out of danger, to say that we are under a government of laws and not of men; for if I am to lose life, liberty, or property unjustly, it makes but little difference to me whether it is by the mandate of a Nero, or the law of a Draco.

But it is said by gentlemen, that if the embargo were now removed, our trade is so restricted by the belligerents that it could amount to little or nothing. We cannot go to France. There is no place to which we can go without being interdicted, either by the decrees of the one, or the orders of the other. This was some time ago particularly insisted upon by the Committee of Foreign Relations. But the observations of a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NEWTON) are more fresh in my recollection. He in a very particular and elaborate manner, took all our commerce, one piece after another, and filtered it all away to nothing, proving that we had no commerce at all left which deserved the name, which we could pursue, even if the embargo were taken off. This is a pitiful and degraded situation; and, because we cannot go everywhere, we submit to the degradation and say we will go nowhere. I shall not attempt to follow the gentleman through his minute and elaborate investigation of the annihilation of our commerce. I shall barely observe that if his view is a just one, it contains one of the most powerful arguments which could be advanced for the repeal of the embargo. If we have no commerce, why keep a law in force to restrain it, which requires so much irritation? Our merchants are generally so eagle-eyed in what respects their own interest, that if they can find no commerce worth pursuing they will embargo themselves. Why not suffer them to manage their own affairs in their own way? Why pass one law after another fortified with such extraordinary provisions, to embargo that which is said to have no existence? There seems to be a manifest absurdity in this kind of legislation. I am far from believing this view of the state of our commerce to be a just one. I believe that we have much profitable commerce left, and commercial men would soon explore important channels. I felt the justice of a remark made some days ago by a gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. JACKSON,) that commerce was like water, which, if left to seek its own course, would find its level, and if left to regulate itself, articles would always find their way to places where they were wanted for consumption. And it is the opinion of commercial men of good information, that, were it not for the existing embargo, although our commerce would not flourish as it had done during the wars in Europe, we might still have as much as during a time of profound peace. May not commerce be compared to water in another respect; that when forced by violence to seek a new channel, it is with difficulty induced back again to its old course? This is an object worthy of the attention of the cotton planter in particular—a staple which is most unquestionably the most valuable to the cultivator of all our American exports. Were cotton produced nowhere but in the United States, we might easily starve the market. But, as it is the natural production both of Asia, Africa, and South America, as well as the West Indies, by withholding these supplies, which lie perishing on our hands, we encourage the cultivation in other countries, and teach the consumers to explore new channels for a supply. In this way a market may be irrecoverably lost.

But in this case we must go to Great Britain or France, and that would be degrading submission; it would be base and dishonorable. I confess I have not at all that nice sense of honor which some gentlemen speak of; nor can I see either degradation or submission in some things which so sensibly injure their feelings. I have often heard it as a maxim, that there is no friendship in trade. So fully am I impressed with its truth, that were your embargo law removed—for I would not violate that—and we not in actual hostility, had I on hand a cargo of rice, cotton, flour, or tobacco, I should have no scruple in selling it either to an Englishman or a Frenchman at a fair and honorable price; I should consider myself as doing him no particular favor, much less as submitting to him at all.

Although none of the resolutions presented for our acceptance by the Committee of Foreign Relations refers, in express terms, to the embargo, yet I considered myself as not materially deviating from the subject before the House, in being thus particular in taking notice of it, because the resolutions, particularly the second, form a part of the same system; and, because, in the dilemma in which we are placed, in the opinion of the committee, this is one of the evils out of which we are necessitated to make a choice—for it seems we have only a choice of evils. War with both nations, submission, or a continuance of the present suspension of commerce; and the second resolution in particular is to come in, in aid of the existing embargo.

A tame submission is justly considered as out of the question—a measure which nobody advocates. War with both nations, or with any two nations animated with sentiments of the most deadly hostility against each other, is a novel kind of warfare, and I am apt to think an absolute new thing under the sun, the discovery of which has been reserved for the Committee of Foreign Relations. A menacing attitude may perhaps be kept up against two nations at war with each other; or, two nations at actual war may make peace, and then unite to give us a drubbing. But while they continue to be at war with each other, let us be ever so fond of fighting, we cannot be at war with both if we try. No, the moment a war takes place with one, we are virtually, if not actually, in alliance with the other. Make war with Great Britain—attempt the reduction of Canada, for instance, and Bonaparte will immediately tender you the homage of his high consideration, and will praise your spirit as warmly as he now eulogizes your dignified retirement. And although, on account of the incivility of the British fleet, he may not be able to send an army to your assistance, yet if one of your ships can fight its way to his shores, she may do it in safety, with the hazard of either sequestration or capture. And on the other hand, grant letters of marque and reprisal against France, and you will find no more trouble from the British Orders of Council.

With respect to the resolutions presented by the Committee of Foreign Relations, I considered that one which has already passed, as of little importance, either one way or the other. Considered as a kind of political test, I felt no very strong objection against taking it, although I considered the question whether the United States were, and of right ought to be, free, sovereign, and independent States, to have been long since decided and not to be brought into question at this time. I find, however, a degree of importance attached to it, in the opinion of some gentlemen, which, had I contemplated at the time, my vote would perhaps have been different. As the second resolution is evidently connected with the embargo, I am of course opposed to it. But notwithstanding the lengthy discussion which has taken place, I am not yet convinced that the first resolution is not at war with the second, and with the whole system we have adopted, and seem still determined to pursue. How is it that the orders of Great Britain and the decrees of France affect us? They affect our maritime rights. Our liberties on the ocean are restricted to a certain extent. And to show to Great Britain, France, and all the world, that we will not submit to these encroachments, we abandon the ocean altogether, and do even more than they require—a new way of showing our spirit, to be sure, but bearing no resemblance to the spirit of '76.

But say gentlemen, we do not submit. The embargo is resistance. Great Britain says you must trade with me. We resist. France says you must trade with me. We resist, and say we will trade with neither of you. This I conceive to be not true in fact. Neither France nor Great Britain says you must trade with me. They only give us liberty to do as we please. But, admitting there was a command, our embargo and non-intercourse is a submission to it, as far as the nature of the case admits. We submit, partly to the one, and partly to the other; and, between both, our submission is complete, for we submit to each of the belligerents, so far as submission to the one is not inconsistent with a similar submission to the other. Certainly our non-intercourse with Britain is submission to France, and our non-intercourse with France is submission to Britain; and that, to make the most of our embargo, it is, according to the view given of it by its advocates, half the one and one half the other.

But what shall be done, is the question? Shall we go to war? I answer yes, in the last resort, if no other mode can be found to extricate us out of our present difficulties, and maintain our independence—and if there is any prospect that the object in pursuit can be obtained by going to war. I am not however convinced that a war with either, much less with both nations, would be the result of an abandonment of our present system. In the year 1793 Great Britain commenced extensive depredations on our commerce. An attempt was made* to resort to a war of commercial restrictions. A non-intercourse act was in considerable forwardness, but without any of these coercive measures actually in force, an attempt was made at negotiation. It proved successful, without the aid of either non-importation, embargo, or hostile proclamations. But to aid it, preparations were made for war, and the energies of the nation were called into operation. A treaty was the consequence, which, although not satisfactory to all in some of its provisions, yet, while it was in force, we have prospered under its operation, in a manner beyond all former example, I understand this treaty might have been renewed, but the offer was declined. I do not say that this backwardness on our part has been any cause of our present difficulties with that nation. In the years 1797 and 1798, France commenced most extensive depredations on our commerce, in direct violation of her treaty with us, and rejected our messengers of peace with contempt. We passed a non-intercourse law, but we did not rest here. We called forth the resources of the nation, and prepared for events. Partial hostilities were commenced; but firmness, on the one hand, and conciliation on the other, were again crowned with success. At the present time a serious misunderstanding has taken place between the United States and two foreign nations. The one has, in a most wanton, shameful, and unprovoked manner, violated her treaty with us—the other, with whom we have no commercial treaty, interrupts our lawful commerce, in such a manner as, it is said, violates the law of nations. We have commenced negotiations, with the aid of commercial coercive restrictions. We have taken the olive branch in one hand, and we have elevated our scourge, such as it is, with the other. We have assumed a menacing attitude, and have uttered many high-sounding words. This mode of negotiation has been, for a considerable time, in the full tide of, I cannot say very, successful experiment. We have had such a fair trial of its efficacy, that I think it is high time it was abandoned. If the measure be a wise one, and in certain cases powerful, the United States have been peculiarly unfortunate, either in the time of its application, or in selecting the subjects on which it was to operate.

DECEMBER, 1808.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

In the year 1805, Great Britain either adopted or revived certain regulations which were very injurious to the commerce of the United States. Our table was loaded with petitions from the commercial cities of the Union. Our Minister abroad remonstrated, and as a remedy for the evil, and to show our resentment of the injury, as well as to aid negotiation, we passed the non-importation law. Before that law was passed, at least before the passage of it was known in Europe, the orders were relaxed, and captures discontinued; and the causes of complaint in some measure removed. So that the non-importation law had no other effect than to embarrass our Ministers in arranging matters in dispute.

Equally unfortunate was the time of sending back the rejected treaty. Whether it was or was not as good a treaty as we had a right to expect, I pretend not to say. Probably it was as good as could be obtained—but whether it was or was not, the time of sending it back was peculiarly unfortunate, for the purpose of obtaining any amelioration. The Ministry under whose auspices it had been negotiated were now no longer in power, and the new Ministry were supposed to be less disposed than their predecessors to make concessions to the United States. Though willing to ratify the original treaty, yet they declined making any alteration. A similar fatality has attended our embargo system, considered as a coercive measure against Great Britain. At the time when our law was passed the pressure upon that nation in Europe was great. The coalition among the Northern Powers was completely dissolved, and she was left to contend single-handed against almost the whole European world. It was thought that this state of things, in connexion with our embargo, would make so great a pressure, that she must yield to what we conceived to be our just demands. Indeed it was predicted, with confidence, that in the course of a few months at furthest she must fall under the power of the conqueror of Europe, and, in this way, we were to obtain relief from all our maritime embarrassments. An event unlooked for, which, however it may affect our contest with the nations of Europe, yet will, I hope, prove most favorable to the cause of humanity, has, in a great measure removed that pressure for the present. By the late opening made in Europe, and the access thereby gained to the American continent, she has probably gained as much as she would lose by the annihilation of her commerce with the United States. It is time that we abandon this inefficient system—inefficient as it respects other nations, and ruinous to ourselves. If we are to have war, as seems to be the opinion of gentlemen, let us prepare for it; but if there is any hope from negotiation, let us attempt it without having recourse to those factitious aids which must ever be embarrassing in negotiating with a high spirited people; and let us not direct the energy of the nation, the boasted spirit of '76, of which we hear so much, to the sole purpose of harassing our own citizens.

Whether we are in that situation that would be now prudent to go to war, I shall not decide, as that is not a question now before the House. A wise man in ancient times has said, with good advice make war. I shall only mention two or three cases in which I would not go to war: I would not go to war without a great and important object, the attainment of which was our undoubted right; I would not go to war for any object, however important it might be, as long as there was a prospect of obtaining it in any other way; I would not go to war, unless there was a well grounded probability of obtaining the object in view by war. Nor would I go to war merely for a point of honor, where everything pertaining to national prosperity and safety might be obtained without. It is true, nations may do like individuals. A man conceives himself to be insulted. He challenges the man who insults him—they meet, and he receives a wound which disables him during the remainder of his life. But he saves his honor. So a nation may go to war for a point of honor, and, as the fate of war is uncertain, may receive a severe drubbing. But national honor is saved. Like the gallant Francis, King of France, who when he was defeated and taken prisoner in the fatal battle of Pavia, by his enemy and rival, Charles the Fifth, when he saw that all was lost, wrote, upon the field of battle, this laconic epistle to the Queen Regent: "Madam, we have lost all but our honor." The American people, would, I trust, wish to avoid such a war as this. And I think they will not long assert their rights, only by abandoning them. But although deeply interested in peace, as being the true interest of our country, and always ready to welcome the returning prospect of its continuance with heartfelt satisfaction, yet, if after all endeavors to preserve it shall prove fruitless, they should in the end be compelled to engage in a just and necessary war, no doubt the American people would meet it with firmness.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to adjourn, alleging as a reason for the motion the situation in which the House found itself, many members being absent.

The question on adjournment was taken by yeas and nays, and negatived—yeas 42, nays 68, as follows:

A division of the question on the resolution depending before the House was then called for by Mr. DAVID R. WILLIAMS:—Whereupon, so much of the said resolution being read, as is contained in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That it is expedient to prohibit, by law, the admission into the ports of the United States of all public or private armed or unarmed ships or vessels belonging to Great Britain or France, or to any other of the belligerent Powers having in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States;

A motion was made by Mr. VAN HORN to amend the original resolution as reported from the Committee of the Whole House, by striking out, after the words "goods, wares, or merchandise," the following words: "the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions of any of the said Powers;" and by adding, to the end of the said resolution, the following words:

"And that the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several supplementary acts thereto, be repealed, so far as to allow the ships and vessels belonging to, and wholly navigated by, citizens of the United States, to depart with their cargoes for places not in the possession of any of the said belligerent Powers; and that the citizens of the United States be authorized to arm and equip their merchant vessels, and repel by force any assault or hostility which shall be made or committed by any vessel belonging to any of the said Powers, and may subdue and capture the same; and may retake any vessel, owned as aforesaid, which may have been captured by any vessel belonging to any of the said Powers."

A question of order was then moved by Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS, whether the said motion of Mr. VAN HORN, as a substitute for a member of the said original resolution, was admissible according to the standing rules and orders of the House.

The SPEAKER decided, as his opinion, that the said proposed amendment was in order, as not being a substitute for the member of the original resolution proposed to be stricken out:

Whereupon, the question was taken that the House do agree to the proposed amendment for striking out the words as before recited, and passed in the negative.

The question then recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. VAN HORN: when a motion was made by Mr. UPHAM that the House do now adjourn; and the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 45, nays 69, as follows:

YEAS—Evan Alexander, William W. Bibb, John Campbell, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, John Culpeper, John Davenport, jun., Daniel M. Smith, Henry Southard, Clement Storer, John Taylor, James I. Van Alen, Jesse Wharton, Robert Whitehill, Isaac Wilbour, Alexander Wilson, and Richard Winn.

A division of the question was then called for on the amendment proposed by Mr. VAN HORN, from the commencement thereof, and ending at the word "repealed," in the third line of the said amendment: And the question to agree to the said division of the proposed amendment being stated from the Chair, Mr. VAN HORN withdrew the said amendment from the Clerk's table.

A motion was then made by Mr. LEWIS that the House do now adjourn, and the question being taken thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 48, nays 69, as follows:

A motion was made, by Mr. LEWIS, to amend the original resolution depending before the House, by adding to the end thereof the following words:

"And, also, that the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, with all acts supplementary thereto, be repealed."

A question of order was moved by Mr. MACON, whether an amendment containing the substance of a proposed resolution referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order for a certain day, can be received as an amendment to the resolution under consideration, embracing a distinct subject. Whereupon Mr. SPEAKER decided, as his opinion, that the proposed amendment could not be received, unless the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the consideration of a resolution moved by Mr. CHITTENDEN on the tenth ultimo, and several subsequent resolutions proposed, and referred to the same Committee of the Whole House.

From which decision of the Chair, an appeal was made by Mr. STANFORD; and, on the question, "Is the said decision of the Chair correct?" it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 86; nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jr., Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, Joseph Barker, William W. Bibb, William Blackledge, John Blake, jr., Thomas Blount, Adam Boyd, John Boyle, Robert Brown, William A. Sturges, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Jabez Upham, Archibald Van Horn, and Killian K. Van Rensselaer.

A motion was then made, by Mr. LEWIS, to amend the original resolution under consideration, by adding to the end thereof the following words:

"Add, also, that the act approved on the twelfth of March, one thousand eight hundred and eight, entitled 'An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States,' be repealed on the first day of January next."

A question of order was moved by Mr. SMILIE, whether, according to the standing rules and orders, the said proposed amendment could be received and acted upon by the House. Whereupon, Mr. SPEAKER decided, as his opinion, that it was not in order, as it partially embraced the substance of a proposed resolution already referred to a Committee of the whole House, and not considered or reported on by the said Committee to the House.

From which decision of the Chair, an appeal was made to the House by Mr. LEWIS; and, on the question, "Is the said decision of the Chair correct?" it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jr., Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, Joseph Barker, William W. Sturges, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Jabez Upham, Archibald Van Horn, and Killian K. Van Rensselaer.

The question then recurring on the first member of the original resolution, as proposed to be divided on a motion of Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS, and hereinbefore recited, a division of the question on the first said member of the resolution was called for by Mr. GARDENIER, from the commencement of the same to the words "Great Britain," as contained in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That it is expedient to prohibit, by law, the admission into the ports of the United States of all public or private armed or unarmed ships or vessels belonging to Great Britain."

Mr. GARDENIER spoke half an hour in explanation of his reasons for taking the question separately as to Great Britain and France.

The question being taken that the House do agree to the same, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 29, as follows:

A farther division of the question was moved by Mr. ELLIOT, on the said first member of the resolution, on the words "or France," immediately following the words "Great Britain," hereinbefore recited: And the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 24, as follows:

And on the question that the House do concur with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the third resolution, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That measures ought to be immediately taken for placing the country in a more complete state of defence:

It was unanimously resolved in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. GEORGE W. CAMPBELL,

Ordered, That the second resolution be referred to the committee appointed on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session, as respects our relations with foreign Powers, with leave to report thereon by way of bill, or bills.

On motion of Mr. GEORGE W. CAMPBELL,

Ordered, That the third resolution be referred to the committee appointed, on the 8th ultimo, on so much of the said Message from the President of the United States as relates to the Military and Naval Establishments, with leave to report thereon by bill, or bills.

MONDAY, December 19.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Augustin Serry; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN,

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary to be made in the laws relative to placing on the pension list those persons who have been wounded in the line of their duty, in the service of the United States, since the Revolutionary war; and to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for arming, manning, and fitting out for immediate service, all the public ships of war, vessels, and gunboats, of the United States," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to whom was referred, on the 10th instant, a bill authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of Navy officers, seamen, and marines.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the payment of certain pensions by the Secretary of War, at the seat of Government. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the judicial system of the United States. [The bill goes to authorize the circuit judge to hold district courts, where, from sickness or other cause, the district judge is unable to discharge his duties, and makes the justice of the Supreme Court the judge of competency in the district judge.]

Mr. LIVERMORE said such a provision appeared necessary, but he thought there was something wrong in vesting the power of determining on the competency of the district judge in this way. He, therefore, moved that the Committee rise, with a view, if it prevailed, to move for a recommitment of the bill.

This course was objected to by Messrs. D. R. WILLIAMS, TAYLOR, and MARION, and supported by Messrs. ELY, GHOLSON, and the mover. The Committee rose, were refused leave to sit again, and the bill was referred to a select committee.

Mr. DANA presented a letter from the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel, accompanying a donation of their works, which was read.

MIRANDA'S EXPEDITION.

Mr. LOVE called for the order of the day on the report of the committee on the subject of the thirty-six persons confined in Carthagena, South America. The following is the resolution reported by the committee:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to adopt the most immediate and efficacious means in his power to obtain from the Viceroy of Grenada, in South America, or other proper authority, the liberation of thirty-six American citizens, condemned on a charge of piracy, and now held in slavery in the vaults of St. Clara, in Carthagena, and that the sum of ——— dollars be appropriated to that purpose.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS moved to postpone the consideration of the subject indefinitely. Negatively—50 to 36.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the subject—39 to 33.

Mr. LOVE moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words in italics, and inserting "authorized to request."—Carried, ayes 54.

Those gentlemen who supported this resolution in the debate were Messrs. LOVE, LYON, BACON, NELSON, SLOAN, and WILBOUR. Those who opposed it were Messrs. D. R. WILLIAMS, TAYLOR, SMILIE, MACON, and SOUTHARD.

The gentlemen who opposed the resolution, among other objections, contended that an agreement to the resolution would but involve the Government in difficulty without answering any good purpose; that it would in fact be aiding the attempt of a certain party to prove that the General Government had some connexion with this expedition originally, which it certainly had not; that the facts set forth in the petition were wholly unsupported by evidence; that these persons had engaged themselves in a foreign service; that they had become weary of the privileges of freemen, and had entered into a hostile expedition against a foreign country, and, in so doing, had been taken, condemned for piracy, and immured as a punishment for that offence; that the British Government, having been at the bottom of this business, was the proper power to release these persons, and indeed had applied to the Spanish commander for the purpose; that even were the United States bound by the laws of justice or humanity to intercede for these persons, they knew not to whom to make application, and would probably meet with a refusal, perhaps a rude one, if any judgment could be formed from the present situation of our affairs with Spain; that if gentlemen wished for objects on which to exercise their humanity, they might find them in the lacerated backs of our impressed seamen, without extending it to criminals. In reply to an observation of Mr. LYON, that if we did not get these men Great Britain would do so, and employ them to extend her naval force, Mr. MAOON replied, if she did, she was welcome to keep them; but she was in the habit of supplying her navy with seamen from our vessels, without the trouble which the acquisition of these men might occasion her.

In reply to these objections, and in support of the resolution, the humanity of the House was strongly appealed to. It was urged that the Government could in no wise be involved by an appeal to the generosity of the provincial government; that these men had not wilfully committed piracy, but had been deluded under various pretences to join the expedition; that they had joined it under a belief that they were entering into the service of the United States; that, even admitting them to have been indiscreetly led to join the enterprise, knowing it to be destined for a foreign service, yet, that they had been sufficiently punished by the penalty they had already undergone; that it was wholly immaterial what inference any persons might draw from the conduct of the United States in this respect, as to their concern with the original expedition; that such considerations should have no weight with the House; that if these poor fellows were guilty, they had repented of it; and Mr. NELSON quoted on this point the Scriptures, to show that there should be more joy over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine who have no need of repentance. In reply to an intimation that it was not even ascertained that they were American citizens, Mr. BACON observed that one of them had been born in the same town in which he was, and was of a reputable family.

The resolution was negatived by the Committee—49 to 31.

The Committee rose and reported the resolution, which report the House agreed now to consider—ayes 57.

Mr. LYON moved to adjourn—ayes 34.

Mr. FISK called for the yeas and nays on concurrence with the Committee.

Mr. GARDNER moved to adjourn—ayes 34.

The question of concurrence with the Committee in their disagreement to the resolution, was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jr., David Bard, Joseph Barker, Burwell Bassett, William Blackledge, Thomas Blount, Adam Boyd, Robert Brown, William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, Matthew Clay, Joseph Desha, John W. Eppes, William Findley, Thomas Gholson, jr., Peterson Goodwyn, John Heister, William Helms, James Holland, David Holmes, Bon-

Mumford, Timothy Pitkin, jr., Samuel Riker, John Russell, Benjamin Say, James Sloan, Lewis B. Sturges, Abram Trigg, Jabez Upham, James I. Van Alen, Archibald Van Horn, and Isaac Wilbour—34.

On motion, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 20.

A new member, to wit: JOSEPH STORY, returned to serve in this House, as a member for the State of Massachusetts, in the room of Jacob Crowninshield, deceased, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

An engrossed bill authorizing the payment of certain pensions by the Secretary of War, at the seat of Government, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the committee appointed on the thirteenth instant, presented a bill prescribing the effect of records of judgment or decrees of courts of one State in another State; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee appointed on the twenty-eighth ultimo, presented a bill for the relief of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the late and of the present Army of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of certain persons therein mentioned. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for continuing for a further time the authority of the Commissioners of Kaskaskia. The bill being gone through, the Committee rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

The bill authorizing the division and subdivision of squares and lots in the City of Washington; and the bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Knox county, Kentucky, having gone through the Committee of the Whole, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. DANA said, as it was probable that the situation of the revenue might require the consideration of the House during this session, it would be acceptable to the members of the House to have as ample information on the subject as could be conveniently obtained. From this and other considerations, he was induced to offer the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House a general statement of the sums annually received at the Treasury of the United States since the commencement of the proceedings under the Constitution, exhibiting distinctly the proceeds of the customs, internal revenue, loans, and miscellaneous receipts for each year, with the amount of the respective branches of the customs, and the charges thereon.”

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER, after a few prefatory remarks, offered the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the select committee to whom was referred a bill from the Senate ‘further to amend the judicial system of the United States,’ be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending jurisdiction to the superior courts of the several Territories of the United States in which a district court has not been established, for the trial of treason, and other offences committed against the laws of the United States within the limits of the said Territories, and to empower said courts to pronounce such judgment or sentence on conviction of the offender or offenders, as the law directs.”

The resolution was agreed to.

THE EMBARGO.

A motion was made by Mr. CHITTENDEN that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on a resolution proposed by him, the tenth ultimo, for a repeal of the several acts laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States; and the question being taken thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 49, nays 64, as follows:

POST ROADS.

Mr. STANFORD moved the following resolution, observing that he thought it important at this particular juncture in our affairs, that some provision should be made to establish a communication by mail between the seat of the General and State Governments, as direct, certain, and expeditious as possible. This not being the case at present, his object was to instruct the proper committee to make the necessary inquiry:

“Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail stage from Fayetteville, in North Carolina, to Cheraw court-house, Camden, Columbia, Augusta, and Milledgeville, in Georgia, and that they report by bill or otherwise.”

The resolution was agreed to.

REVENUE BONDS.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate supplemental to an act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds in certain cases.

This bill provides that the payment of all bonds given subsequent to the date of the act, to which this is a supplement, for duties on coffee, sugar, &c., imported into the United States, and for duties on other importations of the same articles, shall be suspended during the continuance of the embargo.

Mr. NEWTON proposed an amendment to the bill excepting from its scope those articles imported by permission, (conformably to the supplementary embargo law,) in payment for debts due from foreign countries.—Agreed to.

Mr. NEWTON proposed a new section to the bill for refunding such of the above duties as have already been paid into the Treasury, subject to repayment, however, on the same conditions as other duties of the same description.

Some desultory discussion took place on this amendment; and a motion was made that the Committee rise to give time for further consideration of the subject, and carried; and the bill was recommitted to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

NAVIGATION LAWS.

Mr. DANA observed that he had a few days ago submitted a resolution for authorizing the owners of merchant vessels permitted to arm to associate for common defence; which had been referred to the Committee of the Whole, to whom was referred the motion to repeal the embargo. Mr. D. observed that vessels engaged in certain trades, as in the East India trade, were already permitted to arm. He wished that a general law should be passed authorizing the owners of such vessels to associate for common defence, to keep off pirates in time of peace, or belligerent assault in time of war. It was a resolution wholly unconnected with the repeal of the embargo; he therefore moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution.—Agreed to, and referred to Messrs. DANA, QUINCY, McCREERY, MUMFORD, and SAY.

On motion, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 21.

Mr. THOMAS presented to the House certain proceedings of the grand jury of the county of Randolph, in the Indiana Territory, at a circuit court held in and for the said county, in the month of November last, stating the hardships and inconveniences to which the persons composing the said grand jury, and other inhabitants of the county aforesaid, have been and are now subjected, in consequence of their connexion with the people situated in that part of the Territory eastward of the river Wabash, and praying such relief in the premises as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.—Referred to the committee appointed, the thirteenth instant, to inquire into the expediency of dividing the Indiana Territory.

On motion of Mr. BARKER,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire whether any alteration or amendment of an act passed last session of Congress, entitled "An act for erecting a light-house on the south side of the island Sapelo, and for placing buoys and beacons in several places," be necessary, in order that said act may comport with the several petitions, on which said act was grounded, and report such an amendatory bill as may be necessary.

Mr. STORY presented several petitions on different subjects. Amongst them was one from the inhabitants of Marblehead, praying further bounty on their fish. In introducing this petition, Mr. S. read a letter from the petitioners to him enclosing the petition. He moved the reference of the petition to the Committee of Ways and Means.—Agreed to.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS expressed his satisfaction at the letter just read; and observed that he was rejoiced to hear that their fish was not all spoiled with keeping, as had been so often predicted and asserted.

An engrossed bill to revive and continue the authority of the Commissioners of Kaskaskia, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill authorizing the proprietors of squares and lots in the City of Washington to have the same subdivided, and admitted to record, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of certain persons therein mentioned was read the third time.

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act for the relief of William White, and others."

CAPTAIN PIKE'S EXPEDITION.

On motion of Mr. J. MONTGOMERY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making compensation to Z. M. Pike and his companions.

[The first section of this bill grants to Captain Pike and his companions a certain quantity of land. The second section allows them double pay during the time they were engaged in exploring the Western country.]

Mr. STANFORD moved to strike out the first section of the bill; which was negatived—53 to 38.

The second section was stricken out—42 to 35.

A considerable debate took place on this bill, in which Messrs. MONTGOMERY, LYON, and ALEXANDER, supported the bill; and Messrs. MACON, DURELL, STANFORD, and TALLMADGE, opposed it.

The bill being gone through, was reported to the House.

THURSDAY, December 22.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to enforce and make more effectual an act, entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States,' and the several acts supplementary thereto;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill authorizing a lottery to raise a sum of money for the purpose of finishing a church in the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, for the use of the Episcopal Congregation in the said city; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next—48 to 35.

FOREIGN LICENSES.

Mr. NEWTON reported a bill "to deprive, in certain cases, vessels of their American character, and to prevent, under certain disabilities, any citizen of the United States taking a license from any foreign Power to navigate the ocean, or to trade with any other foreign and independent Power."

[The first section of this bill provides that every ship or vessel which sailed for a foreign port or place on or before the — day of — 180 , shall, in case such ship or vessel shall not return to some port or place on or before the — day of — 1809, forfeit and lose all the benefits and privileges appertaining to a ship or vessel of the United States, &c.; provided, such vessel be not detained by capture or by an embargo, and when so detained shall return so soon as released.

The second section provides, that if any citizen of the United States shall solicit, take, accept, or use, or suffer any person acting under his or her authority to solicit, take, accept, or use a license or permission procured from any foreign Power whatsoever for his or her vessel to pass to, or trade with, any foreign and independent Power, such person shall be considered as having committed a high offence; for the commission of which he or she shall forfeit the right and privilege of owning or navigating ever afterwards any vessel pursuant to the laws of the United States. This section to commence and be in operation from and after the — day of — 1809.]

The bill was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARDNER, after a few prefatory observations, in which he stated his wish to obtain a direct decision on the question of the embargo, and his anxiety and that of his constituents, that it should be repealed, and that the parting word from his neighbors was, "for God's sake take off the embargo before you return," proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the acts laying an embargo on all the ships and vessels within the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, be repealed on the first of February next.

The SPEAKER declared this motion to be out of order, as a similar motion was already before a Committee of the Whole.

ENFORCING THE EMBARGO.

A bill from the Senate for enforcing and making effectual the embargo laws, was read the first time.

It was then read the second time—ayes 79—and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

On the question, for what day it should be the order, Monday, the most distant day, was negatived—55 to 47.

To-morrow and Saturday were then named. [The question must, by the rules of the House, be taken on the most distant day.]

Mr. QUINCY called for the yeas and nays on the question whether it should be postponed till Saturday.

On this motion a short but warm discussion arose, in which Messrs. SMILIE, EPPES, and BACON, opposed the postponement, as it would serve no purpose but to delay enforcing the measure; and Messrs. GARDENIER, ELLIOT, QUINCY, LIVERMORE, SLOAN, LYON, MACON, and DANA, supported the postponement till Saturday, in order to give time for full consideration and examination of the bill. Messrs. GARDENIER, ELLIOT, QUINCY, LIVERMORE, LYON, and SLOAN, denounced the principles of the bill itself.

It was made the order of the day for Saturday in preference to Monday—61 to 58, as follows:

YEAS—Evan Alexander, Jos. Barker, John Blake, jr., John Campbell, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, John Culpeper, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, jr., Daniel M. Durell, James Elliot, William Ely, Barent Gardener, Francis Gardner, James M. Garnett, Edwin Gray, Isaiah L. SEAMEN AND MARINES.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the President of the United States to employ an additional number of seamen and marines. To the same Committee was referred the bill from the Senate to fit out all the frigates, &c.

Mr. NELSON stated that the President had already authority to fit out the vessels of the United States, but was authorized to employ but 1,425 seamen. It was now proposed to fit out 171 gunboats and ten small vessels of war, for which purpose 2,000 seamen and marines and proportionate midshipmen and corporals were wanted.

Mr. STORY moved that the present bill lie on the table in order to take up the bill from the Senate; which was negatived—53 to 38.

Mr. NEWTON moved to insert 4,440 seamen, wishing at this time to strengthen the Executive arm, to give authority to employ all our vessels; which was negatived—yeas 36.

It was agreed to insert 2,000—yeas 71.

The principle of the bill was supported by Messrs. VARNUM, NEWTON, NELSON, and STORY, and opposed by Messrs. MACON, HOLLAND, and D. R. WILLIAMS.

It was urged on the one hand that the nation should be placed in a complete state of defence, and all the active force of the nation be called into action; and on the other, in addition to the general arguments against a naval force, that the present embargo and non-intercourse system was at variance with a system of active preparation; that if one be adopted, the other is unnecessary.

Domestic Salt—Seamen and Marines.

H. OF R.

The blank for the appropriation was filled with $1,649,895 98.

The Committee rose and reported the bill, and obtained leave to sit again on the bill from the Senate—yeas 61.

FRIDAY, December 23.

An engrossed bill authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill authorizing the issuing of debentures in certain cases; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

DOMESTIC SALT.

Mr. BURWELL offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to inquire into the extent to which the article of salt is or can be supplied from the salt establishments within the United States; and that effectual means be immediately taken to procure a supply equal to our consumption.

Mr. B. observed that it would be perceived by the House that the object which he had in view was to inquire into the capacity of the United States to produce an article of our consumption so essential that it could not be dispensed with. He believed it to be a fact that in some parts of the United States salt existed to a great extent; that in the Western country there were salt springs which produced better salt than that imported. In the State of New York, particularly, he had been informed that salt was sold at those salines at one dollar per. bbl. of five bushels. The reason why so much had been heretofore imported was, that vessels going to Liverpool with our heavy produce, brought back salt as ballast. He did not believe that the scarcity of this article, spoken of by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LIVERMORE,) the other day, did exist. The quantity in the country was found by the speculators far to exceed that spoken of; and the ascertaining this fact had arrested their operations—salt having fallen in Baltimore to 80 or 85 cents a bushel.

The resolution was adopted, and it was ordered that the committee to be appointed do consist of seven members.

A motion was made by Mr. GARDENIER, that the House do reconsider their vote, directing that the committee appointed, pursuant to the foregoing resolution, shall consist of seven members; and the question being taken thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

A motion was then made by Mr. GARDENIER, that the committee on the said resolution do consist of seventeen members: and the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative. And Mr. BURWELL, Mr. KIRKPATRICK, Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. BLACKLEDGE, Mr. JACOB RICHARDS, Mr. MOSELY, Mr. LAMBERT, Mr. NICHOLAS R. MOORE, Mr. STORER, Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, Mr. TROUP, Mr. LEMUEL J. ALSTON, Mr. How-ARD, Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. WHARTON, Mr. WILBOUR, and Mr. SHAW, were appointed a committee, pursuant thereto.

A motion was made by Mr. GARDNER, that the resolution proposed by Mr. LIVERMORE, on the seventeenth instant, for the purpose of granting permission to certain vessels to "clear out and depart from the ports and harbors of the United States for the purpose of importing salt," be referred to the committee last appointed: and the question being taken thereupon, it passed in the negative.

The said proposed resolution was then again read at the Clerk's table, and agreed to by the House, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing certain vessels to clear out and depart from the ports and harbors of the United States, for the purpose of importing salt; and that they report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

SEAMEN AND MARINES.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported on the twenty-second instant, from the Committee of the Whole, to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of Navy officers, seamen, and marines," which lay on the table: Whereupon, the second amendment, to fill up the blank in the eighth line of the bill with the words, "thousand," was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House—yeas 77, nays 29, as follows:

Story, Lewis B. Sturges, Benjamin Tallmadge, Abram Trigg, Jabez Upham, Archibald Van Horn, and David R. Williams.

The other amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole being twice read, were, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

A new section to the bill was offered by Mr. STORY, authorizing the President to hire sundry vessels to enforce the embargo and revenue laws, and appropriating money for the purpose.

The SPEAKER said it could not be in order, as all bills having appropriations of money must previously be discussed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STORY withdrew the amendment, observing that on reflection, his object could be met by the bill on the subject from the Senate.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS made a few observations in opposition to the bill; stating that the idea of naval defence was ridiculous and futile. If gentlemen were for war, he would go with them with all his soul at the proper time; but did not like these half measures. If the House went on in this extravagant manner it would lead the country to ruin. Loans would have to be resorted to, and they would then be able to continue the embargo, which, if persisted in sternly, he believed would obtain for us better terms than could be had after the most triumphant war that gentlemen could imagine.

The yeas and nays were taken on engrossing the bill for a third reading, and carried—yeas 93, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Evan Alexander, Lemuel J. Alston, junior, Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, Joseph Barker, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, William Blackledge, John Blake, jun., Thomas Blount, Adam Boyd, John Boyle, Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, George W. Campbell, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, Josiah Deane, Joseph Desha, Daniel M. Durell, James Elliot, John W. Eppes, William Findley, Jas. Fisk, Meshack Franklin, Barent Gardenier, Thomas Gholson, jr., Peterson Goodwyn, Edwin Gray, Isaiah L. Green, John Harris, John Heister, William Helms, David Holmes, Benjamin Howard, Reuben Humphreys, Daniel Hsley, John G. Jackson, Robert Jenkins, Richard M. Verplanck, Jesse Wharton, Robert Whitehill, Isaac Wilbour, Alexander Wilson, Nathan Wilson, and Richard Winn.

Samuel Smith, Richard Stanford, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Jabez Upham, and David R. Williams.

DANIEL COTTON.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Daniel Cotton.

[This is a case in which the petitioner's vessel was chartered by the United States to go to Tunis. Whilst there, she was compelled to go on a voyage by the Bey, (under the authority of the existing treaty with the United States, which permits the Bey to use any merchant vessel of the United States paying therefor a reasonable compensation,) who paid a certain sum for the charter, but not the amount which the service was worth. The petitioner claims the balance from the United States, as he undertook the voyage without a knowledge of, or previous to, the existence of the treaty, and was compelled under that treaty to proceed on a voyage for the Bey, at a loss to himself.]

The report was, after considerable discussion, agreed to, 63 to 30. The Committee reported their agreement to the House, who concurred in it, and the resolution was referred to the Committee of Claims, with instructions to bring in a bill.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

According to the request of the House of Representatives, in their resolution of November eleventh, that copies should be laid before them of all acts, decrees, orders, and proclamations, affecting the commercial rights of neutral nations, issued or enacted by Great Britain and France, or any other belligerent Power, since the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, and also of an act placing the commerce of America in English ports, upon the footing of the most favored nation, I now transmit them a report of the Secretary of State, of such of them as have been attainable in the Department of State, and are supposed to have entered into the views of the House of Representatives.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 23, 1808.

The Message, together with the report of the Secretary of State which accompanied the same, were read; the reading of the remainder of the documents accompanying the said Message was called for by Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, and objection being made thereto by Mr. NEWTON, the question was taken, "Shall the residue of the said documents be now read?" and passed in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. ALEXANDER, that the said Message and documents do lie on the table; and the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative.

Ordered, That five thousand copies of the same be printed for the use of the members of this House.

On motion, the House adjourned.

DECEMBER, 1808.

The Embargo—Additional Military Force.

H. OF R.

MONDAY, December 26.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Daniel Cotton; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS, from the committee appointed, on the fifteenth instant, "to inquire into the expediency of extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory," presented a bill extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the estimates of appropriations for the service of the year 1809; also, a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the United States, for the year ending the 30th of September, 1808; which were read and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BARKER presented a representation of sundry inhabitants of Hanover, in the county of Plymouth, and State of Massachusetts, stating that the late appointment of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, by the Legislature of that State, is irregular and unconstitutional, in consequence of the failure of the said Legislature to lay the same before the Governor of the State for his approbation, as the law thereof directs; and praying that the Congress of the United States, when the Electoral votes are opened and counted, will take the subject into their consideration, and prevent the establishment of so dangerous a precedent.—Ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. WHARTON,

Ordered, That the several memorials of the officers of the late Revolutionary army, presented to this House the first, seventh, and twelfth inst., be referred to Messrs. WHARTON, SEEVER, HELMS, J. MORROW, JOHN CAMPBELL, STANFORD, THOMAS MOORE, HEISTER, and WINN.

Mr. STORY offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to consider whether any, and, if any, what amendments are necessary to the act, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," with liberty to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STANFORD inquiring as to the precise object of this resolution,

Mr. STORY replied, that his object was merely to define certain crimes now loosely defined, and to provide a punishment for some crimes now committed with impunity.

The resolution was adopted—ayes 65.

Messrs. STORY, DANA, NELSON, TROUP, and J. G. JACKSON, form the committee.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill to continue in force, for a further time, the first section of an act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

ENFORCING THE EMBARGO.

The order of the day on the bill for enforcing and making more effectual the act laying the embargo, and the several acts supplementary thereto, being called for—

Mr. NEWTON observed that he wished to expedite the passage of the bill, and, as amendments were contemplated to it, he moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the bill, and that it be referred to a select committee.

After a short discussion, the motion was negatived—ayes 34.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill.

Mr. ELLIOT moved to strike out the first section, and spoke at length in support of the motion, when the Committee rose without having come to any decision—ayes 53.

Mr. FISK wished leave to sit again to be refused, in order to refer the bill to a select committee. But the Committee obtained leave to sit again—32 to 42.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

Mr. NELSON from the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the Military and Naval Establishments, and to whom was referred on the 17th inst. a resolution for placing the country in a more complete state of defence, submitted the following resolution, in part:

Resolved, That it is expedient immediately to raise, arm, and equip fifty thousand volunteers, to serve for the term of two years.

The following is annexed to the report:

"Will it not be advisable to propose raising fifty thousand volunteers, to be engaged for two years, and to serve, if required for actual service, any proportion of the term, not exceeding twelve months, within the term for which they shall be engaged? each non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, to receive ten dollars bounty, and each commissioned officer to receive one month's pay when appointed; and the whole to receive pay and rations when attending musters, as well as when in actual service; the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, to be armed and equipped by the public, and to receive a uniform coat, vest, one pair of pantaloons, hat, two shirts, one pair of shoes, and a blanket; and if called into actual service for any term over three months, to receive other articles of clothing in proportion to the term of service, not exceeding in the whole (including those first received) what are allowed to the soldiers in the regular army for one year. The whole to be mustered and exercised in companies four days within the two first months after being engaged, and six days in each succeeding year, and to meet and encamp in their respective States and Territories, thirty days in each year; no man to be enlisted into any company, whose place of residence shall not be within a reasonable distance from the company parade to which he shall belong.

"A suitable number of Inspectors to be appointed by the President of the United States, to direct and inspect the exercise of the troops when encamped, and to give directions for the drilling and exercise of the companies, and to direct and receive all returns, muster and pay rolls, to be transmitted to an Adjutant and Inspector General (to be appointed by the President of

NON-INTERCOURSE.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on our Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the resolution lately passed by this House on the subject, reported a bill to interdict commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies, and for other purposes.—Twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

[The following are the prominent features of the non-intercourse bill:

Exclusion from the harbors and waters of the United States and Territories thereof, of all public ships and vessels belonging to Great Britain or France, or to any other belligerent Power or Powers having in force orders, decrees, edicts, or laws, violating the lawful commerce or neutral rights of the United States, excepting vessels forced in by stress of weather, pursuit of an enemy, such as are charged with despatches, or business from their Governments, or packets having no cargo nor merchandise on board. The President is authorized to expel by force all such vessels as contravene this regulation. A penalty not exceeding ten thousand dollars, nor less than one hundred dollars, and imprisonment for not less than one month, and not more than one year, upon all persons affording assistance to vessels entering contrary to the law, excepting in case of piloting them out of the jurisdiction of the United States. Authority to seize and condemn, after a certain day, all vessels and their cargoes, bearing the French or English flag, or owned in whole or in part by any citizen or subject of either, which may enter the ports, &c., of the United States, &c., excepting only vessels expressly hired to convey despatches, such as put in through distress, or are chased in by an enemy. Prohibits, after a certain day, the importation of any goods or merchandise, the produce or manufacture of Great Britain or France, or their dependencies, either directly or indirectly, from any country whatever. The forfeiture and payment of treble value by the owners of any goods so prohibited, attempted to be introduced into the United States on board of any ship, vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, which shall receive prohibited goods on board, knowing them to be such, and the owner and master mulcted in treble the value of the articles. Provision that, if Great Britain or France revoke or modify their orders or decrees so as to render our commerce sufficiently safe, in the opinion of the President of the United States, of which revocation or modification, he shall give public notice by proclamation, the operation of this act and of the embargo acts, shall, so far as relates to the nations in amity with her, and having no orders, decrees, or edicts in force, violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States, forthwith cease and determine; without, however, any remission of previous fines and forfeitures. Vessels bound to any foreign port or place with which intercourse shall have been thus restored, are to give bond and approved security, in six times the value of such vessel and cargo, not to proceed to any foreign port, nor trade with any country other than those with which commercial intercourse shall have been thus permitted. The President vested with power to extend the provisions of the bill to any nations having in force edicts, &c., such as those of Great Britain and France; and all the penalties, &c., of the bill, made applicable to them.]

Payment of Witnesses.

H. OF R.

TUESDAY, December 27.

Mr. DANA, from the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-third ultimo, the petition of Edward Beaumont, presented a bill for the relief of Edward Beaumont; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual statement of the district tonnage of the United States, on the 31st of December, 1807; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House another letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the United States, nominally, during one year prior to the first of October, 1808, but in fact, during the three last months of the year 1807; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 26, 1808.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a statement of goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the United States nominally during the year prior to the first day of October, 1808; but, in fact, during the three last months of the year 1807, subsequent exportations having been prevented by the embargo.

The goods, wares, and merchandise of domestic growth or manufacture, included in the statements, are estimated at	$9,433,546
And those of foreign growth and manufacture at	12,997,414

Amounting together to	22,430,960
-----------------------	------------

The articles of foreign growth or manufacture may be arranged under the following heads, viz:

Produce of the sea	$823,000
“ “ forest	1,930,000
“ “ agriculture	6,716,000
“ “ manufactures	344,000
Uncertain	112,000
	9,924,000

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Reps.

The bill for the continuation of the Mediterranean fund having been reported, Mr. TALLMADGE moved to postpone the bill for a fortnight.

Messrs. TALLMADGE and LYON supported the motion, objecting to laying this duty in this form, as the object for which it was intended, by the title of the bill, no longer required this revenue. No objection was made to laying the duty, but to laying it in this form, distinct from the general increase of duties proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury; which subject would no doubt soon be reported on by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Messrs. CAMPBELL and ALSTON supported the bill, and opposed the motion for postponement, on the ground that a postponement would be equivalent to a rejection, the present law expiring on the first of next month, and that this fund was well understood in the nation under the name of the Mediterranean Fund, and there was therefore no reason to change the name. It seemed to be similar to an objection to a man, however estimable, because his name did not please the ear.

The motion for postponement was negatived, ayes 16; and the bill ordered to a third reading to-day.

PAYMENT OF WITNESSES.

Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-first ultimo, the petition of Return Jonathan Meigs, and others, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The report is as follows:

The petitioners state that they attended the court of the United States for the District of Virginia, as witnesses, in behalf of the United States, on the trial of Aaron Burr for treason, in the Summer of the year 1807; that they travelled from great and remote distances; and that their attendance had been uncommonly long; that an absence from their homes at that busy season of the year had been severely injurious to them; and that the allowance made by law was insufficient to defray the necessary expenses; and therefore they pray an additional compensation.

In ordinary cases, the committee would be unwilling to sanction any innovation upon the general law relating to the compensation of witnesses attending the courts of the United States; but, in every point of view, whether as it regards the crimes charged upon the accused, the extensive theatre which they embraced, the number of witnesses drawn from the most remote parts of the United States, or the length of time consumed in the trial, as well as the manner of conducting it, this was a most extraordinary one.

In ordinary cases the witnesses live in the vicinity of the courts, and are not exposed to heavy sacrifices in attending them. In this case they are compelled to travel great distances, varying from four hundred to one thousand three hundred miles. The committee conceive that the principle is universally correct, that the personal services of no man shall be compulsorily required without a reasonable compensation given to him; and, therefore, that these witnesses are entitled to it. They have been, however, not only compelled to give their attendance without such compensation, but to expend their own money likewise.

In looking over the laws giving compensation to witnesses, the committee find that those who attended the impeachment of Judge Chase before the Senate were allowed three dollars per diem for their attendance, and twelve-and-a-half cents a mile for travelling to the place of trial, and the same for returning. If a departure from the rule fixing the allowance to witnesses was proper in that case, it is equally so in this, as the distance which the witnesses on the trial of Burr had to travel was further, their attendance was longer, and the expenses incurred by them necessarily as great. The venire summoned from the county of Wood, a distance of 400 miles from Richmond, have also asked a further compensation, and the committee see no just cause of discrimination between them and the witnesses. They therefore recommend that a further compensation be allowed to the witnesses and venire men who attended the trial of Aaron Burr for treason before the Circuit Court of the United States for the Virginia district; and, in pursuance of that recommendation, they ask leave to report a bill for that purpose.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee, then presented a bill giving a further compensation to the witnesses and venire who attended the trial of Aaron Burr before the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Virginia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

ENFORCING THE EMBARGO.

Mr. JACKSON moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from further consideration of the bill for enforcing the embargo, with a view to refer it to a select committee, to make amendments wished by its friends, which could not be made without difficulty in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SLOAN proceeded to speak upon the merits of the bill, when he was called to order. Mr. S. said, that if he was not in order, he would make a motion which would supersede the one now under consideration, and entitle him to proceed. He then made a motion to postpone the subject indefinitely, which, although questioned by several members, was declared by the SPEAKER to be in order, and Mr. SLOAN proceeded, as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I have observed, that since printers have become so numerous in these United States, they are obliged to adopt new modes of publication, in order to obtain ready sale for their innumerable productions. They frequently hand out long histories in short numbers—for instance, a history that in one volume would cost five dollars, has much readier sale in twenty numbers, at twenty-five cents apiece. And, as appears from the progress already made, it is pretty well ascertained that the embargo will occupy the greatest part, if not the whole time, of the present session. If a majority of the House is determined to keep the people in their present state of suffering and suspense until Spring, the least they can do during the dreary scenes of Winter, will be to continue diverting them with eloquent speeches, of all sorts and sizes, from fifteen minutes to four hours long. But, knowing that mankind is fond of variety, and believing that my worthy friends in the majority will have the hardest task they ever undertook to keep the people of these United States in a tolerable good humor, with the embargo on their backs, till next March; although I do not perfectly agree with them, I cannot give them up as lost, but, like a faithful friend, mean to stand by them to the last gasp, striving, if possible, to get them out of the horrible pit into which they have fallen, before they perish.

Under these impressions, Mr. Speaker, I shall proceed to offer my second number, which I thought of doing several days ago, but delayed it in consequence of a declaration of my worthy friend from Virginia, (Mr. NEWTON,) which rejoiced my heart more than all the eloquent speeches I have heard this session: it was, that we (the minority) knew that the embargo was never intended as a permanent measure; and that they (the majority) did not intend to keep it on long, or words to that effect. In this declaration, from so high authority, I reposed full faith and confidence, and suspended offering my second number, in hopes of seeing the wish nearest my heart of all sublunary objects accomplished, in the removal of the greatest evil which in my opinion these United States ever experienced since the Revolutionary war—I mean the embargo. But I have hitherto waited in vain, and must now beg the favor of my worthy friend, the next time he obliges the House with hearing the sound of his pleasing voice—which I, for one, shall hear with great delight—to release my mind from suspense, by giving us the proper definition of the word experiment, and also what he meant by the embargo not remaining long; whether he meant a few days, or a few weeks, months, or years. For, permit me to remind my friend, that if, instead of being in his present honorable station, receiving six dollars per day, as he did previous to the embargo, and still does, he was placed in the situation of thousands at this time in these United States, whose sole dependence for support is their daily labor, and who, by that measure, having been deprived of employment twelve months, now at the commencement of Winter look forward with the dreadful apprehension, that ere the return of vernal bloom, their tender children may ask bread, and they have none to give, he would consider one day longer than now he does a month.

Mr. Speaker, I have committed the purport of this second number to writing, for two reasons—first, to lessen the labor of our stenographers, and secondly, because, after having so long followed those learned and eloquent members that have preceded me, in their sublime and almost superhuman flights of imagination, it would be difficult, if not impossible, for them instantly to descend to my humble sphere, without, in their rapid descent, falling far below it. Hence, I was apprehensive they would dress my bantling in coarser clothes than it merits; and every member on this floor knows that it is needless. Yet, I am not disposed to read it; for I have long believed that both religious and political sermons lose much of their force by reading. But, before I proceed further, I will publish my text, which, although very short, (consisting of but one word,) conveys a dreadful sound to many thousands of suffering American citizens—“EMBARGO.” I will not repeat it; it has become very familiar, and I fear very pleasing, to many who receive six dollars per day for sitting a few hours in this splendid Hall talking about it; but, very different is the situation of many of our constituents suffering under it.

Before I left home I expected that one of the first pages of our journal would have contained a declaration, that this word was proved by experience to be uncanonical, and therefore ordered to be expunged from our political bible; but, alas! how grievously am I disappointed in beholding so great a number of our learned Rabbins, introducing Latin quotations, and perhaps Greek and Hebrew, for I understand none of them, and adducing testimony brought from every habitable part of the globe to prove that it is not barely canonical, but that on our strict obedience depends our political salvation, and that all who differ in opinion are dangerous heretics. It will be remembered that my surprise and disappointment was so great, that I remained silent longer than Job's three friends did in days of yore. We read that, in consequence of the grievous sufferings of their friend, they sat silent and astonished seven days. I sat silent much longer, until compelled by an imperious sense of duty to plead the cause of the poor and needy, and exert my feeble powers in behalf of the sinking liberties of my country.

DECEMBER, 1808.

Enforcing the Embargo.

H. OF R.

Mr. Speaker, last session my principal text was, Removal of the seat of Government, and for the same reason that embargo is at this time; because it was then, in my opinion, the greatest evil these United States suffered—the Embargo is now. And as every wise and just Legislature will first attend to the greatest grievances of their constituents, I must for the present suspend my exertions to remove the seat of Government, and apply them to the embargo. In doing which, I shall not impeach the motives of those who ingrafted into our Constitution the plan of a district ten miles square for a seat of Government; nor of those who carried that plan into execution; nor yet (God forbid! for I was one) of those who passed our first three embargo laws. I will admit that their intentions were good—that their motives were pure. But what has been the consequence? Why experience, that only sure (may I not say infallible?) teacher, has incontestably proved that the principle upon which the ten miles square is founded, is totally repugnant to republicanism and the liberties of a free and independent nation; that whatever its nominal title may be, however artfully disguised, its essence and effect is monarchical, spreading its baneful influence from Georgia to Maine. So has the embargo. They are twin sisters, in proportion to their power, and equally destructive to the lasting interest, peace, and prosperity of these United States, with this difference only, that the latter is more rapid in her movements, and consequently her baneful effects at present are more sensibly felt. Well, now let me ask what must be done? Must these pernicious plans be supported and continued perpetually, because they originated in pure motives? Does not common sense, reason, and justice answer no? The consummate folly of weak and vicious Legislatures has ever appeared most obvious, in the continuation and rigid enforcement of their own oppressive laws; and, vice versa, the wisdom of virtuous Legislatures, in testing their laws by experience, and speedily repealing all that were oppressive to the people.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now ask the indulgence of the House in some observations upon arguments of members who have preceded me, in favor of the continuation of the embargo laws; in doing which I shall not pursue them through the deserts of Arabia, or the scorching sands of Lybia; I will not travel with them, either by land or water, from the torrid to the frigid zone; I will not, after exploring the known, make a futile attempt to explore the unknown parts of the universe, in quest of evidence to support our cause. No; that would be a tacit acknowledgment that it was as bad as theirs, insupportable by domestic, plain, and self-evident facts.

The principal object we now have in view is, to use a military phrase, to bring the artillery of divers members that have preceded me to bear upon themselves, which—if it should bear hard, let them remember that they have provoked the attack—and to show that some of the evidence adduced by them is conclusive against the continuance of the embargo laws.

The first I shall notice is my friend from Tennessee, (Mr. RHEA,) who spoke next after me, soon after the commencement of this discussion. He observed that no distinction ought to be made between rich and poor. I perfectly agree with him, and only ask him to reduce his excellent Christian precepts to practice; that while he sits in this splendid hall, receiving six dollars per day, secure from the piercing blasts of winter, far removed from the hapless habitation of want, where poverty dwells, or even from the apprehension of the plaintive cries of a bosom friend asking bread for her tender offspring where there is none to give, he will abstain from making or continuing in force laws not barely oppressing the poor, but totally depriving them of their wonted means of subsistence—yea, cutting off from them their whole staff and stay of bread.

The next observations I shall notice, fell from my young friend from Virginia, (Mr. GHOLSON,) who is certainly entitled to the thanks of this House, and of the United States generally, but more particularly of the merchants, seamen, and fishermen of the Middle and Eastern States. These classes he has laid under so heavy a debt of gratitude, that I fear they never will be able fully to discharge it. I mean his great condescension in setting his prolific genius to work to devise some means to relieve them from their present suffering situation. Being a great friend to home manufactures, I gave particular attention to this truly patriotic and benevolent plan: which was, if I understood correctly, to turn the merchants and their clerks, with their powdered heads, out of the counting-houses, and set them to ploughing, and the seamen and fishermen to spinning cotton—a plan worthy of the author! But I hope my friend will consider it a token of my respect, if I present for his consideration a reversal of his plan; that is, to order the seamen (whose hands have been used to handling the tarry ropes) to the plough, and the other trifling powder-headed gentry to spinning cotton, as more congenial to their former habits. One more token of my respect, and then I will for the present take leave of my friend from Virginia: that is, that notwithstanding his plan is well adapted to the meridian of a Government where slavery and unconditional submission is the order of the day, he will do well to consider before he proceeds to enforce his plan, whether it will suit the meridian of a Government whose citizens have not been theoretically, but practically free, and long inured to employment of their own choice.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now proceed to some observations of my friend from Georgia, (Mr. TROUP,) but must ask his pardon for not placing him first on the list of the three first mighty men, that have appeared advocates for the embargo; to this station he is, in my opinion, justly entitled, for the clear, positive, and unequivocal manner in which he informed the members of this House from whom they had nothing to fear, and to whom they might safely look up for example. This information, I trust, will be duly appreciated, kept in remembrance, and so strictly attended to, as to prevent the necessity of a repetition. The language, if I understood him correctly, was to the following effect: that we had nothing to fear from the anti-embargo men, they were too base and insignificant; that he would not appeal to the anti-embargo New Englanders, the merest Shylocks, the depraved of the cities, and the ignorant of the country, who would sacrifice the honor and independence of the nation for a little trade in codfish and potash, but to the people of Virginia, too honorable to have been corrupted, and too enlightened to be duped.

Mr. Speaker, as this gentleman has been indulged with liberty to inform the members of this House, and through them the people of the United States generally, who he would not appeal to for example, and who he would, I ask the same indulgence, with this exception only: I ask not liberty to make invidious distinctions between States; I ask not liberty to mention the names of any of them. No; this has never been my practice on this floor, and I trust never will. None more than myself regret being laid under the imperious necessity, in support of justice, liberty, and the inherent rights of man, to say that I will never appeal or look up for example to any State government under which 346,968 human souls are kept in a state of perpetual bondage, and used as an article of traffic, in common with a bale of goods or a beast of the field. I will never hold up as an example any Government, where the choicest of all earthly blessings, "liberty," is extended only to a chosen few, and withheld from the many; where a great majority of those called freemen, who are compelled in case of war to risk their lives in support of the property of the rich, are denied a voice in making the law that so compels them, or any others. I will never look up for a model of political justice to a State boasting of twenty-two Representatives on this floor, who, nevertheless, at a late general contested election, probably took between twenty and twenty-five thousand votes; when on a similar occasion a State sending but six Representatives, took upwards of thirty-two thousand. And, finally, until I am convinced that a radical and complete reformation has taken place, (which God in mercy grant may soon be the case,) I will never look for example to a State which the wise and enlightened author of the Notes on Virginia described as follows: "In this State alone, did there exist so little virtue, that fear was to be fixed in the hearts of the people, and to become the motive of their exertions, and the principle of their government."

No, Mr. Speaker, were I to hold up as an example any State government, it should be one where every man who pays tax for the support of Government, and is called upon when necessary to risk his life in defence thereof, has an equal voice in deciding who shall make the laws that govern him; where the power of the poor man to guard his ewe lamb, is equal to that of the rich over his flock; to a State who, having but eighteen Representatives on this floor, can nevertheless boast of 111,000 free and independent voters. Not to a State where, if the Declaration of Independence is read at all, it is regarded only as a pleasant song, as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal; but to a State where this heaven-born language is reduced to practice: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that God hath created all men equal, that he hath endowed them with certain unalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Ever bearing in mind, that not the hearers but the doers of the law are to be justified thereby.

I will now, with permission of the House, take some notice of my friend from Maryland, (Mr. NELSON,) who, since the commencement of this discussion, has twice favored us with the sound of his feeble voice. He will pardon my freedom in applying to him the appellation of friend, after charging me with the capital crime of having turned my coat—that is to say, I have not always voted with the majority. But really, Mr. Speaker, if I had turned my coat as often as that gentleman has changed his plan of operation, within these three or four years past, it would, by this time, make a very ragged appearance. I am told he is a militia officer. God grant that I may never be a soldier under him; for, at this time of life, he would soon harass me to death with marching and countermarching. But, he has exultingly reprobated the Quakers' principle. This I consider an act of supererogation. For my own part, I am free to acknowledge, that, since my acquaintance with his honor, I have never discovered anything, either in his precepts or practice, that would subject him to the charge of even the least tincture of Quakerism, or of any other religious society. I hope, in thus candidly exonerating my friend from the horrid sin of Quakerism, I may not be considered as derogating in the least degree from his religion, his piety, or his virtue. He may, for anything that I know, have as large a store as any man, and keep it concealed, from the purest motives—that is, a fear that it might be contaminated by exposure to the vulgar throng. But I will for the present drop religious topics, and observe, that the first time my attention was arrested by my friend's feeble voice, his sentiments at first were perfectly in unison with my own. If I understood him correctly, he informed the House that he had heard so many wrong things he could no longer keep silence, and reprobated irritating language, or pointed allusions to particular members. A blessed state of mind, indeed! I will not hurt his feelings by styling this Quaker doctrine, but give it the name of good Christian doctrine, tending to promote love and harmony. But, alas! how short were the pleasing sensations I at first enjoyed. For, lo! those mild accents, and that harmonious voice, I was hearing with so great delight, suddenly became rough and sonorous, his visage fierce, and aspect alarming to weak nerves; and in a tone similar (as I suppose) to that in which he gives orders to his soldiers, when on duty, proposed adopting Sangrado's plan, of blood letting! Thus, suddenly transported from the temple of reason to the field of Mars, I was at first much alarmed, not knowing how soon the plan was to be carried into execution upon us poor anti-embargo men; but after coolly reflecting upon the subject a few minutes, my fears abated, and a comfortable hope arose, that my friend really meant no more than to cool the political fever, by taking some blood from the left arm, which I feel disposed to acquiesce in, provided he will step forward, strip up his sleeve, and undergo the first operation.

But, Mr. Speaker, the next time he rose, his sympathetic conciliatory plans were all laid aside—the maladies of the body politic were all to be healed by antipathy—the embargo, like tartar emetic, although producing very disagreeable sensations, would eventually have a beneficial effect—his martial, heroic spirit rose to such a height, that in case a person only gave him a gentle pat on the cheek, he, without any further ceremony, was to be knocked down. Wonderful change, thought I, how great the contrast between this plan, and that of running away over the mountains! Hail Columbia happy land! the valor of whose patriotic sons increases in proportion to the magnitude of impending danger! I congratulate my country on the return of this heroic spirit, believing that if the embargo is continued twelve months longer, it will require at least one hundred thousand such heroes to enforce it. One observation more, which I hope that gentleman will consider as a token of real friendship. Although I am no military man, I have long made human nature my study; the result of which is, that the frozen regions of the North, the residence of many of those renegade anti-embargo men, would not agree with his constitution; but that a mild and Southern climate is more congenial to his health, and will probably be a means of continuing his valiant acts and useful labors longer in his native soil.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the risk of a declaration that Sloanism is worse than Burrism; that I am influenced by Pickering's spirit, and like the Tories of '76, ought to be put out of the protection of the law; I shall briefly notice some observations of another member from Maryland (Mr. J. MONTGOMERY) whom I have the honor to sit near. I say briefly, because my general rule is to notice observations of members according to their merits. I will not say that that member's voice is as strong and terrible as Kouli

Kahn's; nor will I say, that if he had the same power, he would be as cruel and tyrannical a despot; but I will say, that if I understand his language, it is calculated for the meridian of slavery, and better adapted to the command of a Persian army, or to coerce a horde of slaves, groaning under an inhuman, tyrannical master, than to unite together, as a band of brothers, engaged in supporting the sacred cause of liberty the free and independent citizens of these United States. I will at present take my leave of him, with a caution that he will probably at this time reject and despise; but which eventually he will regret he had not timely attended to. "Let him who thinks he stands strong, take heed lest he fall!"

Mr. Speaker, I shall next proceed to notice some remarks made by my worthy friend from Vermont, (Mr. FISK,) who sits near me; not for the purpose of opposing them generally—to the greater part I could freely say Amen—but in the construction he puts upon my text embargo, we widely differ. He tells us he cares not how much England and France suffer—agreed; but my opinion is, that where England and France suffer one grain by our embargo, we suffer a pound. Yea, I am fully convinced, that the British Ministry has so high an opinion of the benefit of our embargo to that nation, that, if paying the whole expense of our General Government for seven years would purchase a continuance thereof for that time, they would gladly do it. But my friend has adduced a very appropriate metaphor to convey his ideas; he says the embargo is used by one party to ride the other down—granted. The plan has succeeded and progressed with a rapidity unparalleled in any former contest between political parties. This old embargo horse, instead of becoming more gentle and safe to his riders, grows daily more refractory and dangerous; at the last starting place he threw many of his riders, and was within a hair breadth of throwing many more; whereas, the young anti-embargo colt becomes more docile, increases rapidly in strength and beauty, is very sure footed, and promises fair to be a very safe and pleasant hack. In fact, from the present prospect, there is no reason to doubt but that this old embargo horse will, at the next starting place, throw a majority of his riders, and the young anti-embargo colt take another set of horsemen, and carry them safely on their political journey. I will now first take leave of my worthy young friend for the present, earnestly entreating him to depend no longer upon his activity or the excellence of his horsemanship, but instantly dismount that horrid old embargo horse, which alone can prevent a dangerous fall, and mount the beautiful anti-embargo colt, where he may ride safely.

Mr. Speaker, the esteem I ever had since my acquaintance with my two worthy friends from South Carolina, (Messrs. D. R. WILLIAMS and TAYLOR,) who have spoken upon this subject, induces me at this time to make honorable mention of them; my reason for mentioning them jointly is, that a fact stated by one of them, has, in my opinion, completely removed all the objections of the other.

Some of the observations of my friend who spoke last, I shall first notice: As a proof that the embargo has not injured us, he alleges that there has yet been but few failures—granted. Neither does one winter produce many deaths in a farmer's stock of cattle; but, were the great Author of Nature to reverse its usual course, (as we do by continuing the embargo,) and join two winters together, many would die, and those that survived be reduced to extreme poverty.

Again, if I understood him correctly, he told us he wanted to be spiteful to France and England. Why, really, Mr. Speaker, I could look with complaisance upon my worthy friend returning spite for spite upon those oppressive nations, until he had paid them their principal and compound interest, if he could do it in such a manner as not to spite and injure the citizens of these United States most. The residue of my friend's observations, stripped of the flowers of eloquence, in which he presented to the House a pledge of his patriotism, and which, when necessary, I have no doubt he will completely reduce to practice, went to show that, in case the embargo was raised, as far as respected those ports not included in the British Orders of Council, or French decrees, it would only open for our produce so contracted a market, as would be worse than our present situation. To this opinion I will oppose the positive declaration of his colleague, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) that if we open a trade to a spot no larger than the floor of this Hall, it would, in fact, be opening to all the world, by which means the whole of our produce would find a market. Mr. Speaker, in this opinion I perfectly agree with my worthy friend—I rejoiced to hear him make it, hoping it will soon be realized—believing it would be more beneficial to the citizens of these United States to have their surplus produce conveyed through such a channel, even if some went to their enemies, to those who are in want, and their money, and such produce as we want, returned, than to have it collected together and burned.

As my friend has adduced a very appropriate text from the Old Testament, I will call his attention to two from the New, which, when he has considered collectively, I hope will change his opinion into perfect unison with my own. The first is a command to feed our enemies, and the second to do unto others as we would they should do unto us. When my worthy friend (whose honest integrity I have ever highly approved) shall have duly considered and determined to reduce those excellent precepts to practice, then I shall be happy to join with him in his pious determination—that let others do what they may, we, and our houses, will serve the Lord!

Mr. Speaker, two declarations made by the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL) remain yet to be noticed. My reason for deferring them to the last, was my doubts (which still remain) of being able to express my sentiments with that moderation and charity of which that gentleman's language appeared to me totally void, but which I consider as essentially necessary, to promote harmony amongst members, and support the dignity of the House.

The first declaration was, "that the opposers of 'the embargo had no other object in view, but to 'cover the shameful submission they wished to 'reduce the United States to.'" The second, that "their language means to put the present dominant party down and put us in, and then we will 'tell you what we will do;" and then proceeds to answer for them, "that they would do as they had once done before—draw the cords tighter."

Mr. Speaker, that gentleman's conduct, although supported by the irresistible and overwhelming majority with which, at present, he acts, shall not divest my bosom of that charity for him, which his language evinces he has not for me. I wish to cherish that most excellent of Christian virtues, charity, which beareth all things, and which hopeth all things. I hope and trust that it will ever abound in my bosom as at present; hoping that the day is not far distant when my friend from Tennessee, and the party, in whose front rank he now stands, will be convinced that not our plan, but their's is calculated to bring these United States into a state of shameful submission. Yes, Mr. Speaker. I trust I shall prove, before I sit down, that it has already done it.

To the second charge, that "the language of the anti-embargo men is, put us in power;" I answer, they need not even ask it. Let that gentleman and his party persist in their present plan; let them pass additional laws to enforce more rigorously the present; let them raise troops ostensibly for the purpose of repelling invading foes; but as no such foes can be found, and as the people would complain of the expense of an army doing nothing, let their artillery be turned against those wretched, renegade, base anti-embargo men, who durst to complain of their suffering under those laws; let every bay and inlet, from one end to the other of our extensive coast, be safely guarded by gunboats and revenue cutters; let a cordon of regular troops encircle round these United States, and the territories thereof, in such manner that not a single evasion of those celebrated patriotic embargo laws could possibly take place; let this plan be completely carried into execution and continued twelve months. In that case, unless a law should be passed, depriving the anti-embargo men of their right of suffrage, (which would be as just and Constitutional as the one under consideration,) I undertake, as positively as that gentleman, to predict, that if any of the present overwhelming majority should retain a seat in the twelfth Congress, they would be reduced to a more trivial and insignificant minority than that upon which, from his high and exalted seat, he now looks down! Yes, Mr. Speaker, I repeat it, the present minority need not ask to be put in power; the electors would need no further stimulus than the pressure of those laws to bring them to a poll. They would look as anxiously for the election day as the poor slaves under the Jewish law did for the year of Jubilee.

I shall ask the indulgence of the House but a few minutes longer to some general remarks on the effect of the embargo laws, and of the bill under consideration, to which I am impelled by the sacred impulse of my conscience—by my firm attachment to our present Administration, and by my duty, as a Representative of the people, to preserve inviolably their rights—to say, God in his infinite mercy grant it may never be passed into a law. No, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion we have passed too many laws on this subject already. Passing the resolutions reported by our Committee on Foreign Relations, has, in the few days that have elapsed, transferred an immense sum of money from the industrious yeomanry of the country to idle speculators and stock jobbers of both town and country. Is not this fact known to many members on this floor? Do they not know that domestic produce has fallen one-half, and even at that reduced price there is little or no sale for it; and that foreign articles have risen in the same proportion; and that in consequence thereof, in various parts of the Union, where, until the commencement of this session, the embargo, if not approved, was borne with patience, the people now cry with one voice, “we can bear ‘it no longer—give us anything that the wisdom of Congress can devise rather than the embargo!” But I have frequently been asked, if these be facts, why do not the people petition? The reason is obvious. The Federalists have petitioned; what has been the answer? Why they are enemies to our Administration, who wish to involve us in war with France, and an alliance with England. Nay, farther, is not every member on this floor, who has exercised his own judgment as a free and independent Representative of the people, if in but a single instance that judgment runs counter to the will of the majority, denounced as an apostate?

Is this question asked with a view of exciting jealousy, or deceiving the people? No, Mr. Speaker, to undeceive them, to lay before them a true statement of the conduct of their Representatives. I speak experimentally. I speak to a free and enlightened people, who want nothing but true information to induce them to act right. Is there a man in these United States, that, in proportion to his station, has spent more time and money to bring about a change in favor of democracy, and when brought about to support it, than I have? If there be, let him come forward and show it. Have I deviated from those principles? If there be a citizen in these United States that durst to make such a charge, let him come forward and substantiate it. But what has been the consequence? Last session I opposed the famous, or rather infamous court martial bill—a bill that I now suppose was intended as the first chapter of a statute book, in which the present bill under consideration was to have been the second. That horrid attempt to lay the foundation of a military despotism failed; and I pray God the second may also.

But my observations upon that bill were, by some who occupy the front rank in the majority, held up to public scorn, as being my maiden Federal speech. Why really, Mr. Speaker, if the motives of the Federalists are as pure as those which dictated that speech, I do not consider the charge dishonorable. I also brought forward a resolution, for the purpose of removing the greatest evil under which the people of these United States groaned—to erase from our statute books, a principle repugnant to republicanism and self-government—to destroy in its infancy a young vulture, whose nature is such that it cannot be nourished and raised to maturity upon any other food but the vitals of liberty—I mean the removal of the Seat of Government. This conduct, by another member in the front rank, was publicly, on the floor of the House, declared to be worse than the conduct of the arch traitor, Burr. That is to say, that barely an attempt to prevent the rights and liberties of the people from being swallowed up and totally absorbed in the vortex of this masked monarchy, contrary to the will of the chosen few, who either do at present, or hope in future, to live upon its munificence—is a crime of deeper die, than the highest grade in our statute book, high treason.

Mr. Speaker, sensible that I have trespassed long upon the indulgence of the Committee, I will hasten to a conclusion, first observing, that I have no language capable of fully expressing my regret and sorrow, in beholding Congress at this time endeavoring, when the session is nearly half gone, to pass a law to enforce more rigorously divers laws already passed—the futility of which is, in my opinion, self evident; the loss and burden they inflict upon the people, intolerable—their present and future effect, if continued, more injurious to the interest, peace, and happiness of these United States, than any that have been passed since we were an independent nation. Upon the bill now under consideration, I shall at present only say, that if it is passed into a law—to prevent unnecessary expense in printing, and to render it more easily understood, especially by the poor, ignorant, despicable, renegade, anti-embargo men, upon whom it is intended to operate—I hope it will be curtailed, as it is evident the whole purport could be comprised in a few words to the following effect: “That whereas we repose full faith and confidence in the wisdom, integrity, and ability of the President of the United States, to enforce the embargo laws; and also to issue from time to time, and to enforce such edicts as he shall think proper, we hereby authorize and empower him so to do.” But I will not yet despair; I will yet fondly hope, that although this bill has passed one branch of the Legislature by a great majority, that the immediate representatives of the people will never sanction a bill, compared with which the alien and sedition laws were humane and just. But should my hopes be blasted in a majority of this House giving it their sanction, I will still hope that the wise and justly celebrated author of the Notes on Virginia will not, in advanced age, (as Solomon did in the days of yore) tarnish and cast a gloomy shade over that wisdom that shone so conspicuous in his meridian days, by placing his signature to such a bill. With that respect due to his superior station, I must request the favor of him first to look over his Notes, and particularly attend to the following sentence: "Our interest is to throw open the doors of commerce, and to knock off all its shackles, giving perfect freedom to all persons, for the vent of whatever they may choose to bring into our ports, and asking the same in theirs. The actual habits of our countrymen attach them to commerce. They will exercise it for themselves." I will read it again, because it is a language worthy of the Chief Magistrate of a great and independent nation—it is worthy of the attention of the Representatives of a great agricultural and commercial people. We have been frequently called upon for a plan—here is the principle of a plan in a few words, the best adapted to the real interest of this nation, that ever has or ever can be introduced. Would to God, that instead of prowling over non-intercourse resolutions and straining every nerve to devise means to enforce laws, which twelve months' experience has incontrovertibly proved are not only inadequate to the end proposed, but, by their long continuance, become ruinous to the interest, peace, and happiness of the nation, we had adopted the foregoing principle of our worthy Chief Magistrate, the production of his penetrating genius, when at meridian height, agreeably to the resolution offered by my worthy friend from New York, (Mr. MUMFORD.)

But we are told, that adopting this plan would be submission to England—the reverse is the fact; it would exonerate us from the degraded state of submission in which we now stand. I say degraded state, which, with permission of the House, I will prove, I trust, to the satisfaction and full conviction of every impartial mind. It is incontrovertibly proved by reference to official documents now before the public. First, we have demanded the restoration of our impressed seamen, and to coerce Great Britain into a compliance with that, demand we passed a non-importation law; secondly we rejected a treaty, as I have understood, because that demand was not fully complied with. And thirdly, in consequence of the horrid outrage committed upon the frigate Chesapeake, our President having issued a proclamation prohibiting all British armed vessels from entering our ports, refused to revoke that proclamation, until reparation was made, or at least until a plan was proposed by the British Envoy, which should be considered adequate to the purpose. Let these facts be contrasted with the offer made by our President (which was laid before this House in his public Message) to the British Cabinet, that upon the simple revocation of their Orders of Council our embargo should be raised—so far as respected that nation. No condition annexed of returning our seamen, or making reparation for the outrage upon the Chesapeake! Can any rational being, can any man possessed of common sense, and not perfectly blinded by partiality, misunderstand this language? No, Mr. Speaker, it is too plain—so plain, that he who runs may read, and clearly understand. What is its genuine meaning? Why, when stripped of its deceptive covering, and exposed in its real form, it will read thus: "We are convinced, by woful experience, that our coercive plans are futile—that they rebound back upon our citizens, with redoubled force; that therefore, we are now willing, if you will be graciously pleased to grant us liberty to renew our former trade with you, even under all the embarrassments of which we have so long, and so loudly complained; the murder of Pierce, and the outrage upon our national ship to the contrary notwithstanding."

I will not long detain the House with commenting upon the answer returned, but briefly observe, that it was less insulting, and more humane and sympathising than might have been expected from that haughty nation. The purport may be comprised in a few words, to this effect: "We are sorry for the suffering of your citizens, produced by your own imprudent conduct; and would gladly relieve them, were it in our power, consistent with our national honor and dignity; but as that cannot be done, we must, for the present, leave you to devise means for yourselves, to release your citizens from their present increasing distress and truly deplorable situation." The foregoing is not a picture too highly colored. Would to God, for the sake of my suffering country, that it was. But alas! it is life—it is the original—it is a statement of facts contained in official documents gone out to the public, and therefore can neither be controverted nor recalled.

Mr. Speaker, in this deplorable situation, let me earnestly call the attention of the immediate Representatives of the people, to a serious and all important question; a question on which, in my opinion, not only the present, but future union, peace, strength, and prosperity of these United States must depend. Shall the laws passed last session, that have become so distressing to the people, not only be continued, but more rigorously enforced? Will our Government continue the futile attempt, to compell a great number of our hardy, brave, and patriotic citizens to abandon habits which our worthy President (in the quotation before adduced) admits to be impossible? I will repeat it; "the actual habits of our countrymen attach them to commerce. They will exercise it for themselves." Must those brave citizens be driven to acts of despair or desperation, either to abandon their country, or to evade laws under which they are unable to live? Must their petitions and memorials be treated as the product of enemies to Government, as British partisans, and discontented insignificant malcontents, who deserve no further notice than to have their clamors silenced by the strong arm of Government, and their pretended wants supplied by the application of sharp pointed bayonets? I pray the majority of this House seriously to consider the inevitable consequence of persisting in this line of conduct. I pray them not barely to pause and reflect upon past conduct, but immediately reduce to practice the excellent precept of our President, contained in his first inaugural speech, "hasten to retrace your steps;" and instead of passing additional laws which will require an additional military force to execute them, and consequently add to the number of those whose affections are already alienated from our Government, repeal those already passed, so far at least as to open trade to all Powers and places that have heretofore traded with us upon terms of reciprocity. This would evince to the world, that we are really a just nation, desirous of doing unto all men; as we would they should do unto us. This would not only release us from our present degraded situation as it respects our external relations, but what is infinitely more consequential, it would restore confidence in our Government, and peace and harmony among our citizens. Let the merchants of our Middle and Northern States, whose harbors will ere long be bound in Winter's icy chains, enjoy by anticipation the pleasing prospect of beholding, as soon as they are dissolved, their canvasses again spread to waft their merchandise to a foreign port, hoping to receive in return their usual profits. Let the farmers also, through the dreary scenes of Winter, enjoy the cheering hope, that upon the return of Sol's prolific rays, calling from earth's fertile womb her innumerable productions, he may find a usual market for his produce on hand, and a pleasing stimulus to renew cultivation of the earth to produce more. Thus would joy and gladness of heart again sparkle in each eye, and sit smiling on every countenance. Thus would the inestimable blessings of peace be heightened into raptures of delight. Love and harmony would pervade the great mass of our citizens, and unite them together in such a manner that in case any of the tyrants of the old world should invade our peaceful and happy land, they would soon repent of their temerity—they would soon be convinced that the conquest of a free and united people, governed by just and equitable laws of their own making, was a chimera of the brain that can never be realized. Such a line of conduct would add more to the strength and prosperity of these United States than ten thousand celebrated, patriotic, flaming blood-letting speeches delivered on this floor.

Is there an American citizen, possessed of common sense, who is not desirous to see so beneficial and lovely a scene realized? Is there a Representative of the people, who would not cheerfully give his vote, to produce (may I not say to restore?) such a rational millennium, in our once happy land? And, vice versa, is there a true-hearted American citizen, whose blood is not chilled in his veins, in reflecting upon the horrible prospect of military mercenaries, with the point of the bayonet, enforcing laws contrary to the habits of a great number of our citizens, and ruinous to the interest, peace and happiness of a great majority of the people of these United States! Let me indulge the cheering hope, that notwithstanding the present prospect, there never will be found a majority of the immediate Representatives of the people, who will vote in favor of continuing and enforcing such oppressive laws.

10th Con. 2d Sess.—30

Mr. Speaker, having in my plain and unlearned manner discharged that duty which I owe to my constituents, in opposing a system which I consider not only injurious to their interests, but aiming a deadly blow at the union, interest, peace, and independence of that beloved country that gave me birth; before I sit down, I have another duty to discharge; first, to return a tribute of humble gratitude to the Great Preserver of men, who, having led and fed me all my life long, still graciously continues to me, at this advanced age, bodily and mental powers to discharge my duty as above-mentioned—and, secondly, to acknowledge the patient indulgence of this House. And as it will probably be among the last public acts that will evince to the world, the continuation and prevalence, of one of those powerful ruling passions that has long pervaded my breast—I mean love of my country—I embrace this opportunity to declare, that instead of declining in proportion to my bodily powers, it increases with the increase of years, and becomes more animated and vigorous in proportion to the number of days now behind me, as far beyond my reach as those before the flood. Hence I conclude it will continue to increase, the few remaining days that may be allotted to me in a state of mutability; and that, when the number of my days are fulfilled, and this feeble frame engaged in that war from which there is no discharge, this ruling passion will remain strong in death—and the language of a celebrated poet addressing his friends, may with propriety be adopted:

"In that dread moment, as in all the past,
'O! save my country, Heaven!' may be my last."

After Mr. SLOAN had concluded, the question was taken on his motion, and rejected.

Some discussion ensued upon the motion of Mr. J. G. JACKSON to discharge the Committee.

Mr. NELSON made some observations in reply to the remarks against the bill, supporting the reference to a select committee. He denied the assertions that it contained anything so hostile to the liberties of the people and so subversive of their rights, as had been represented. It was his belief that no power would be given by the contemplated law, even in its present form, to executive officers greater than our revenue laws at this time invest them with. Gentlemen would find (he said) upon investigation, that collectors then possessed powers as extensive as any delegated by the bill. One thing, Mr. N. could not help admiring. The astonishing change which had been produced in gentlemen who opposed the bill; and who were formerly not so conspicuous for their anxiety and watchfulness over the rights of the people. The embargo had been said to produce miracles, and after this, he should firmly believe the assertion. When he heard certain members so loud in defence of the people's privileges, he began to feel more faith in the accounts of miracles which had been handed down to us. The embargo having wrought this wonderful change would be attended with at least one good effect.

Enforcing the Embargo.

DECEMBER, 1806.

He believed he should be a better Christian for it all the days of his life.

M. TALLMADGE said, that on ordinary occasions he was disposed to send bills to select committees for amendment; but on extraordinary occasions, he preferred discussing them fully in the House, and if they were found to be dangerous in principle, and very defective in detail, their further progress ought to be arrested. Of this description and character did he deem the bill now under debate. Sir, said Mr. T., if I rightly understand the provisions of this bill, I shall declare that it is fraught with more danger to the liberties and privileges of the people of this country, than any other that has yet been offered to the consideration of Congress.

When I first read the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to which the bill owes its origin, I did then think it to be an exotic plant, not congenial to our American soil, and fondly hoped and believed that neither branch of the Legislature would sanction it. To my astonishment, Mr. Speaker, the Senate have sent to us a bill, into which are ingrafted all the dangerous principles contained in that report. On this general view of the subject (or if I deem it incorrect to go minutely in all the details of the bill, on the present motion) I have no hesitation in pronouncing the bill so radically and vitally defective, both in principle and in all its provisions, that it is utterly incapable of amendment. It is therefore wholly useless to send it to a select committee. Let it be discussed here openly before the nation, and if advocates can be found hardy enough to avow such sentiments, publicly, let them appear, that we may meet them fairly on this floor. It is time that the people of this country should know who the men are that have not only palsied their lawful exertions by a perpetual embargo, but would now jeopardize their dearest rights, to enforce that destructive measure. However much I may respect the other co-ordinate branch of the Government, I cannot consent from motives of delicacy or complaisance to barter away any of the rights of our constituents. This House cannot have forgotten the late attack upon the liberties of the people of this country, by a bill sent from that honorable body, suspending the writ of habeas corpus. And how was it treated by the immediate Representatives of the people? You well remember, sir, that it was rejected in this House, almost by unanimous consent. I view the bill now under consideration infinitely more dangerous to the liberties of this country, than the bill to which I have referred. If this bill should unfortunately pass into a law, then will this country literally be subjected to the will of a dictator; yes, sir, and one of the worst stamp, for he will be a military dictator.

Although I ought not to be surprised that the friends of the embargo should wish by all legal and constitutional means to enforce the observance of those laws, yet I stand perfectly astonished when I see gentlemen ready to surrender the rights of the citizen, to the enforcement of an obnoxious law. At a single stroke you prostrate the civil power and make it completely subservient to military force.

Who can read the provisions of this most extraordinary bill, and notice the heavy and excessive bonds required in the second section, where the owner, consignee, or factor, with the master of every ship or vessel, must give bonds to the amount of six times the amount of the vessel and her cargo, that the embargo laws shall not be violated, without plainly discovering that even the coasting trade must thereby be almost annihilated. I have no belief that one of those captains who usually carry on the coasting trade, could procure sureties for such a bond; more especially when it is provided by the seventh section of the same bill, that neither capture, distress, nor any other accident whatever, (the loss of the vessel at sea excepted,) shall be a plea to mitigate the penalties of such bond, but the whole, with all costs, must be paid by the defendant.

If we turn to the ninth and tenth sections of this bill, we shall find that no man's store or even house is secure from search by our custom-house officers. If the collector of any port chooses to suspect that you have specie in your desk, intended for exportation, by this law you authorize him to make forcible entry and to carry it off; nor can you obtain it again until bond with sufficient sureties shall be given for the landing and delivery of the same, in some place in the United States, whence, in the opinion of the collector, there shall be no danger of a removal. All this high-handed proceeding is to be justified by secret orders to be issued from the President of the United States, whose irresponsible mandates the collectors are bound to obey.

But the most alarming power contained in this bill, and which fills my mind with horror and dismay, is found in the eleventh section. By the provisions of this section, the President of the United States is armed with all the land or naval forces, as well as all the militia of the United States, to enforce the due observance of the embargo laws, which tremendous power he may delegate to whomsoever he pleases. I call on gentlemen solemnly to pause before they place such unlimited power in the hands of the Executive, for the purpose of enforcing a favorite measure. I can scarcely believe my own senses when I read that section of the bill which is now before me, and consider it as having already received the sanction of one branch of the Government, and as sent to this House for concurrence. I really have not words to express my regret and astonishment that such a principle should ever have been sanctioned by either branch of this Government. With the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GARDNER,) I can say that I think the bill deserves a public execution, and I wish to give it one openly, in the face of day, before the nation. I want no select committee to inform my judgment on this head, for I am fully persuaded, that however nice the cookery may be made, that dish can never suit my palate. I know full well the meaning and extent of this tremendous power, and never will I consent to array the military and naval force of my country against my fellow-citizens, before the milder measures of legal process shall have been tried and found ineffectual. When a country has become base enough to submit to such measures, it proves one of two things incontrovertibly to my mind,—either that their rulers, through ignorance or wickedness, enact laws so offensive to the people that they cannot be executed in the ordinary manner; or that the people themselves have become indifferent to their condition and ripe for ruin. This I am persuaded is not the condition of the people of the United States, for whom, I humbly trust, Heaven has in store many and peculiar blessings.

I should mourn over the departed glory of my country (to achieve whose independence my feeble but faithful services were afforded) if I could believe the great body of its citizens were willing to submit to such base degradation. It is enough to submit to the despotism of the sword when it shall be forced upon us; for Heaven's sake let us not court it by a public law.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NELSON) has asserted on this floor, that every provision in this bill is recognised by the revenue laws of the United States, and then very sneeringly adds, that those laws were passed by federal men, under a federal administration. I admit that the revenue system was enacted by federal men, and the wisdom of those measures is fully sanctioned by a long period of unexampled prosperity and commercial importance. But I utterly deny that the present bill is supported, or its principles recognised by the revenue laws of the United States. In my judgment there may be found more anti-republican tendencies in one section of this bill, than can be selected from the whole revenue system of the United States, consisting of one hundred and twelve sections. I call upon any gentleman upon this floor to point out such principles in our revenue laws, as those contained in the few sections I have already quoted. Sir, they are not to be found there, to disgrace the pages of that system, nor to dishonor its authors.

The same gentleman affects to believe that the days for working miracles have again returned, inasmuch as federal men have now become the friends of the people. That class of men with whom I have the honor to act, never trumpeted their own praise in every corner of the streets, nor claimed, like some others, the exclusive privilege of being the friends of the people. They have uniformly pursued that system of policy which their great head, the immortal WASHINGTON, taught, and they left their principles and conduct to be tested by the result. When the blessings of the embargo shall be a little more fully experienced, and especially if the bill now on your table should be enacted into a law, with all its detestable features about it, the people must probably begin to feel the burden that will oppress them, and most probably will determine without the aid of miracles, who has been the authors of their accumulated distresses.

The gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NELSON) with peculiar felicity; seems to apply the terms rascals and scoundrels, to all the violators of his favorite system, the embargo. I am truly sorry that such harsh and unworthy expressions should be uttered within these walls; for really I cannot suppose it to be consonant with the decorum of debate. But it may be well to remind that gentleman that the most honorable men in the community, to whom I know he would be unwilling to apply those odious epithets, may, by the provisions of this bill, very innocently incur the penalties attached to the violation of the embargo.

Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in declaring to this honorable House, that I am seriously alarmed for the present condition of our country, and am very solemnly impressed with the aspect of our public affairs. While I fully believe that a great portion of our constituents view the embargo system as impolitic and ruinous in the extreme, my apprehensions for the future peace and tranquillity of this country are greatly awakened when I perceive such a pertinacious adherence to such high-handed measures as are contained in this bill. A general dislike to any law, by the great mass of the people for whose benefit it purports to be enacted, is always good ground for its repeal; and gentlemen will do well to consider how far such severe privation can be carried before open opposition is excited.

I trust I shall never attempt an alteration of measures by exciting the fears of this honorable House; but if the warning voice of our illustrious founder cautioned his countrymen against every attempt to sever the union of these States, I pray gentlemen to remember that a system of so much severity, pursued with such unyielding perseverance, may produce evils which every friend to his country would deprecate. With such solemn apprehensions upon my mind, I am prepared to vote directly upon the merits of the bill now before us, and shall rejoice to see it consigned to political perdition.

Mr. MASTERS said this bill carried the stamp of despotism and degradation; it was wide from the path prescribed by duty and honor, and was the offspring of unsettled theory and unthinking policy.

If great and unusual exertions are necessary in the present crisis, can you, by your present measures, disappoint the hopes of the belligerents? You unnerve your own strength, and you will cripple the country at no distant period. The real foundation of the strength of a nation is spirit, pride, and resources; you disarm their courage, distract their efforts, and destroy their resources. Your measures are not guided by the great maxims of sound policy.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. ALSTON) considers the bill not only beneficial, but perfect; and says no member has presumed to point out any defect in form or principle, even in a single section of the bill.

I beg the indulgence of the House, while I attempt to point out some of the dangerous principles and consequences contained in this bill. By the latter part of the second section, your collector may grant permission to ship any cargo to any port within the United States, or may refuse such permission, at his discretion. In fact, you give to your collector the power of regulating your coasting trade. I will pass over the third, fourth and fifth sections, which are far from being unexceptionable. The sixth section relates principally to the registering and sale of ships and vessels, by which you compel the seller to give enormous heavy bonds, you unwarrantably interfere in the contracts of your citizens, and compel the seller to become particeps criminis with a third person over whom he has no control. In short you prohibit the owners of this sort of property from making any transfer, however fair and honest.

H. OF R.

Enforcing the Embargo.

DECEMBER, 1808.

In the seventh section, when a bond shall be given to the United States, that the cargo of a vessel shall be relanded in some port of the United States, the parties to such bond shall produce a certificate, from the proper officer, of the relanding of the same in two and four months. On failure whereof the bond shall be put in suit, and expressly direct judgment shall be issued against the defendant, unless there is proof of the relanding or loss of the vessel at sea. Sir, you interfere with the business of your fair judiciary, and in the same clause you forbid the capture or distress of the vessel, or any other accident whatever, (however true and without fraud,) to be admitted as evidence in defence of the suit.

The very essence of private right is attacked and defeated. You dissolve all established principles, and will overthrow the fabric of society; which time has just reared. You derange the order of things, and produce confusion and destruction, with the derangement of property. An overbearing and unthinking majority has often produced confusion and calamity in Government; this confusion and calamity will be increased by this law. These dangers may be obviated, by adopting a course of measures suited to our national circumstances and particular energies of the country.

The ninth section of the bill authorizes the collectors to take into their custody specie, or any article of domestic growth, produce, or manufacture, deposited in unusual places or in unusual quantities, or when in vessels, carts, wagons, sleighs, or any other carriage, or in any manner apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation or the vicinity thereof.

Sir, the extraordinary and wanton grant of illegal power in this section, and other parts of the bill, admits of no justification, nor even palliation. The farmers, by mere ignorance and inadvertency, may be subjected to the severest penalties for things done in common, ordinary and necessary management of their business. Your collectors are to be armed with unlimited power to search from the closet of the farmer to his wagon or cart. Every man's house is liable to be suspected, visited, and ransacked; as well in the night as day time, and your citizens intimidated by a troop of armed men and custom-house officers; without inquiring into the truth; without information upon oath, and without a warrant. Yes, sir, it is left to the mere arbitrary discretion of a custom-house officer, to search for, and seize the property of your citizens.

If your power was not bounded by the Constitution, you ought to be bounded by your moderation and equity, and by the trust reposed in you by society, and by the laws of God and nature. You take from your citizens that great privilege which they had under the law, that their houses cannot be searched without a warrant and information upon oath. This is not an abstract or speculative notion, but has been the mode of practice in all times and in all nations that ever saw the light of liberty, or lived under the empire of laws. When you extend the vexatious power of your officers to invade private property, the irresistible law of self-defence operates against you; and the fundamental principles of the Constitution shake under your hands. I deem this bill to be an intolerable oppression, affecting private property, and destructive of the peace and quiet of private families.

In all Governments power is liable to be abused. When a Legislature grants power to individuals that power ought to be limited and defined. This bill gives arbitrary and despotic power, uncontradicted and without limitation.

In every Government resides some where absolute and unlimited authority; in this country that authority is vested in the people. In extreme cases it is justifiable for the people collectively to interfere. This is the greatest and most perilous responsibility in conscience and in duty to all who act or advise in it; pregnant as it is with danger and confusion, you must not harass and use your citizens with arbitrary power and arbitrary force, unknown in a free Government. Bad laws must be maintained by force—good laws need no force.

It is strange to reflect that in a country which has liberty for its principle, arbitrary and absolute power should be granted to your collectors over the persons and property of your citizens.

If a collector takes a dislike, however whimsical, however unjust, to an innocent citizen, he may reduce him to the state of a dependent slave, before he can obtain redress.

It is said the printed bill in my hands is different from the bill before the House. There is no material alteration in form or substance.

The tenth section of the bill declares that the powers given to the collectors shall be exercised in conformity to such general rules and instructions as the President may prescribe; and that the collectors shall not be liable to any action, suit, or judgment on account of any detention, or for having taken any articles into their custody.

I cannot but be most seriously alarmed at a stretch of power, so wide, so unnecessary, and so unconstitutional. This clause gives a power dangerous in its consequences, which ought not to be trusted with any man, whatsoever. The shackles of restriction are always necessary to confine the hands of tyranny, and shorten the strides of ambition. You indemnify your collector for any wrong or injury he may commit; he will triumph over a citizen whom he has made a victim, and stalk about in open and insolent defiance of all the fundamental principles of liberty and law.

I believe it will be admitted that one of the great ends of our sitting here, is to take care not only of the liberties and properties of the people in general, but of every man, and every set of men. You have the means in your hands, by the natural operation of the Government, of preventing abuses, and securing a due attention to the interests and feelings of every part of the community. This bill will expose us to the confusion and misery of contending divisions, and produce debility in the nation, and insure success in favor of your opponents. Mankind in general are the same; act from the same principles, and fall by the same temptations. It is to be regretted, that the reason of man is not always sufficient for the government of man; she often gives her empire to the passions and to party, and renders it difficult to foresee the evils sufficiently timely to prevent the mischief.

The 11th section of this bill gives power to the President, or such other person as he shall empower for that purpose, to enforce your embargo laws by military power. There are but two ways of fixing the badge of slavery upon a free people; by military force or by encroachments on their liberty; both are contemplated in this bill. For God's sake, is this the doctrine of the Constitution? Is this doctrine that Americans will swallow? Can it go down? If we fall under the shade of this power, this law; that sleep may end in death. I implore gentlemen, if they have any affection for their country, or regard for the liberties of their posterity, not to attempt to govern a free people by a military force. The thought of putting it to trial strikes me with horror. Let us not drive our citizens to despair—the despair of a brave people turns to courage, that courage once exerted your Government is at an end. Sir, our all is at stake; our Constitution is giving way. The principles and maxims of this bill are more adapted to Turkish government than the American Republic, and it will stand upon record as an evidence to future generations of our weakness and folly.

It is with the most deliberate and solemn conviction I oppose this bill. When any dangerous innovation threatens us, it is the duty of every American to be vigilant and check it wherever it is found. Of the Constitution we cannot be too sparing or abstemious, it has cost much, and it is worth more than it has cost, and without it everything else will be of little value. Slices of the Constitution are the last things I will give away; nor will I maim it to gratify any party, or to justify any measure. I will keep it strait laced. This is the contest between liberty and tyranny, between oppression and free government.

If you progress in your present system, it will be necessary to have a standing army to protect you against the resentment of the people, who will see the nature and true cause of the distemper. If you stand in your senses, you cannot, as members of civil society, wish this bill to pass. You will do well to reflect what consequences may result from it to yourselves and the nation. I do verily believe, from the true temper of the American people, this bill will rouse the spirit of the nation. Are you aware how general opposition will become, which, from the times in which we stand, it is neither wise nor honest to provoke? Indeed I am amazed that these considerations make no impression on this House. It is not common sense, but downright madness to follow your wild principles.

How long are the American people to continue the passive victims of the embargo? When the nation begins more seriously to feel the evils, their national revenge will be sharpened by the smart; and if you pass this bill, you will bring down their vengeance against you, which will hurl you down into that detestable and abominable place where the worm never dies and the fire is not quenched.

We are waging war against the public opinion. The voice of the nation is against the proceedings of Government, and this system is not the system of the people. Your measures are not warranted by the sound maxims of government, nor the examples drawn from the history of the world. You, by an extension of power, urge the punishment of offences, of which you yourselves have been the tempters.

This state of things cannot long remain as they are. Commercial jealousy is roused and will increase; and without an united interest in commerce, in a commercial country, our political confederacy will receive many shocks, and a separation of interest will threaten a separation of connexion, endanger the Union, and shake the Constitution to its centre; which every honest American must shudder to look at.

The last Congress rejected a bill to suspend the habeas corpus, as an infringement on public liberty, with marked contempt. How much more necessary is it to show your decided disapprobation of this extraordinary bill? Let it not be sheltered behind a secret committee.

The motion was further opposed by Messrs. GARDNER, GARDENIER, LYON, and QUINCY; and supported by Messrs. BACON, JACKSON, ALSTON, MACON, SOUTHWARD, and EPPES.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that he should be for the reference to a select committee, but thought it best to give them some instructions as to what amendments were to be made—this would be best done by first debating the provisions of the bill in the House.

The question on discharging the Committee from the consideration of the bill, was taken and carried—yeas 70.

The bill was then referred to a select committee, consisting of Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON, Mr. MACON, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. STORY, Mr. SOUTHWARD, Mr. BIBB, and Mr. HOWARD.

other petitions upon the subject of claims against the United States which are barred by the statutes of limitation, presented a bill making provision for the discharge of certain unsatisfied claims against the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

An engrossed bill to continue in force, for a further time, the first section of an act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Augustin Serry. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act of last session for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds. The amendments reported by the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures having been agreed to, the Committee rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to be read a third time to day; and it was accordingly read a third time and passed.

Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was yesterday referred the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to enforce and make more effectual an act, entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States,' and the several acts supplementary thereto," made a report thereon; which was read, and, together with the said bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next—37 to 36.

ANDREW J. VILLARD.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of A. J. Villard went through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The bill was then read a third time. [It contemplates the giving to Mr. Villard one thousand dollars for an improvement in the mode of mounting cannon.]

Messrs. TALLMADGE, PITKIN, QUINCY, ELY, ALEXANDER, and RHEA, opposed the bill, on the ground that the invention would be inoperative in practice; and even if not, that it was invented by a person in the employ of the United States, whose duty it was to make all the improvement he could. Messrs. NEWTON, TAYLOR, and SMILIE, supported the bill, on the ground that it was extremely useful, was now actually in practice, and would be advantageous to the service of the United States.

The bill was passed—yeas 55, nays 44, as follows:

Foreign Licenses.

H. OF R.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President to employ an additional number of revenue cutters," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. BLOUNT,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing in force the act, entitled "An act for the establishment of trading-houses with the Indian tribes;" and also to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, amendment is necessary to the same.

FOREIGN LICENSES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for compelling vessels now abroad to return home, and for preventing any citizen of the United States from taking from a foreign Power a license to trade, &c.

Various amendments were made to the detail of the bill. The second section, which is intended to prevent vessels from navigating under a foreign license, was amended, on motion of Mr. STORY, so as to make the act a misdemeanor, to declare the vessel so offending to be forfeited, and to impose a penalty on the offender of a sum not exceeding $10,000. The 1st of October was fixed as the day after which this section should take effect.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill as amended.

The House having taken up the report of the Committee of the Whole—

Mr. BACON wished the amendments to be negatived, as he thought the first section of the bill (for compelling vessels now out to return home) looked to a continuance of the embargo for a longer period than he wished to contemplate. The second section he was decidedly in favor of.

Mr. NEWTON said, if the House were in favor of the first section, he thought they should not be prevented from voting for it because it might be made use of for electioneering purposes.

Mr. DURELL declared himself opposed to the whole bill. If it was a part of a system, he wished to see the whole of it. It appeared to him to be the sauce introduced before the meat.

Mr. STORY coincided with his colleague (Mr. BACON) in wishing the first section to be stricken out. He feared that an impression would be made on the public mind that it was intended to continue the embargo as long as the time allowed by this section (eighteen months) for vessels beyond the Cape of Good Hope to return. He was not prepared at this moment to say what vote he might give on the further continuance of the embargo; but he was prepared to say that for eighteen months longer it would not be the policy, or redound to the honor of the United States to continue it. It was a system which operated indirectly on the belligerents. After every means had been exhausted to preserve peace, (as was now nearly the case,) he wished to see the nation assume the same attitude, assert the same principles, and maintain the same character which marked our forefathers—the same which marked them in 1776, and vindicate our rights with honorable and open warfare. For this reason he was opposed to the first section of the bill, because it might convey an impression which, for, one he was not willing to sanction. He did not consider the bill as connected with the embargo. The second section was one, he said, which every man possessing the feelings of an American ought to vote for; for the orders and decrees, to submit to which the House had declared would be an abandonment of our rights, had closed every avenue of commerce. America was not destined to depend for the exercise of her maritime rights on the smiles or frowns of any foreign nation. She was destined to enjoy a free commerce, and not to take, as a boon, a license to pursue that trade which she claimed as a right of nature; and the second section of this bill was to prevent a few, who had forfeited all title to the honorable name of Americans, by accepting foreign licenses to trade, from disgracing the character of the United States. He could wish that the first section should be negatived, that Congress might not appear to have legislated on an existing fact; that nothing might be left on record to hand down to posterity the fact that, in the short period of thirty years from the declaration of our independence, there had been Americans willing to surrender it. He wished the principle of the second section to be permanent and co-existent with the Constitution.

Mr. S. considered the embargo as having been a wise measure; that it had answered all the purposes of precaution; but the time would soon arrive when it must either be effectual or when its effect as a coercive measure might be doubted. He wished to do nothing which should hold out an idea that the embargo would be continued for any great length of time longer. The language made use of for party purposes, which had penetrated into every hovel and been repeated at every fire-side in the country, in relation to the embargo, was, that it was intended to put the Northern States at the feet of the Southern; that the North was to be crushed and rendered subservient to the interests of the South. Mr. S. did not believe a word of it. He had always found the Southern gentlemen friends to our commercial rights, and their friendship was on record on the Journals of the House. What was the embargo? A stand for commerce—a measure arising from a desire that our merchants might enjoy the benefits, and the Northern section of the Union pursue the fair commerce designed for them by Providence; that it might not be exposed to a gradual consumption and wasting away by the belligerent edicts. And it was because he believed this, that he did not wish the first section to afford ground for a renewal of this clamor.

Mr. TAYLOR declared his opinion to be in perfect consonance with that of the gentleman from Massachusetts in regard to the continuance of the embargo. He said, that before the expiration of eighteen months, he also should be prepared to engage in open and honorable warfare, if the embargo did not in a reasonable time procure a redress of our grievances. A period long short of eighteen months would have exhausted the patience of the nation and tested the efficacy of the measure. Mr. T. said that there were now no vessels of the United States abroad which had not already incurred the penalties of this act by taking out a license. If they had not, they would soon fall into the clutches of the belligerents. So that, in fact, the first section was a work of supererogation. The second section should be adopted independently of the embargo or any other measure. Indeed, gentlemen who had voted in favor of the resolution expressive of a determination to resist the belligerent edicts, could not consistently vote against this section, for it went to resist one of the most odious parts of an edict of one of the belligerents—that part which requires our vessels to take out licenses in order to pursue their fair commerce.

Mr. DURELL expressed himself decidedly in favor of the principle, but did not like legislating by piece-meal, passing a section to-day and a section to-morrow—a law to-day and a law to-morrow. He wished to see it connected with a general plan of resistance.

Mr. NEWTON had no idea, by the first section of this bill, to pledge the House to the continuance of the embargo for eighteen months. He considered it no pledge to continue it for even six or eight months. If the embargo did not operate as a coercive measure, he was prepared to take that attitude which should by force secure to us that justice we had hitherto in vain attempted to procure in another mode. If the European nations did not meet us in a short time, as they ought to do, in amicable arrangements, he was prepared to "cry havoc, and let loose the dogs of war." As he had no very particular partiality for the first section, in order to accommodate the gentleman from Massachusetts, he would now withdraw his support of it.

Mr. MASTERS thought the first section of the bill was perfectly proper, and not at all indicative of an intention to continue the embargo, when compared with the amendatory embargo law, manning gunboats, &c., which would seem to leave no doubt on the subject.

Mr. MILNOR opposed the first section, but supported the second.

Mr. TROUP considered the first section superfluous; for our vessels could not now continue abroad except they traded under foreign licenses.

Mr. GARDNER defended the people of the Eastern States from insinuations against their patriotism, and used some arguments to show that the angry passions should not be excited in the House, but rather allayed.

Mr. SLOAN said he understood some gentlemen to consider the present bill as connected with the embargo; that being the case, he had done with it. It was sufficient for him to know that anything had connexion with the embargo to induce him to reject it.

The House struck out the first section—yeas 73.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said he had just come in, and wished to understand the grounds on which the decision of the House had just now been made.

Mr. MACON made a motion that the further consideration of the subject lie on the table, to give time for deliberation; which motion, however, he afterwards withdrew; and

Mr. JACKSON moved to reconsider the vote just taken.

This motion was supported by Messrs. MACON, MASTERS, JACKSON, and HOLLAND, and opposed by Messrs. STORY and RHEA.

Mr. GARDENIER made a speech of half an hour in favor of reconsideration.

When he concluded, a quorum not being present, the House adjourned—yeas 44, at near five o'clock.

FRIDAY, December 30.

Another member, to wit: NICHOLAS VAN DYKE, from Delaware, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating, at the request of the Governor, the Senate, and House of Representatives, of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, certain resolutions, entered into by the said Senate and House of Representatives, and approved by the Governor on the 23d instant. The resolutions are as follow:

Whereas the situation of the United States in relation to foreign Powers, is eminently critical, and calls for all their energies, unanimity, and patriotism to preserve those rights, and that independence for which our fathers fought and conquered: And whereas, in such times, it is the duty of the constituted authorities to aid the common cause of our country, by declaring anew their devotion to the principles of the Declaration of Independence. Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, That we have the fullest confidence in the wisdom, the patriotism, and the integrity of the administration of the General Government, and that we pledge ourselves to co-operate with them to the fullest extent of our power in all measures which may be deemed expedient to maintain our national honor and national rights.

Resolved, That we consider the embargo as a wise, pacific, and patriotic measure, called for by the best interest of the nation, and well calculated to induce an observance of our national rights, without a resort to the horrors and desolations of war, so repugnant to the feelings of humanity and the principles of free Government.

Resolved, That, as the ocean is the common highway of nations, and as this Commonwealth is deeply interested in the preservation of its freedom, should those painful measures not produce the desired effect, we are firmly determined to unite our efforts with those of the General Government in the maintenance of its rights.

Resolved, That the Governor of this Commonwealth be requested to forward copies of the foregoing resolutions to the President of the United States, with a request that they may be communicated by him to the Congress of the United States.

Approved, December 23, 1808.

The said Message and resolutions were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Another Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating a letter from Governor Claiborne, on the subject of a small tribe of Alabama Indians, on the Western side of the Mississippi, consisting of about a dozen families.

The said Message was read, and, together with the letter accompanying the same, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands,

On motion of Mr. NEWTON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be, and they are hereby, instructed to bring in a bill to permit the franking of the Message of the President of the United States of the 23d of December, 1808, and the documents accompanying the same, and such other documents as may be communicated by the President of the United States, from time to time, to both Houses of Congress.

Mr. QUINCY presented a petition of sundry mariners, late masters and mates of vessels belonging to the port of Portland, in the District of Maine, praying that some measures may be adopted by the General Government for their assistance and support, they being deprived of their usual means of obtaining a livelihood, by the operation of the various acts laying an embargo within the United States.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HELMS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill authorizing the discharge of John Heard from his imprisonment; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

On motion of Mr. WHARTON,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed for the purpose of considering whether any, and, if any, what amendments are necessary to be made to the act of Congress, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act establishing Circuit Courts and abridging the jurisdiction of the District Courts of the Districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio,'" passed the 22d day of March, 1808; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. WHARTON, BOYLE, and JEREMIAH MORROW, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President to employ an additional number of revenue cutters," were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. NELSON,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill to deprive, in certain cases, vessels of their American character, and to prevent, under certain disabilities, any citizen of the United States taking a license from any foreign Power, to navigate the ocean, or to trade with any foreign and independent Power, which was yesterday depending at the time of adjournment, be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, in pursuance of a resolution this day agreed to by the House, presented a bill to authorize the transmission of certain documents, by the mail, free of postage; which was read the first and second time. A motion was then made by Mr. STANFORD that the bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole; and the question being taken thereupon, it passed in the negative. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time this day.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the following resolution, reported by the committee, to whom was referred the resolution for placing the country in a more complete state of defence:

Resolved, That it is expedient immediately to raise, arm, and equip, fifty thousand volunteers, to serve for the term of two years.

The resolution having been read—

Mr. NELSON said that the House had, a few days ago, unanimously adopted a resolution for placing the country in a more complete state of defence. The danger and probability of war appeared to thicken upon us every day; and, unless preparation were made, we should be taken in a situation not advantageous to the country. He thought it extremely doubtful whether a law on this subject could be presented to the House, and the details so made up as to meet the opinion of a majority, and the bill go through the other branch of the Legislature, and receive the sanction of the President, before a blow would be struck against us. At least it was highly probable that, before the volunteers could be put in motion, this would have taken place. True it was, that, on a sudden attack, the militia might be competent to repel it. But, if anything like fixed hostile operation should take place, it would be necessary to have some men whose term of service would be more extensive than that of the militia. For, however great the patriotism of the people, and he believed they had more than any in the world, it was well known that many of them had it not in their power to leave their families for any great length of time. He hoped and trusted that the resolution would meet with no opposition from any quarter. He had framed it in as broad a manner as possible, in order to obviate the necessity of entering into any discussion of the detail of the bill at this time.

The Committee rose, and reported the resolution to the House.

Mr. PITKIN required the yeas and nays on the question of concurrence by the House.

Mr. GARDENIER then rose.—He said he was surprised that this resolution had passed through the Committee of the Whole without opposition. He had hoped that some other gentlemen would have called for the reasons which induced the report of the committee. It was proposed by this resolution to raise a standing army in time of peace; a force, which, to his mind, was unnecessary on the one hand and frightful on the other. Was it the object of Government to plunge us into a war? Was a declaration of war intended? If we were to be put into a state of actual old-fashioned war, he should wish, for one, to have the fact in the first place ascertained. If war was determined on, however unnecessary and unjust such a war may be, the interest of the country demanded that, in such a case, they should take care that the country should not suffer. He said, he was not prepared to pledge himself, in the present state of the nation, that he would go to war; and at any rate, before war was declared, he would not give his sanction to raising a force, the destination of which he did not understand, and could not calculate upon. Fifty thousand men at an expense to this nation for two years of $2,900,000! Why, said he, I was told last year that the system on which we were entering, the embargo system, was to prevent war; that war was the most dreadful calamity which could befall a nation. I did not want to be told that, in order to know it. But this dreadful evil of war was to be averted by laying an embargo that would bring the belligerents at our feet; that would perform a great cure for all the disorders of the State, or miseries of the country. But now it appeared that the embargo system was to be abandoned, and war to be commenced in its place. Is it intended by this report to say that the embargo has utterly failed of its purpose, as was predicted by those who opposed it? Is it to be relinquished, because it is, in its operation, futile; because it has proved that those who commenced it were not capable of calculating the effects to be produced by it? Whenever the embargo question is brought up, in a direct proposition, it is smothered; and when attempted to be introduced in an amendment to any other question before the House, it is declared out of order; and yet a system is here to be introduced, which, if it proves anything, proves that the embargo system is wholly futile in its operation. Do gentlemen mean that the embargo system will do no longer? Let us go on regularly to repeal it, then, that we and the nation may understand it. If the embargo be this grand preventive against war, which it is all along cried up to be, and which opinion has been the means of gaining it that languid and sickly support which it has received from some portions of the country; if it is to be continued as a coercive measure, then, sir, I do insist that, raising a military force of fifty thousand men is unnecessary. If the embargo be coercive, the raising fifty thousand men for coercion is unnecessary. The two different systems are incompatible. If we have embargo, let us have wholly embargo; if war, wholly war. If we are to have peace, the raising of troops is wholly unnecessary, especially with our present limited resources. I wish not to see those measures, which a declaration of war only would warrant, adopted before that attitude is taken. I have no idea of having these chains wound round me, round this House, round the nation; and I trust the nation will entertain the same opinion.

A gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. STORY) said yesterday, if I understood him, that the embargo had failed, so far as to its coercive character. Is it the sense of the House that it should be repealed? Is it the sense of the House, as the gentleman from Massachusetts also intimated as his opinion, that there should be a declaration of war? If so, it might be proper to raise an army. But I have no disposition to raise an army until there be war.

There had been a time, said Mr. G., when the raising twelve thousand men was considered and held out, by many honest politicians, as a measure dangerous to the independence of the States and to the rights of the people individually. Last year six thousand men had been raised, and now fifty thousand more were called for. He had thought that, in this country, no standing armies should be raised in time of peace; that there was a sacred injunction in the Constitution forbidding it. Perhaps he did not correctly understand the subject; this might not be a standing army, because its term of service was limited to two years; but it might be extended two or ten years more. He put the question to gentlemen whether, in a state of peace, under the operation of that very system which had been represented as a substitute for war, it would be proper to raise this force? He could not reconcile it with a due estimate of the interests of the country on the one hand, or the sacred injunctions of the Constitution on the other, to raise an army to such an extent. An army is to be raised; the mode in which it is to be employed is uncertain. The twelve thousand men, which he had before mentioned, was a body which could not be employed to the detriment of the liberties of the country; for almost every section could raise a force to resist such an army if an attempt had been made by it to destroy their liberties. We had another security, too, against this force being used to a bad purpose. At the head of this army had been the great hero of the Revolution, and also the man who had, next to him, done more for the prosperity of the country than any other, under whose luminous and creative mind the resources of the whole country had been brought into action, and spread an universal brilliancy over the nation instead of that gloom and poverty which had preceded his influence in the United States. This army, so small, and under such commanders, threatened not the public liberty. Yet there had been men zealous and eager that none, the slightest occasion, should be given for any one to suppose that they were about, by military force, to invade the liberties of the country, who had seen horrors in this small army, which they could scarcely find words to depict. Where were these men, he asked, now that an army of more than four times the number was about to be raised; when those two heroes were departed to the silent tomb; when other commanders were to have the direction of this military force? Where were the men who had been struck with this patriotic alarm? Why were not their voices raised now, when a force was offered to be raised, which, if employed to overturn the liberties of the people, could not be resisted, but would spread itself over the country and stifle the efforts of patriotism?

H. OF R.

To which, if resistance should be made, either the country must be put under military despotism, or the struggle would cost the country all it had acquired since the Revolution, and the citizens would have to wade knee-deep in blood to preserve that liberty which they gained by the glorious struggle of the Revolution. Are we more safe now, said he, with an army of fifty thousand men, under our present commanders, than we were with twelve thousand men under WASHINGTON and Hamilton? I could wish to believe that we were. But, I have not that faith which blinds my judgment and destroys my recollection. No, sir, indeed I have not; I cannot extinguish from my memory that, in one section of this country, the liberty of the citizen, the judicial power which should be inviolable, and the sacred right of habeas corpus, perished at the touch of military power. I do not believe the country safe under this army; I do not believe the persons of the members of this House are safe under it; and I would protest against it at the hazard of my head. Such are my own feelings, and I could wish, and I would strive, if I knew the way to the hearts of men, to recall the feelings of '98 and '99. Or, is it true in all cases, even with the warmest patriotism; that tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur cum illis? Perhaps, however, I may not see clearly; some argument may be found in favor of this proposition.

What course, he asked, was to be given to this army? Was a state of war expected between this country and France? There was now no point at which we could come in contact with her. Formerly, when the French Government had a despotic influence over that of Spain, the Spaniards on our Western frontier could have been set in motion against us; but now we had nothing to fear in that respect. Were we to have war with Great Britain? Was that at length determined on? Had it been settled out of doors that we were to have war, and were the House now called upon to vote what could only be a legitimate consequence of a declaration of war? This army must be intended to be employed out of the country; for to self-defence the militia were surely competent. Was this nation to go to war with Great Britain and Spain? Was this force to be employed against Canada, or in giving legitimate form to the Burr project? Was it to go to Mexico? Mr. G. said his mind had been struck with a kind of horror which he could not express at this projected army, and he could not sit still, and give a silent vote when a project which he believed to carry with it so many mischiefs, perhaps such utter ruin, was set on foot.

He did not believe, he said, that the public liberty would be more safe in the hands of those who now directed the public concerns, than it had been formerly in the hands of other rulers. There was a fact which filled his mind with alarm communicated to him, and that years ago, by a man whose mind was as pure as that of any human being that ever existed—a fact concerning the opinions as to what ought to have been the form of Government, and as to the theories of the gentleman who was most probably to be high in power in this country, which had made such an impression on him that he could not but at this moment view this project with increased horror and dread. He would, however, say no more of that at present; but, in his plain and humble conception, the public liberty was in danger; and here within these walls, within this sanctuary of American independence, it was that the public liberty was to be saved. It was here, by recurring to first principles, to that great principle, that free States should be jealous of military power, that he looked for its salvation. At a time when, under pretence of enforcing the embargo, an unconstitutional power was proposed to be placed in the hands of Executive officers, when an arbitrary power was to be exercised on mere suspicion, when with all this was combined a strong and overwhelming military force, he could not at such a period be silent. Yes, sir, I do in my soul and conscience believe that if ever there was a time when we should make a solemn pause and look around us, and survey our condition with a cool and calculating eye, this is the period; and I for one have not hesitated to give the alarm. I would place myself here, upon the ramparts of the Constitution, and give the alarm to the country. I would place myself here, on the signal-tower of the public liberty, and sound the tocsin of alarm to the nation. We can lose nothing by being jealous; by withdrawing enormous power from Executive agents. By a contrary conduct we may lose everything sacred without a hope of regaining it.

Mr. EPPES said there was no man who regretted more than himself that, at a period when the safety, honor, and independence of this country were assailed by external danger; when, under the pressure of a measure resorted to under circumstances of the most urgent necessity, the citizens of this country had manifested a feeling calculated to excite sensations here and elsewhere; that such a period should be seized by gentlemen not to exert their talents in steering the national bark through the billows by which it was surrounded, but in endeavoring to thwart every measure proposed. The gentleman from New York has told us that he will sound the tocsin of alarm to the people. And what is the project of the gentleman himself? Why, he has told you on a former day, openly, honestly, and fairly, that he is for a war with France; he is willing to pocket all the injuries which we have received from Great Britain, and to go to war with France. In vain would the gentleman sound the tocsin of alarm, if this is his project. The people of the United States would not go with him. It is not the sentiment of any portion of our citizens, except of the old Tories of our Revolution. He would not be followed by the American people in taking to his bosom a nation which has murdered your citizens, and making war upon a nation which has pillaged your commerce. I cannot reconcile the project with my ideas of moral principle. He would not be followed by the Federalists. I cannot believe that those who walked in procession after the body of the murdered Pierce, could stamp on themselves the character of base hypocrisy by taking to their bosom the nation which committed the outrage, while the blood of Pierce, and a host of other injuries more degrading, remain yet unatoned for. All our injuries remain unredressed; not the smallest apology has been made, but the feelings of the country not only disregarded, but insulted by new acts of violence and injustice. The gentleman's project to save the honor of the nation is submission to England and war with France. I pronounce with confidence it is not the sentiment of the American people. The gentleman from New York has taken occasion to introduce the name of WASHINGTON. The sentiments which that gentleman has expressed were never those of WASHINGTON. He never would have been willing to put chains on his countrymen, to consent to a shackled commerce; to allow foreign nations to say to his country, thus far you shall go and no farther. This is not the spirit of WASHINGTON; it is not the spirit which produced our Revolution; opposition to tyrants, and a manly assertion of our rights at every hazard, gave us our rank as an independent nation. The same spirit still pervades our country, and I trust it will ever remain. It never, however, has been the policy of this Government to rush rashly into war. The history of our country under former Administrations demonstrates this fact; and under the Administration of WASHINGTON, as well as under every other, we have borne with patience degrading insult and injury. As to the great regard of former Administrations for the personal rights of the citizen, on which the gentleman has dwelt, I shall not go into that part of the subject. In laying an embargo, even in the time of WASHINGTON, a short resolution was passed in which the power was vested, and the execution left to the Executive. This was thought at that time very Constitutional and proper, no doubt, by the Federalists. We, however, can frame no Constitutional law on this subject, although they could very constitutionally adopt the old maxim, "So I will it," and enforce their system. While, however, I am not disposed to excite unpleasant sensations by bringing into view acts of former Administrations, I believe that a statement of the course pursued under General WASHINGTON and Mr. Adams, as to foreign nations, will show that it never has been our policy to plunge rashly into war. I beg leave to read on this subject an extract from a speech delivered in 1803:

"Our differences with Great Britain were coeval with the Treaty of Peace. The detention of the Western posts was a direct violation of that treaty; it diverted a considerable portion of the fur trade from the United States, and disabled us from bridling the hostile Indians, which was a source of immense injury. This evil continued for twelve years, under every circumstance of aggravation and insult. British soldiers issued from those forts into parts of our territory, where we exercised jurisdiction, and seized the persons of deserters without the aid or sanction of the authorities of the country, and these possessions served as asylums for the savages who were in hostile array against us, and as storehouses and magazines to supply them with arms, ammunition, and provisions. The seat of Government of Upper Canada was also held for a time at Niagara, in the State of New York, an indignity of the most marked character. Many thousands of negroes were also carried off in violation of the treaty, and a very serious injury was thereby inflicted on the agricultural pursuits of the Southern citizens.

"It is well known that we were engaged in a bloody and expensive war with several of the Indian tribes; that two of our armies had been routed by them, and that we were finally compelled to make great efforts to turn the tide of victory. These Indians were encouraged and aided by the emissaries of Great Britain; British subjects were seen disguised fighting in their ranks, and British agents were known to furnish them with provisions and the implements of war. The Governor General of Canada, a highly confidential and distinguished officer, delivered a speech to the Seven Nations of Lower Canada, exciting them to enmity against this country; but in order to furnish the savages at war with sufficient aid, a detachment of British troops penetrated into our territory, and erected a fort on the Miami river. Here the Indians, dispersed and defeated by Wayne, took refuge, and were protected under the muzzle of British cannon. A violation of territory is one of the most flagrant injuries which can be offered to a nation, and would in most cases justify an immediate resort to arms, because in most cases essential to self-defence. Not content with exciting the savages of America against us, Great Britain extended her hostility to the Eastern Hemisphere, and let loose the barbarians of Africa upon us. A war existed at that time between Portugal and Algiers. The former blocked up the mouth of the Straits by her superior naval force, and prevented the pirates from a communication with the Atlantic. Portugal has been for a long time subservient to the views of Great Britain. A peace was effected through the mediation of the latter. Our unprotected merchantmen were then exposed, without defence, to the piracies of Algiers. Thus, in three-quarters of the globe, we at one time felt the effects of British enmity. In the meantime our commerce in every sea was exposed to her rapacity. All France was declared in a state of siege, and the conveyance of provisions expressly interdicted to neutrals. Paper blockades were substituted for actual ones, and the staple commodities of our country lay perishing in our storehouses, or were captured on the ocean, and diverted from the lawful proprietors. Our seamen were pressed wherever found. Our protections were a subject of derision, and opposition to the imperious mandates of their haughty tyrants was punished by famine or by stripes, by imprisonment or by the gibbet. To complete the full measure of our wrongs, the November orders of 1793 were issued; our ships were swept from the ocean, as if by the operation of enchantment; hundreds of them were captured; almost all our merchants were greatly injured, and many of them reduced to extreme poverty. These proceedings, without even a pretext, without the forms of justice, without the semblance of equity, were calculated to inflame every American feeling, and to nerve every American arm. Negotiation was, however, pursued; an envoy extraordinary, in every sense of the word, was sent to demand redress, and a Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, was formed and ratified. These events took place under the Administration of WASHINGTON. The Spanish Treaty, concluded on the 27th of October, 1795, stipulated for a settlement of boundaries, and an adjustment of spoliation on commerce, and contained a declaration of the free navigation of the Mississippi, and a grant of the privilege of deposit at New Orleans. This treaty for more than two years afterwards was not executed on the part of Spain. In January, 1798, a report was made to Mr. Adams, by Mr. Secretary Pickering, and submitted to Congress, which charged Spain with retaining her troops and garrisons within the United States, with evading to run the boundary line, with stopping, controlling, and regulating the passage of our citizens on the Mississippi, and with sending emissaries among the Indians residing within our territories, in violation of the treaty and the relations of amity. Here, then, a treaty securing the important benefit of deposit, was in a state of inexecution for a long period. Our citizens were also interrupted in the free navigation of the Mississippi, and other aggressions, affecting our territorial rights, and our internal peace, were superadded."

"An amicable explanation was had with Spain, and our wrongs were satisfactorily redressed. This took place in the Administration of Mr. Adams, and when most of the honorable gentlemen who support this war resolution, except such as were dangling in the Courts of Europe, held prominent stations in the councils of the country.

"Our differences with France were of a more serious nature, and of a longer duration. They commenced in the Administration of General WASHINGTON, and were adjusted in that of his successor. Great and enormous depredations were committed upon our commerce by France, and our merchants were fraudulently robbed of compensation for provisions supplied her in the hour of distress. The treaty and consular convention were violated. The right of embassy—a sacred right—respected even by the ferocious savage, was wantonly trampled upon; and the representative of our national sovereignty was refused a reception, and ignominiously ordered out of France. A fresh attempt at negotiation was made; three Ministers were sent, armed with all the powers, and clothed with all the honors of diplomacy. They were also refused a hearing, and were forced to leave the country without experiencing the forms of common civility. The treaty was then annulled, and reprisals directed; and when the honorable gentlemen and their friends, then in power, had worked up the passions of the nation to the highest pitch of exasperation; when war, bloody war, was expected from all quarters; when the war-worn soldiers of the Revolution were girding on their swords, and preparing to stand between their country and the danger that menaced her, the scene suddenly changed; the black cloud passed away; and we again beheld three Ministers at Paris extending the olive-branch, burying all animosities, and returning with a treaty of "firm, inviolable, and universal peace, and true and sincere friendship."

I have read this statement, sir, (said Mr. EPPES) because it is the deliberate and grave statement of a man arrived at that period of life, when he is not so much under the influence of passion. It is a statement of facts, which, if made by myself might be attributed to party feeling. It proves that it never has been the policy of this nation lightly to embark in war. And however the gentleman from New York and myself may differ in other respects, we unite in this: that no evil is so great as war, except a surrender of our independence; nothing short of an attack on which should induce any nation to resort to this alternative, injurious to every nation, but particularly so to ours.

So far then as we have progressed in our present situation; so far as the course pursued was calculated to preserve peace, it was a course which justice and humanity dictated, and which has been approved by the nation. But is there never to be an end to the sufferance of a nation? Is there no time when we shall act? The idea of a permanent embargo—and when on this part of the subject, I shall perhaps be told, as another gentleman was yesterday, that my observations resemble more the slang of an ale-house than the debate of a deliberative body—this idea, I observe is to be found only in the speeches of those who opposed the measure. Such an idea cannot be inferred from the conduct of members of this House, or from anything else which has occurred. It proceeds only from men who, from the first moment the measure was laid on your table, endeavored to place it in the most odious colors. Immediately after the measure was adopted last winter, what takes place, sir? A man distinguished by the favor of the people, a man advanced in years, the very man who in 1798, kept back the despatches from Mr. Adams, and had almost plunged us into a war with France by this act, what does he do? In 1808, he displays the same spirit of hostility to France, which he manifested in 1798; writes a letter in which he attributes the embargo to French influence, to the mandates of Bonaparte. [Mr. GARDENIER requested the gentleman from Virginia to name him.] Mr. EPPES. "General" PICKERING. [It appeared to be doubted whether Mr. EPPES was in order. Mr. SMITH said that if the gentleman from New York was permitted to criminate his own Government, a reply ought certainly to be allowed.] Mr. EPPES continued. I wish it to be understood by the Speaker and the House, that I hold myself responsible to any man who is injured by my observations. No circumstance shall deter me from expressing the truth in relation to our affairs. It is time that the nation should see the strange union of sentiment between gentlemen in opposition and that Government which has injured us most. I am responsible for my assertions. I have a right to discharge my duty in that way which I please, and in that way I will. I then say this letter proceeded from the man who in 1798 was willing, was anxious to involve the United States in a war with France. There was a party in this country in favor of it; and if correctly informed, the man who wrote this famous letter is at the head of that very party; a party connected and known under the name of the Essex Junto. This was the first stroke at the embargo; and what took place afterwards? I regret that a gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LIVERMORE) is not in his place, whose speech, as delivered to his constituents, was sent here some weeks before our last adjournment, said to have been delivered to the inhabitants of his district, in which he declared that Southern members of influence in the Republican party here had openly declared to him their hostility to commerce! The gentleman has had the candor to declare that he did not make to his constituents such a statement; but sir, it was circulated as his speech, immediately previous to the election, and although the gentleman never made such a speech, many people in Massachusetts believed that he had not only made the speech, but that it was a deliberate expression of his sentiments. These things justify the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. STORY,) that misrepresentations have been spread amongst the people. The Federal printers have united in giving currency to these misrepresentations. They have even made speeches for members of Congress; they have made them accuse the majority of Congress of being under French influence. A sentiment of this sort has been given in a speech of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GARDENIER,) though it is denied.

[Mr. GARDENIER said he never had expressed such an opinion; the speech which he had seen printed had not conveyed that idea. He never intended to express such an idea; for, however he differed in opinion with gentlemen, he never had the slightest suspicion that gentlemen were governed by dishonest motives. He should hold up their course as pernicious to the nation, and never would cease to do so, thus performing a Constitutional right, and a duty from which he would never shrink.]

It never has been my habit, continued Mr. ERSS, to attribute to gentlemen improper motives; I never have done so, but the course which has been pursued will give weight to the opinion already entertained in Great Britain that we are a divided people—that we are divided in opinion on what the gentleman from New York himself has called a self-evident proposition—that the belligerent decrees cannot be submitted to without a surrender of our rights, independence, and honor. Are we to be surprised that the people of Massachusetts, or of any other part of the United States, are agitated when they find men so enlightened as their Representatives in Congress telling them that this is to be a permanent system? Do gentlemen really believe that it is our intention to abide by the embargo until our injuries are redressed, be that soon or late? Do they believe that the embargo is all that is to be opposed to insult, injury, and blows? Do they believe that we are destitute of sense? I for one unequivocally deny that I ever had such an idea, or any person with whom I ever conversed on the subject, except the gentlemen who opposed it, to whom it was convenient to represent it as a permanent measure. And whatever gentlemen may say on other subjects, they will do me the justice to say that at the last session I told them my opinion, that the period would arrive when the embargo would be removed; and that when it was, there was no other course than war, open and direct, or submission. I defy gentlemen anywhere to find the embargo considered as a permanent measure, but in their own speeches and the prints of their party.

The circumstances which produced the embargo are well known; but the misfortune is that gentlemen will not state the question fairly, but cover it under a heap of lumber, calculated to conceal from the people the real question. Let the question be fairly put, and there is not a man in America (always excepting old Tories) who would not say that they will resist. What is the real state of our affairs—and I will not stop here to discuss who began first? If we mean to assert and maintain our rights, it is totally immaterial to us who commenced, though on this subject I might refer gentlemen to the letter of Mr. Hammond in 1793, in which he takes the ground now maintained, and asserts the right of Great Britain to blockade the whole of France. The statement of our situation is simply this: Great Britain says if you go to France or her dependencies without a license from her, your property shall be liable to seizure and condemnation. France says if you have visited Britain, or been visited by a Briton, your vessels shall be liable to seizure and confiscation. Now take the dependencies and allies of France and England, and what remains? Your commerce is as completely blockaded by these decrees, as the port of Boston was in the Revolutionary war; and when gentlemen come forward and tell you that your ships are routing in your ports, and the country suffering, and attribute this to the embargo, is it fair? Is it manly? Is it not an assertion materially variant from our present situation? I call upon any man, federalist, quid, or of what denomination he may be, to answer whether these decrees have not destroyed our commerce; and yet the destruction is imputed to the embargo. At the time the embargo was laid, our exports amounted to one hundred and eight millions annually. Taking all the countries with whom we could trade, throwing Great Britain out of the question, with whom I contend that no man can be willing to trade under existing circumstances, and our whole commerce does not amount to seven millions and a half—a commerce not equal to one half of the exports from Massachusetts alone; and give Massachusetts her relative share of one-fifth of this seven millions of commerce, and this is all she can have to support her seamen, to enrich her merchants, whom the embargo is said to have destroyed. This is the real situation of the country. Do the people of the Eastern portion of it know it? No, sir, it is kept from them; they cannot find it in the speeches of their Representatives. No, sir; there, it is all embargo, the favorite hobby-horse of Federalism.

Having thus attempted to show that it was not my intention when the embargo was laid, to consider it as a permanent measure, I will proceed to state some circumstances which have rendered this measure less operative than it would otherwise have been. The embargo had two objects, to gather in our capital, and to withhold supplies from our enemies. The first object has been completely answered, and there is not a period at which it would be more necessary to adhere to it than at the present moment. To withhold supplies from our enemies is now more important than ever. The nation must be put in a state to meet war.

It is in vain for gentlemen to attempt to delude the people. The decrees of England and France must be withdrawn, or we must fight; it cannot be avoided. We have declared we will not submit, and there is no species of effectual resistance but war.

We have a right to carry our produce to every place on the globe whose municipal regulations do not forbid it. France has a right to interdict our trade with herself, but none to interdict it with her enemy. Great Britain has a right to exclude us from her ports, but none to compel us to go there. What other course, I ask, can the United States take but war, or submission to these decrees? Let gentlemen examine the various proposals brought forward. It is immaterial whether we pass a law that we will reduce our trade to the places left by the decrees, or suffer it to be so reduced by the decrees themselves. In either case we submit; we allow foreign nations to fix the amount of our commerce, to destroy the fruits of our industry, and legislate for us.

Now, sir, I do not believe that there is a native American in any part of the United States who is disposed to submit; and I rejoice that in this House there is no division of sentiment. Gentlemen have publicly declared that they will not submit. In what form then will they resist? We have tried paper long enough. It is time either to exert the energies of the nation, or to give up our rights and again become the colonies of Great Britain. I am not for that. I have no other interest than that in land, by the produce of which I live. I would sooner let it go in the general wreck of my country than surrender those rights which are so important to the nation, and which our fathers purchased with their best blood. I am not for disgracing our ancestors who fled from oppression abroad; I am not for proving ourselves a base degenerate offspring. We possess a country of two thousand miles extent, a population of six millions of souls, and six hundred thousand men fit to bear arms. If with this we cannot preserve our independence, we deserve to be kicked out of the territories neck and heels by those Powers whom we have suffered to trample on our maritime rights.

In the course of my remarks, I have noticed the strange union of sentiment between gentlemen in the opposition and the British Ministry, on the subject of the embargo.

On this subject I will read an extract of a Ministerial pamphlet:

"Providence has ordained that nations, as well as individuals, should, in a certain degree, be dependent on each other; and the inhabitants of no country can be debarred from their accustomed commercial communications without being deprived of many advantages and enjoyments. Society being thus constituted, the Government that attacks the comfort and happiness of the people, by prohibiting this intercourse, alienates their affections, and consequently holds its authority by a very precarious tenure. When the late Emperor Paul entered into the confederacy against Great Britain, his subjects were at once reduced to severe and general distress. Their hemp, their flax, their tallow, their ashes, their iron, their timber, all their great staple commodities, for the sale of which they depended on British purchasers, were left a dead weight upon their hands. If the produce of the land becomes of no value, the landlord may apply to his tenant for rent in vain. If the vassal can procure no employment, he can pay nothing to his lord. Thus the nobles, whose revenue is derived from the rent of their estates, and the labor of their vassals, found themselves involved in the calamity of their inferiors; and were led by common interest to attempt that revolution which cost the Emperor his crown and his life.

"If any further elucidation of the principle to which this event is ascribed were wanting, it promises to be found in the United States of America, where the cultivators of the soil are deprived of the fruits of their labors, and the merchants of their commercial gains, by the present embargo. This forced state of things cannot be of long continuance. Already have the Vermontese set the constituted authorities at defiance, and persist in carrying on their trade with the Canadians across Lake Champlain, while the Northern States manifest strong symptoms of discontent."

Perhaps I ought to apologize to the Representatives from the State of Vermont for reading a clause speaking particularly of that State, but I assure the gentlemen that it is not my wish to bring the attention of the House to circumstances which have passed there. I view them with that deep regret with which I shall ever view a similar state of things in any portion of the country. I regret that any portion of the people of this country, however they may feel, should not manifest their feeling in that form prescribed by the Constitution and the laws.—We are told by this pamphlet, of true British origin, that the United States cannot stand this measure; and what are we told on this floor? "You cannot stand it; you are committing suicide on yourselves." All this goes to Great Britain; what I say never will reach it. All there seen of it will be a garbled statement in a Federal paper, which I could cover with my thumb, and that will be sent to Great Britain. Through this corrupted source their information is derived, and they know nothing of the real situation of American feeling, or of the American character. And is the Government to blame, when I declare to God that I have seen speeches attributed to me which I have never made—the most shameful misrepresentation made by men brought here, not for the purpose of reporting our proceedings to the nation, but for supporting party purposes. Gentlemen tell us we cannot stand a permanent embargo. We never intended it. Gentlemen well know that the rights of the nation cannot be abandoned without a struggle. The only question is when to commence it. Our resources will soon be at our command. Means of resistance are provided, and the period must soon arrive when nothing will be wanting but spirit on the part of the Representatives to use them. The people are with you; you have their support. Nothing can forfeit it but abandoning their rights. If by war only they can be maintained, the people will meet it with firmness. I never had any other feeling, but that these decrees must be withdrawn, or we must resort to war. I said so last year; I spoke it openly. My sentiments are known to the people I represent. They unite in that sentiment. It is the undivided sentiment of the State in which I live.

It has been said that the Southern people wish to destroy commerce. I will ask gentlemen what but commerce has produced our present difficulties? If I had consulted my interest only, of what importance to me was the carrying trade? None, sir; but it was, it ever will be, of infinite importance to me to support the principles of our Constitution. What are these principles? Equal and exact justice to every class of our citizens. United for common protection and for the general safety, the rights of no one class can be abandoned. The merchant has as good a right to protection in the use of his ship as the farmer in the use of his plough. I said so in 1805, and I say so still. Our situation, however, is now changed; it is no longer a commercial question; the late decrees and orders make a direct attack on the sovereignty of the nation; it is no longer a question whether we will trade, but whether we will maintain or surrender our independence. The embargo, at the time it was adopted, was, I believe, the best measure which could have been resorted to. Its operation was defeated partly by the misrepresentations of which I have spoken. While on this subject I will ask attention to another point, which I had nearly omitted. I have said something about Tories. I wish it to be understood, that I mean no gentleman in this House. I meant to state that the Tory principle had manifested itself in a portion of this country, and that it was that principle, in union with the agents and acts of the British Government, which produced the evasions of our law. Your towns swarm with these British agents, who send to their friends, what is essential to their prosperity, in violation of your law. Nay, sir, toryism in this country has, in one case, assumed a sort of official form. I refer to the proceedings of the Essex Junto. I hold them in my hand, and I will read a resolution from them. These patriots say—

“As to the Orders of Council. It will be recollected that these orders, bearing date 11th November, 1807, were occasioned by the decree of the French Emperor, dated November, 1806, declaring all the British dominions in a state of blockade. Great Britain may think these orders completely justified by the lex talionis, (law of retaliation.) There is no reason to consider them as originating from a disposition hostile to this country, and they ought not to be so considered. It is notorious that she could, according to known law and usage, plead the actual blockade, by her navy, of all the principal ports under the power of France.”

Now, sir, this I say is a rank Tory principle; and it is immaterial what may be the professions of men. The man who can say in the present situation of our country, that the conduct of Great Britain towards us is justified by the lex talionis, or by any other law, is a Tory. It is in vain for people in any portion of the Union to make professions of patriotism, when they come forward, and by a public act say, that we have no cause of complaint against Great Britain. I wish gentlemen correctly to understand me. If the British nation would come forward and make reparation for the insults offered in our ports and waters, she would stand with me on equal ground with France. But when I recollect that, instead of tendering reparation for the most humiliating insults and injuries, she sent here a legalized spy to insult us with insolent demands, I cannot consider, in point of injury done to this country, these two foreign nations as equal in the honorable career of injustice and violence towards us. Let Great Britain redress these injuries, and I would as soon tender the hand of reconciliation to her as to France.

I believe the principles of both are infamous. That in a contest for the empire of the world they regard only their own aggrandizement. It is the duty of the United States to take a firm and manly attitude, and oppose both; to maintain the independence of the nation, and spurn a foreign yoke. You must assert your rights; they cannot be maintained without men. The independence of our country is an object before which all differences as to the internal administration of our affairs should sink. This is a period when all honest men have a common interest. It is a period in which all party feelings should be sacrificed at the shrine of our country's good. It is a period when Federalists ought to forget that they have lost the helm of State, when the old Tories dispersed through our country should forget that we have acquired independence, and when all honest men should unite to maintain those rights which are the birthright of an American.

Mr. QUINCY.—I agree with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) that the present is a period in which it becomes the members of this Legislature to maintain their independence and not to shrink from responsibility. I agree, that it is a time in which all men in places of trust should weigh well the principles by which they are actuated, and the ends at which they aim; and that they should mark both so distinctly as that they may be fully understood by the people. But I hope it is not, and that there never will be a time in which it becomes the duty of any man or set of men, on this floor, under pretence of national exigencies, to concur in an infringement of the limits of the Constitution. I trust it is not a time for a member of such a Legislature as this, thoughtlessly to strengthen hands which already hold powers inconsistent with civil liberty, by a surrender of authority, especially intrusted to us by the people, into the exclusive possession of another department of the Government.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) alleges that the men whom he calls Federalists have, for party purposes, represented the embargo as a permanent measure. He disclaims such an idea, both on his own account and on that of a majority of this House. On this head, I am ready to maintain that the embargo law, as it was originally passed, was an abuse of the powers vested in this branch of the Legislature, and as it has been subsequently enforced by supplementary laws, is a manifest violation of the Constitution, and an assumption of powers vested in the States; and that, until I have some satisfaction on these points, I am not disposed to pass a law for raising such an additional military force as this bill contemplates.

Concerning the permanency of the embargo, about which so much wire-drawing ingenuity has been exercised, this I assert, that, so far as relates to the powers of this House, the embargo is permanent. That control over commerce, which the Constitution has vested in us, we have transferred to the Executive. Whether the people shall ever enjoy any commerce again, or whether we shall ever have any power in its regulation, depends not upon the will of this House, but upon the will of the President and of twelve members of the Senate. The manner in which the powers vested in this branch of the Legislature has been exercised, I hesitate not to declare a flagrant abuse of those powers and a violation of the most acknowledged safeguards of civil liberty.

Sir, what is the relation in which this House, in the eye of the Constitution, stands to the people? Is it not composed of men, emanating from the mass of the community? Are not our interests peculiarly identified with theirs? Is not this the place in which the people have a right naturally to look for the strongest struggle for our Constitutional privileges, and the last surrender of them unconditionally to the Executive? Is not the power to regulate commerce one of the most important of all the trusts reposed in us by the people? Yet, how have we exercised this most interesting power? Why, sir, we have so exercised it as not only to annihilate commerce, for the present, but so as that we can never, hereafter, have any commerce to regulate until the President and twelve Senators permit. Gentlemen when pressed upon the Constitutional point resulting from the permanent nature of this embargo, repel it as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) did just now, by a broad denial. "It is not permanent," say they. "It was never intended to be permanent." Yet it has every feature of permanency. It is impossible for terms to give it a more unlimited duration. With respect to intentions, the President and Senate have a right to speak on that subject. They have power to permit commerce again to be prosecuted, or to continue its prohibition. But, what right have we to talk in this manner? I know that we every day amuse ourselves in making some law about commerce. Sir, this is permitted. It is a part of the delusion by which we practise upon the people, and perhaps upon ourselves. While engaged in debate, we feel as if the power to regulate commerce was yet in this House. But, put this matter to the test; pass a law to-morrow unanimously repealing the embargo; let two-thirds of the Senate concur; let the President and twelve men determine not to repeal; I ask, is there any power in this House to prevent them from continuing this embargo forever? The fact is undeniable. Let the President and twelve men obstinately persist in adherence to this measure, and, in spite of the intentions of this House, the people can alone again obtain their commerce by a revolution. It follows, from what I have stated, that those may well enough talk about what they intend, who have the power of fulfilling their intentions; but, on that subject, it becomes the members of this House to be silent, since that power which we once possessed, has, by our own act, departed. So far as this House can ever hereafter enjoy the opportunity of again regulating commerce, it depends not upon the gift it received from the people, but upon the restoration to us of that power, which, the people having intrusted to our care, we have without limitation transferred to the Executive.

Yes, sir; the people once had a commerce. Once this House possessed the power to regulate it. Of all the grants in the Constitution, perhaps this was most highly prized by the people. It was truly the apple of their eye. To their concern for it, the Constitution almost owes its existence. They brought this, the object of their choice affections, and delivered it to the custody of this House, as a tender parent would deliver the hope of his declining years, with a trembling solicitude in its selected guardians. And how have we conducted in this sacred trust? Why, delivered it over to the care of twelve dry-nurses, concerning whose tempers we know nothing, for whose intentions we cannot vouch, and who, for anything we know, may, some of them, have an interest in destroying it.

Yes, sir; the people did intrust us with that great power—the regulation of commerce. It was their most precious jewel; richer than all the mines of Peru and Golconda. But we have sported with it, as though it were common dust. With a thoughtless indifference, in the dead of night, not under the cover of the cheering pinions of our eagle, but under the mortal shade of the bat's wing, we surrendered this rich deposit. It is gone; and we have nothing else to do than to beg back, at the footstool of the Executive, the people's patrimony. Sir, I know the answer which will, and it is the only one which can be given: "There is no fear of an improper use of this power by the President and Senate; there is no danger in trusting this most excellent man." Why, sir, this is the very slave's gibberish. What other reason could the cross-legged Turk, or the cringing Parisian, give for that implicit confidence they yield to their Sovereigns, except that it is impossible they should abuse their power?

The state of things I mention does not terminate in mere verbal precision or constructive distinctions. The very continuance of the measure, has, in my opinion, its root in the situation which results from this, as I deem it, abuse of our Constitutional powers. Does any man believe that, if the embargo had been originally limited, a bill continuing it could now be passed through all the branches? I know that gentlemen who originally voted for this embargo, and probably will for the enforcement of it, have urged the situation of this House, in relation to it, as a reason for further adherence. "It is a measure of the Executive," say they. "Suppose this House should pass a law repealing it? Should he negative, what effect would result but to show distracted councils? In the present situation of our country, nothing is so desirable as unanimity." I know that, substantially, such arguments have been urged.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON wished the gentleman to name the persons to whom he alluded.

Mr. QUINCY said that he did not deem himself bound to state names connected with facts, by which he had acquired the knowledge of particular dispositions in the House. It was enough for him to state them, and to leave the nation to judge if there were, under the circumstances, anything improbable or unnatural in them.

Mr. NICHOLAS called the gentleman from Massachusetts to order. He regretted to say that, throughout the whole session, there had been a total departure from the idea which he had of order. When it was attempted to palm upon those with whom he acted opinions which all must disclaim, he was compelled to object to the disorderly course pursued.

Mr. QUINCY said that he had no intention to palm upon any gentlemen sentiments which they disavowed. He did not suppose that the gentlemen who entertained such sentiments would disavow them. He said he certainly should not mention names. He did not think that the argument derived any strength from the fact that such expressions had been used, by any gentleman. They are natural and inevitable from the situation in which gentlemen are placed in relation to the Executive. Men, willing to take off the embargo, yet not willing to counteract the system of the President, were necessitated to adopt such reasoning as this. It was unavoidable when they came to reflect upon the powers which remained to this House in relation to the repeal of this law.

Mr. NICHOLAS required that the gentleman should observe order.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said that, as the gentleman had made a reflection on members in the majority, he must be permitted to observe, that he utterly disclaimed any such opinion as the gentleman had indiscriminately charged upon the majority.

Mr. QUINCY said that he had made no such indiscriminate charge on the majority. An attempt had been made to give the discussion a turn which he neither anticipated nor intended.

I understand, said Mr. Q., the cause of this interruption. It is not the fact intimated, but the force of the argument stated, which startles gentlemen from their seats. They like not to hear the truth elucidated, concerning their abuse of power, intrusted to them by the people. In reply to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) who alleged that, for party purposes, the embargo had been represented permanent, I undertook to show that, so far as respects this House, it was, to all intents, permanent. This is the insupportable position. The embargo—

Mr. J. G. JACKSON called Mr. QUINCY to order. This disorder, he said, had progressed too long. There had not only been disorder on the floor of the House, but in the galleries, and from British subjects, too, which had interrupted the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) while he had been speaking, a few moments ago. It was not in order to discuss the subject of the embargo on this question. Everything which presented itself to the House was made a question of embargo. It was the watchword of the day.

The SPEAKER requested Mr. QUINCY to take his seat, and asked Mr. JACKSON to put down in writing the words to which he objected.

Mr. JACKSON said he could not specify particular words to which he had objected, unless, indeed, he were to include the gentleman's whole speech. He wished, however, to know of the Speaker, is it in order, on a question for raising volunteer troops, to discuss the constitutionality of the embargo?

The SPEAKER observed that a very wide range had been taken in debate, and that, excluding personal matter, the gentleman was in order to reply to observations to other gentlemen.

Mr. QUINCY said that he had been drawn unexpectedly into this course of debate, by following the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES.) He said he wished to lay before the House and the nation—

Mr. EPPES said that he had said nothing concerning the supplementary embargo law now before the House, which he conceived the gentleman was about to introduce into the discussion. He hoped the gentleman would suspend his observations upon the subject until it came before the House. When, notwithstanding all the clamor on the subject, it would be found that there was not a provision contained in it which was not to be found in the present revenue laws.

Mr. QUINCY said he was not about to bring the supplementary embargo bill into debate. The gentleman had asserted that the embargo law was not permanent; that the Constitution had not been violated. He had taken the gentleman upon that ground. And the course of his observations had been to prove that the embargo was permanent, so far as respected the powers of this House to repeal, and that the Constitution had been violated.

Mr. EPPES said that he had not said that the Constitution had not been violated.

Mr. QUINCY said that he had no particular inclination to speak at that moment, and if gentlemen did not wish to hear—

Mr. EPPES said he had no objection to hear the gentleman state any violations of the Constitution, and he should take the privilege of a member to answer them, if they were plausible.

Mr. MASTERS made some observations upon the point of order; and as the House was rather in a state of agitation, moved to adjourn. Mr. QUINCY having given way for the purpose; negatived—ayes 22.

Mr. QUINCY.—Notwithstanding all the interruptions I have experienced, my observations have been perfectly in order. The reason I am opposed to the resolution, is, that the force proposed to be raised is, in my opinion, intended not to meet a foreign enemy, but to enforce the embargo laws. Now, is it not the most pertinent and strongest of all arguments against the adoption of such a resolution, to prove that the powers of the Executive, in these respects, already transcend the limits of the Constitution, and that these laws, proposed to be thus enforced, are open violations of it? Considering, however, the temper of the House, I shall limit myself to the statement and elucidation of a single position. And the argument I shall offer will be only in outline. I will not enter into the wide field which the greatness of the question naturally opens. I know that, as soon as my position is stated, gentlemen advocating the present measures will be ready to exclaim, it is a small objection. But I warn gentlemen, that, small as it may appear to them, if the principle receive the sanction of the people and the support of the State Legislatures, there is an end of this destructive system of embargo.

The position I take, and which I mean to maintain, is, that those provisions of the embargo laws which assume to regulate the coasting trade between ports and ports of the same State, are gross invasions of the rights of the States, and palpable grasps of power beyond the limits of the Constitution. I ask the attention of the House to a very short argument upon this subject. I present it, not by way of erimination, but as worthy of its consideration and examination. I feel no passions on the question. If any have been exhibited by me they were caught at the flame enkindled by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES.)

The powers granted to Congress, in relation to commerce, are contained in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, in these words:

“The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.”

The particular power to which I object as being assumed, if granted at all, is contained within the terms “commerce among the several States.” In reference to which, I ask this question, Can the grant of a power to regulate commerce among the States, by any fair construction, be made to include a power to regulate commerce within a State? It is a simple question. The strength and certainty of the conclusion results from its simplicity. There is no need of any refined argument to arrive at conviction. It is a plain appeal to the common sense of the people. To that common sense, which, on most practical subjects, is a much surer guide than all the reasoning of the learned. It is scarcely possible there can be but one answer to this question. To bring the subject more directly into the course of the reasonings of common life, suppose that ten householders who live in a neighborhood should agree upon a tribunal which should possess powers to regulate commerce or intercourse among their houses; could such an authority be fairly extended to the regulation of the intercourse of the members of their families within their respective houses? Under a grant of power like this, would such a tribunal have the right to regulate the intercourse between room and room within each dwelling-house? It is impossible. Nothing can be plainer. The General Government has no color for interference with the interior commerce of each State, let it be carried on by water or by land. The regulation of the commerce between ports and ports of the same State belongs exclusively to the States respectively.

In further support of this position, a strong argument results from the ninth section of the first article:

“No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.”

In this clause of the Constitution the people restrict the general power over commerce granted to Congress. And to what objects do these restrictions apply? To exports from a State; to preferences of the ports of one State over those of another; to vessels bound to or from one State in another. Not one word of restriction of the powers of Congress touching that great portion of commerce between ports and ports of the same State. Now, can anything be more conclusive that the general power of regulating commerce did not, in the opinion of the people, include the right to regulate commerce between ports and ports of the same State, than this fact, that they have not thought it necessary even to enumerate it among these restrictions? If it were included in the grant of the general power, can a reason be shown why it was not, as well as others, included within these restrictions? That it is not provided for among these restrictions, is perfect conviction, to my mind, that it was never included in the general power. A contrary doctrine leads to this monstrous absurdity, that Congress, which, in consequence of these Constitutional restrictions, can neither grant any preference to the ports of one State over those of another State, nor oblige vessels to enter, clear, or pay duties when bound to or from the ports of one State in another, yet that it may grant preferences to the ports of one State over ports in the same State, and may oblige vessels to enter, clear, and pay duties, when bound from port to port within the same State. This enormous consequence is inevitable. The conclusion, therefore, to my mind, is perfectly clear, that the reason why the people did not restrict the abuse of this species of power was, that the power itself was not granted to Congress.

I shall state only one other corroborative argument, drawn from another part of the Constitution. By the second clause of the tenth section and first article, it is provided that, "no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary, for executing its inspection laws," &c. Now, can it for one moment be admitted that, in consequence of this restriction, the individual States are prohibited from laying transit duties on articles passing from port to port within their State limits? Can the States lay no toll upon ferries across their rivers; no tax upon vessels plying up and down their rivers, or across their bays? May not the State of New York impose a duty upon vessels going from Hudson or Albany to New York? Yet, if it be true that the general power of regulating commerce among the States, includes the power of regulating commerce between ports and ports of the same State, all this great branch of State prerogative is absolutely gone from the individual States. A construction of the Constitution, in which, if realized by the people, and the Legislature of the States, in all its consequences, they never can acquiesce. The language of this clause is in strict consonance with that construction of the Constitution, for which I contend. It strongly and conclusively, to my mind, implies that the general power does not include the power to regulate commerce between ports and ports of the same State. The language of this clause is, "no State shall lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports." These terms "imports and exports" are exclusively appropriate to duties upon goods, passing into a State or passing out of a State, and can never be made, by any fair construction, to extend to duties upon goods passing wholly within the limits of a State. On goods in this situation—that is, on goods passing between ports and ports of the same State, the individual States have, notwithstanding this restriction in the Constitution, the power to lay transit duties. Of consequence the regulation of this branch of trade is not included in the grant to Congress of the general power over commerce among the States.

This is the point of view which I take in this matter, of the limits of the Constitution. On this ground it is, that I asserted that the rights of the States have been invaded in your embargo laws, and that this Legislature has grasped a power not given to it by the Constitution. And, so far as the liberties of this people are dependent upon the preservation of the State and National authorities, in their respective orbits, I hesitate not to declare the embargo laws a manifest infringement of those liberties.

On a question of this magnitude, I cannot condescend to inquire whether, in the early revenue laws, any regulations were made affecting this particular branch of trade? A practice in direct violation of the Constitution can have no binding force. Violations of the Constitution, touching only a few solitary individuals, small in amount, or in inconvenience, may, for a long period, be submitted to without a struggle or a murmur. When the extension of the principle begins to affect whole classes of the community, the interest of the nation claims a solemn and satisfactory decision. The truth is, I can find but a single attempt, in all your revenue laws, contrary to the construction for which I contend. In the case of carrying distilled spirits or imported goods of a specified amount from port to port within a State, the master is obliged to make a manifest and take an oath that the duties have been paid. The infringement of the Constitution was, in this instance, and in its immediate consequences, so trifling that it has passed without notice, and been submitted to without a question. But, surely, on the silent acquiescence of the people in such a practice as this, can never be built the fabric of so enormous a power as your embargo laws attempt to exercise.

Gentlemen say the embargo is brought into view on all occasions. Certainly, sir, it is connected with nearly all national questions. I have no objection to voting for fifty thousand men, if I can be informed to what use they are to be applied. Let me only understand the system proposed. Is it intended to repeal the embargo, and go to war? Or are those men only intended to enforce it? If the former, I have no objection to any requisite army. If the latter, I am in direct hostility to this proposition. Deeming the embargo laws unconstitutional, and powers vested in the Executive which ought never to have passed out of the possession of this House, I will never acquiesce in augmentation of the military, until I am satisfied that the system is not to support by it still further the violations of this Constitution.

Mr. MACON said that he was opposed to this resolution in its present form. He did not know that men might not be necessary; but he wished them, if regular troops, or of whatever kind, to be distinguished by their proper name. He moved to strike out the words "fifty thousand," so as to leave the resolution blank.

Negatived—47 to 47; the Speaker declaring himself in the negative.

Mr. MACON also moved to strike out "two," the term of service for which the troops were to be raised. Carried—52 to 49.

The question on the resolution was then decided by yeas and nays—yeas 76, nays 34, as follows:

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee on the Military and Naval Establishments do prepare and bring in the same.

SATURDAY, December 31.

An engrossed bill to authorize the transmission of certain documents by the mail, free of postage, was read the third time, and passed.

MR. MACON, one of the members for the State of North Carolina, presented to the House sundry resolutions of the Legislature of the said State, relative to the present state of affairs between the United States and the belligerent Powers of Europe, and expressive of their determination to support such measures as Congress in their wisdom may adopt for the honor, safety, and independence, of the United States.—Ordered to lie on the table.

MR. WHARTON, from the committee appointed on the thirteenth instant, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act establishing Circuit Courts, and abridging the jurisdiction of the District Courts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio,'" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

MR. DANA, from the committee appointed on the twentieth instant, presented a bill concerning associations for the security of navigation; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House took up for consideration the amendment of the Senate to the bill for employing additional revenue cutters. The amendment proposes to strike out "twelve," and insert "three." After some observations from Messrs. NEWTON, TAYLOR, and STORY, the House refused to concur—yeas 76.

DISABLED SOLDIERS.

MR. NELSON observed that this was the last day of the year 1808. For many years past our old soldiers had been applying for relief. He thought it would be a meritorious thing to begin the new year with a just and generous act. He therefore asked for the order of the day on the bill for the relief of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army and of the present Army of the United States.

[This bill contemplates the establishment of an invalid corps.]

The bill was taken up, went through a Committee of the Whole without an objection, and was reported to the House. Several amendments were then made to the bill.

After considerable discussion on the details, in which no hostility appeared to be expressed to the principles of the bill, a motion made by MR. BLOUNT to recommit it for the purpose of adjusting the details, was carried—58 to 25.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

MR. RHEA, of Tennessee, said he intended to offer a resolution for consideration, but he thought it might be proper to make some preliminary observations. Since the commencement of this session of Congress, said MR. R., several resolutions respecting the commerce of the United States have been submitted to the consideration of this House. These several resolutions contain separate and distinct points of commercial regulation. They have no common centre to which they all may gravitate. They have no common governing principle of discrimination. All foreign nations, favorable or unfavorable, are equally involved. The second resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, embraces a principle deserving consideration; it is expressed in the words following: "having 'in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States.'" This is the grand discriminating principle to which all commercial regulations of the United States ought to gravitate as a common centre. All commercial nations are individuals of the same family, and, that peace might be preserved, it is greatly to be desired that they had a system of commercial law providing for the common interest and reciprocal benefit of all. The commerce of a nation consists of two parts: exportation and importation. These two ought, in their relation to foreign nations, to be commensurate. If any nation or nations, unmindful of friendly and mutually beneficial commercial intercourse, will make restrictions violating the lawful commerce and rights of any other commercial nation, what commercial regulations soever the injured nation may think proper to make ought not, in justice, to affect commercial intercourse with any nation or nations other than that one or those who have begun and do persevere in the work of commercial rapacity and destruction. The orders and decrees of Great Britain and France violate the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States. Any regulations or restrictions made by the United States to save their commerce from destruction, and to meet the operation of the same orders and decrees, and of all such orders or decrees of any other Power, ought, in justice, to be commensurate, equally extensive, and to comprehend all nations having in force such orders or decrees.

The resolution which I intend to submit, said Mr. R., has in view to establish a principle of discrimination just in itself and universally reciprocal. If there be any sovereign, independent Power, nation, or people, who has not, or may not have in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce and rights of the United States, that Sovereign, independent Power, nation, or people, ought not to be included and comprehended in any such commercial regulation adopted by the United States. That Power, nation, or people, if any such there be, or hereafter shall be—being an individual of the great commercial family—has a right to the benefit and advantage of commercial intercourse with the United States; and the United States have an equal right of a free, unmolested, commercial intercourse with such Power, nation, or people, which other nations, at war with each other, have a right to interrupt by retaliating orders or decrees.

Mr. R. then offered the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole to which the non-importation bill is referred:

Resolved, That it is expedient to interdict, by law, all commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies, and all other Powers having in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States."

DIVISION OF THE INDIANA TERRITORY.

Mr. THOMAS, from the committee appointed on the thirteenth instant, to inquire into the expediency of dividing the Indiana Territory, made a report thereon; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The report is as follows:

That, by the fifth article of the ordinance of Congress for the government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, it is stipulated that there shall be formed in the said Territory no less than three, nor more than five States; and the boundaries of the States, as soon as Virginia shall alter her act of cession, and consent to the same, shall become fixed and established, as follows:

The Western State shall be bounded by the Mississippi, the Ohio, and Wabash rivers; a direct line drawn from the Wabash and Post Vincennes, due north, to the Territorial line between the United States and Canada, and by the said Territorial line to the Lake of the Woods and Mississippi.

The middle State shall be bounded by the said direct line, the Wabash, from Post Vincennes, to the Ohio; by the Ohio, by a direct line drawn due north from the mouth of the Great Miami, to the said Territorial line, and by the said Territorial line.

The Eastern State shall be bounded by the last-mentioned direct line, the Ohio, Pennsylvania, and the said Territorial line: Provided, however, and it is further understood and declared, that the boundaries of these three States shall be subject so far to be altered, that if Congress shall hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two States in that part of the said Territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan. And whenever any of the said States shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted by its delegates into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government: Provided, the constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and, so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the Confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period, and when there shall be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than sixty thousand.

By the aforesaid article, it appears to your committee that the line fixed as the boundary of the States to be formed in the Indiana Territory is unalterable, unless by common consent; that the line of demarcation, which the Wabash affords between the eastern and western portion of said Territory, added to the wide extent of wilderness country which separates the population in each, constitute reasons in favor of a division, founded on the soundest policy, and conformable with the natural situation of the country. The vast distance from the settlements of the Wabash to the present seat of Territorial government, renders the administration of justice burdensome and expensive to them in the highest degree. The superior courts of the Territory are, by law, established at Vincennes; at which place suitors, residing in every part of the Territory, are compelled to attend with their witnesses, which, to those who reside west of the Wabash, amounts almost to a total denial of justice. The great difficulty of traveling through an extensive and loathsome wilderness, the want of food and other necessary accommodations on the road, often presents an insurmountable barrier to the attendance of witnesses; and, even when their attendance is obtained, the accumulated expense of prosecuting suits where the evidence is at so remote a distance, is a cause of much embarrassment to a due and impartial distribution of justice, and a proper execution of the laws for the redress of private wrongs.

In addition to the above considerations, your committee conceive that the scattered situation of the settlements over this extensive Territory cannot fail to enervate the powers of the Executive, and render it almost impossible to keep that part of the Government in order.

It further appears to your committee, that a division of the said Territory will become a matter of right under the aforesaid article of the ordinance, whenever the General Government shall establish therein a State government; and the numerous inconveniences which would be removed by an immediate separation, would have a direct tendency to encourage and accelerate migration to each district, and thereby give additional strength and security to those outposts of the United States, exposed to the inroads of a savage neighbor, on whose friendly dispositions no permanent reliance can be placed.

Your committee have no certain data on which to ascertain the number of inhabitants in each section of the Territory; but, from the most accurate information they are enabled to collect, it appears that west of the Wabash there are about the number of eleven thousand, and east of said river about the number of seventeen thousand, and that the population of each section is in a state of rapid increase.

Your committee, after maturely considering this subject, are of opinion that there exists but one objection to the establishment of a separate Territorial government west of the river Wabash, and that objection is based on the additional expense which would, in consequence thereof, be incurred by the Government of the United States. But, it is also worthy of observation, that the increased value of the public lands in each district, arising from the public institutions which would be permanently fixed in each, to comport with the convenience of the inhabitants, and the augmentation of emigrants, all of whom must become immediate purchasers of these lands, would far exceed the amount of expenditure produced by the contemplated temporary government.

And your committee, being convinced that it is the wish of a large majority of the citizens of the said Territory that a separation thereof should take place, deem it always just and wise policy to grant to every portion of the people of the Union that form of government which is the object of their wishes, when not incompatible with the Constitution of the United States, nor subversive of their allegiance to the national sovereignty.

Your committee, therefore, respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to divide the Indiana Territory, and to establish a separate Territorial government west of the river Wabash, agreeably to the ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, passed on the 13th day of July, 1787.

Mr. THOMAS, from the same committee, presented a bill for dividing the Indiana Territory into two separate governments; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

A motion was made by Mr. WINN, that when this House adjourns, it will adjourn until Tuesday morning eleven o'clock: And the question being taken thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 60, nays 45.

TUESDAY, January 3, 1809.

MILITIA SYSTEM.

Mr. MACON from the Committee on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the amendment of the militia laws of the United States, reported that having carefully examined the system they are of opinion that no amendment is necessary.

The House having agreed to consider the report, Mr. MACON observed that he had not concurred in opinion with the committee, and therefore intended to make a motion to commit the report with special instructions to report a bill for classing and arming the militia. If the report were to be agreed to, it would foreclose any proposition on the subject during the session. The plan which he would propose for classing the militia would not go to destroy the present organization of the militia; but merely to class them according to age, so that young men should first be called into service. It was a rare thing that old men and young men accorded well together. Old men could not bear fatigue as well as young men. He wished not to see fathers and their sons in the ranks together. He believed that were such a plan to be adopted, from thirty to forty thousand men would annually be added to the lists; the arming of whom would cost from four to five hundred thousand dollars annually. In the course of four or five years all the men in the first class would be armed for duty, and be competent to repel any enemy. It was the only mode which united great utility with great economy. He had before him a statement made the last year by a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. CLAY.) The observations of that gentleman, he said, were well remembered by the House, and he could add nothing to them. They proved that a large corps would always be ready for service, and that the number would daily increase. Having premised thus much, he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report, &c., be recommitted to the select committee, and that they be instructed to report a bill to class the militia according to age, and to provide for arming such as may hereafter be placed on the militia list at the public expense.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS hoped no objection would be made to this resolution; for its adoption would commit no gentleman on the principle involved in it.

Mr. DESHA wished a division of the resolution, as he was opposed to the first and in favor of the second clause.

A motion was now made to refer the report to a Committee of the Whole, and carried. Some debate took place on this motion, in which Messrs. LYON, MACON, NELSON and CLAY, appeared to be in favor of the principle, and Messrs. STURGEON, DURELL, and TALLMADGE, against it. It was made the order of the day for to-morrow.

ENFORCING THE EMBARGO.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, 52 to 39, on the bill from the Senate for enforcing and making more effectual the several embargo laws, with the amendments reported by a select committee of this House.

The amendments reported by the select committee were severally agreed to.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, after a few prefatory observations, expressive of an opinion that the embargo should be repealed so soon as could be consistently with the passing other acts, and giving equal notice to all our merchants, offered the following, as a new section to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That the said act entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels within the ports and harbors of the United States,' and the several acts supplementary thereto, be repealed from and after the fourth day of March next."

The CHAIRMAN observed, that although he individually believed this motion to be in order, the House had twice successively decided a similar proposition to be out of order the other day, because the subject was already before a special Committee of the Whole; and he felt himself bound to abide by their decision.

Mr. GARDENIER appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The Committee confirmed the decision of the Chair.

A motion was made by Mr. ELLIOT that the Committee rise and report progress.—Negatived.

Mr. JACKSON moved that the Committee rise and report the bill as amended.

Mr. ELLIOT commenced a continuation of his speech which he commenced a few days ago. After Mr. ELLIOT had spoken about five minutes, it appearing that a quorum was not present—

Mr. DANA suggested the propriety of the Committee's rising and reporting "that there was no quorum."

Mr. MACON had no wish to sit here whilst gentlemen were gone to their dinners; and moved that the Committee rise and report progress.

Mr. MOSELY said it was an old maxim that "dulce et decorum est pro patria mori;" but he had no idea of starving to death for it.

The Committee rose, ayes 60, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 4.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill conferring certain power, relative to roads and bridges, on the Levy Court for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the amendments proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds, in certain cases, and for other purposes," with amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, and marines," with amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers,' with amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. BOYLE offered the following resolution, observing that the subject had been before the House several times, but a solemn decision had never been had on the subject, and those who had witnessed the mode of disposing of land on credit, had seen the ill effects of the present system:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the price of public lands, and abolishing the credit on sales thereof; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was agreed to.

DISTRESSED SEAMEN.

Mr. NEWTON offered a resolution, directing the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures to inquire into the propriety of providing for the relief of distressed and disabled seamen.

Mr. N. stated that he had been induced to propose the resolution from the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 20, 1808.

SIR: Whilst the fund for supporting sick and disabled seamen has, during this year, been considerably diminished, the expenses are actually increasing. For the fund, consisting of the deduction of twenty-cents per month from the wages of seamen, must necessarily decrease in the same ratio as the number of seamen actually employed; and, on the other hand, the number itself of those who are confined at home and deprived of employment, produces an increase of applications for relief.

All that had, by frugality in the expenditure, been saved during the former years, will be inadequate to supply the deficiency of the ensuing year, unless orders be immediately given to reduce, by some general and harsh rules, the number of persons heretofore admitted. I cannot believe that this would be consistent with the intention of the Legislature, and think it my duty to state the facts, in order that a proper remedy may be applied.

Upon due consideration of the subject, it appears to me that the most simple and equitable plan would be to appropriate for the year 1809, in aid of the fund, an additional sum of about two hundred thousand dollars; such sum to be applied as the fund itself, under the general directions of the President, but to be expended in the several ports in proportion to the amount actually collected in each on that account during the year 1807, and to be applicable to the relief, not only of sick and disabled, but also of distressed seamen.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
ALBERT GALLATIN.

T. NEWTON, Esq., Chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The resolution was agreed to without opposition.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. STORY said that if the House did not wish to be considered as slumbering at their posts, it was proper that they should, after determining that they would not submit to the orders and decrees of the belligerents, adopt some efficient system of warfare, if war must be the result. On this point he was decidedly of opinion that we could carry on operations to great advantage on the ocean. He held in his hand a resolution for inquiring into the propriety of augmenting our naval force, which he submitted to the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our Military and Naval Establishments, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing our Naval Establishment, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS asked of the gentleman, against whom was this force to be applied? He presumed, as the gentleman appeared to have his mind so fully made up on the subject, that he had made the necessary calculations, and would favor the House with them. For his part, Mr. W. said, if we were to go to war to-morrow, he would not vote a single additional floating gun. What had been the consequence of augmentations of naval force in other countries? Were they not perpetually augmenting the British navy? The Ministry would give but a small premium to insure the gentleman's augmentation, should it be made, a safe berth in their ports. Did the gentleman wish to follow the example of Denmark, and have our towns Copenhagened?

Mr. GARDNER observed that a bill for putting our present Navy into service was already before the House. He should prefer first acting on that, and therefore moved that this resolution lie on the table.

Mr. STORY hoped this course would not be given to his motion; for it might be perfectly proper not to order the whole naval force to be put into actual service, and yet it might be very proper to prepare an additional naval force. We were not at present at war, but we soon might be. The gentleman from South Carolina had supposed that any augmentation of our naval force must fall a sacrifice to the British navy. Mr. S. said he could not so much doubt the courage or character of his countrymen, as to feel as the gentleman did. I was born among the hardy sons of the ocean. They will never be guilty of a dereliction of their duty or their country's rights. They never will submit. If Great Britain ever obtains possession of our present little establishment, it must be at an expense of the best blood of the country, and after a struggle which would call for more of her strength than she had ever found necessary for an European enemy. He said he did not wish our naval force to be increased for offensive measures; but it had appeared to him, that the only force which could effectually protect our seacoast was a naval force. He wished a few vessels of war to co-operate with our fortifications. Such a force, too, with the known bravery of American seamen, would carry dismay wherever it went. The passage of this resolution would not decide the principle; it was barely for inquiry. Would not gentlemen inquire whether an increase of the naval force might not be proper? Would they hold out the language that they would permit the scene of the Chesapeake to be acted over again with impunity? That they would still remain on land? Mr. S. said he could not believe that the gentleman from South Carolina wished to see this game played again. He hoped that we would prepare a force to protect us against every foe. The naval establishments of European nations must be always maintained at an expense double of the proportionate expense which would be incurred in this country. He asked the gentleman from South Carolina if we had fifty fast sailing frigates, whether the British nation would send an armament sufficiently powerful to endanger them? Mr. S. said that we knew perfectly well the importance which they attach to their naval establishment. The thunder which rolled over their heads in terror was only that from floating batteries on the water. Believing that whenever we have war it must be carried on at sea as well as on land, he was in favor of increasing our naval force.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said that the gentleman must excuse him for saying that he had pursued the Eastern mode of propounding other questions instead of answering those which had been put to him. He said he had meant no reflection on the hardy sons of Neptune; he believed them to be as courageous as the gentleman had represented them: The gentleman talks of fifty fast sailing frigates; is it possible that any man in the nation can suppose that its safety depends upon fifty fast sailing frigates? They must, if sent out, either carry orders not to fight, or become what the Chesapeake has been—a disgrace to us. I feel regret that such is our situation, and I have no other consolation than the state of the nation. Yes, sir, it is a mortification to me that the British Minister here has said, and perhaps to members of this House, that if fifty sail of the line were built they would soon be taken from us. We cannot command resources for such establishments. Will gentlemen consider that our greatest annual revenue never amounted to seventeen millions of dollars? I ask, then, where are we to get money for the support of such immense establishments. Mr. W. said it was on the shore that he would risk the salvation of his country; and of an invading foe there would not, he trusted, a single man escape to tell the fate of his comrades. Indeed he should tremble for his country, if he thought its salvation depended on floating batteries.

Mr. NICHOLAS said there appeared to be a difference of opinion among gentlemen as to the mode of preparing for action. It was unquestionably necessary, he observed, that the House should come to some decision on the subject. Gentlemen who were in favor of naval force, when that question was fairly decided in the negative, would no doubt give up all idea of that force, and join those in the majority in voting for that force which they deemed necessary. I do not, will not believe, said Mr. N., that a difference of opinion as to the species of preparation to be made will prevent us from making any. Until some decision be made we shall be perpetually embarrassed in this way. I have not made up my opinion on this subject; but I am inclined to believe that in the event of a war we can do but little on water. I think it important, however, that the thing should be settled and not procrastinated. This question should be met and decided. I do not believe I say too much when I say that I believe war to be inevitable. I say this upon the presumption that I am warranted in believing that it is the determination of this House and the nation to resist, as long as a man remains of us, the edicts of Great Britain and France. Having made this determination, what is our duty under the present aspect of our affairs, when it does not appear that either of these nations will recede? To prepare to meet the crisis as men determined to resist effectually. Shall we do this as long as we divide as to the means to be employed? We shall not, sir. Mr. N. expressed a hope that gentlemen who thought land force the best, would, if it should not be agreed to by a majority, consent to employ naval force; and that, under similar circumstances, those in favor of naval force would consent to employ land forces. It was of the utmost importance that they should come to an understanding on the subject. If out-voted in the force which was best in his opinion, he would cordially assist in preparing the other species. He said he was for offence, not for defence merely, when thus vitally assailed. He hoped the House would at once settle the mode, and commence the work of preparation.

Mr. LYON said that it was well known that he had never been inimical to a naval force. The rule which he had laid down to himself had been to give a great share of the revenue derived from commerce to the protection of commerce. He had never entertained the idea of manning a fleet for the purpose of defying Great Britain on the ocean. He had wished to give that share of the proceeds of the commerce of the nation to its protection which should be deemed necessary. He said that sending out a navy with a view to meet that of Great Britain on the ocean, would indeed be a Quixotic expedition. He had always thought that this nation would be justifiable alone in defensive war. He would forever maintain the right to govern ourselves on land, and on the ocean, too, if he thought there was any probability of succeeding in such a contest. He censured the propensity displayed by gentlemen for making partial preparations, and wished to see a whole system at once.

The question on ordering Mr. STORY's proposition to lie on the table was carried—47 to 38.

THE EMBARGO.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT observed that it was impossible for the House to get along with business until the question of repeal or continuance of the embargo was decided. He, therefore, called for the order of the day on Mr. CHITTENDEN's resolution for the immediate repeal of the embargo.

Mr. BACON made a motion which superseded this motion, viz: to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of it, and to refer it to the Committee of the Whole to whom was referred the bill on the subject of non-intercourse.

After a debate of near three hours, this motion was negatived—yeas 23, nays 91.

The debate was desultory in the extreme, including questions of order, &c., and the decision of the question appeared to involve no principle. Messrs. GARDNER, DANA, CHITTENDEN, QUINCY, UPHAM, LYON, SLOAN, and MASTERS, appeared to be in favor of the adoption of Mr. CHITTENDEN's resolution; and Messrs. J. G. JACKSON, D. R. WILLIAMS, BACON, GEO. W. CAMPBELL, SMILIE, ALEXANDER, STORY, BIBB, HOLLAND, and EPPES, opposed it.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on motion of Mr. VAN CORTLANDT—yeas 62, nays 49—on the resolution of Mr. CHITTENDEN, in the following words:

Resolved, That the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," and the several acts supplementary and additional thereto, ought to be immediately repealed.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT moved to strike out the word "immediately," and insert, "from and after the 4th day of March next."

Mr. EPPES called for the division of the question, so as to take it first on striking out the word "immediately." And the question having been so taken, was negatived—ayes 36. The motion to insert, of course, fell with the motion to strike out. And the question on the resolution having been stated,

Mr. LIVERMORE said, he was agreeably disappointed in seeing this subject taken up, and was not therefore as ready to meet it as he might be. He then commenced an argument on the constitutionality of the embargo. The origin of the Federal compact was chiefly the want of some general power to regulate commerce. There had, however, he contended, been no delegation by the Constitution of a power to lay an embargo; consequently, the exercise of it was an assumption of power not warranted by the Constitution. The Convention, he said, could have had no idea that they were raising a power to destroy the very object for the preservation of which they were associated.

After Mr. L. had been speaking about ten minutes,

Mr. GHOLSON asked if the gentleman would not prefer being heard to-morrow?

Mr. LIVERMORE answered that he should.

A motion was made that the Committee rise, and report progress; which, however, was soon changed to a motion to report the fact that there was not a quorum present.

The motion for rising was supported by Messrs. COOK, DANA, QUINCY, ELLFOT, and LYON, on the ground that time was not allowed for discussion; that it was late in the day, and no gentleman could be heard to advantage at this hour. It was opposed by Messrs. MACON, BLACKLEDGE, ALSTON, and D. R. WILLIAMS, for the reason, that, as they had consented to go into Committee on the subject, they wished an immediate decision; that the subject had already been amply discussed, and a protraction of debate now would but keep the people in suspense.

The Committee rose, but could not report, a quorum not being present.

A motion was then made to adjourn, and carried—yeas 40, nays 38—a quorum being present.

at the vote, several members having, whilst the yeas and nays were calling, come into the House from the lobby and elsewhere.

THURSDAY, January 5.

Mr. VAN DYKE presented a memorial of sundry late officers in the Delaware line of the late Revolutionary army, in behalf of themselves and others, praying that such further compensation may be granted to the memorialists, for their respective services in the capacity aforesaid, as shall be equivalent to an allowance of half-pay for life; or that such other relief may be afforded in the premises as to the wisdom and justice of Congress shall seem meet.—Referred to the committee appointed the 26th ultimo on the memorials of sundry other late officers of the said Revolutionary army.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with sundry statements made in conformity to the several provisions of the laws providing for the sale of public lands south of the State of Tennessee; which were read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the charter of Georgetown;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill for the relief of sick, disabled, and distressed seamen; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee appointed on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session, as relates to the Military and Naval Establishments, presented a bill authorizing the appointment of a Superintendent of Ordnance; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to examine the certificates of election or other credentials of several new members returned to serve in this House, in the room of others who are deceased, or have resigned their seats, made a report thereupon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was read, and is as follows:

"On examining the certificates and credentials of Joseph Story, returned for the State of Massachusetts, in the room of Jacob Crowninshield, deceased; of Richard Jackson, returned for the State of Rhode Island, in the room of Nehemiah Knight, deceased; of Samuel Shaw, returned for the State of Vermont, to serve in the room of James Witherell, who has resigned his seat; of Nathan Wilson, returned for the State of New York, in the room of David Thomas, appointed Treasurer of that State; of Benjamin Say, returned for the State of Pennsylvania, in the room of Joseph Clay, who has resigned his seat; of Thomas Gholson, jr., returned for the State of Virginia, in the room of John Claiborne, deceased; and of Jesse B. Thomas, elected a delegate for the Territory of Indiana, by the Legislature thereof, to serve in the second session of the tenth Congress, in the room of Benjamin Parke, appointed a judge of the superior court of that Territory—report "That the certificates and other credentials of the elections and returns of Joseph Story, for the State of Massachusetts; Samuel Shaw, for the State of Vermont; Richard Jackson, for the State of Rhode Island; Nathan Wilson, for the State of New York; Benjamin Say, for the State of Pennsylvania; Thomas Gholson, jun., for the State of Virginia; and Jesse B. Thomas, for the Territory of Indiana—are sufficient to entitle them to seats in this House."

Ordered, That the said report do lie on the table.

Mr. BASSETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was referred a resolution proposed by Mr. CHITTENDEN, in the following words: "Resolved, That the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all-ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States,' and the several acts supplementary and additional thereto, ought to be immediately repealed;" also, sundry other resolutions subsequently proposed, and petitions presented, to the House, touching the same subject—reported that the Committee had, yesterday, according to order, had the said resolutions and petitions under consideration; and in the course of the discussion, the Committee found themselves without a quorum, and thereby dissolved. Whereupon, Ordered, That the said proposed resolutions, together with the petitions presented, touching the subject aforesaid, do lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Augustin Serry," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

ENFORCING THE EMBARGO.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLAS, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for enforcing the embargo, and the several acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. ELLIOT said he should commence where he left off the day before yesterday, and proceed in the discussion with all the spirit consistent with coolness. He went almost through the bill section by section, commenting at length upon them. To every section he stated specific objections. Before he concluded his remarks, however, the Chairman observed that the gentleman could not object to sections which had been amended, as they could not, according to the rules of the House, be struck out; and there was now no motion for the Committee to rise. And Mr. E. closed his remarks, with an intimation that he would renew them at a future stage of the business.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill.

The amendments having been gone through,

Mr. EPPES offered a new section to the bill repealing so much of the supplementary act of March 12th last, as empowers the President to permit vessels to depart from the United States to bring in property. This power, he said, was not necessary, whatever it might have been, and had been made a pretext for evasions.—Agreed to without opposition.

Mr. PITKIN moved to strike out of the 9th section the words in italic in the following :

"That the collectors of all the districts, &c., shall be authorized to seize produce, &c., whenever there is reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, wagons, sleighs, or any other carriage, or in any manner apparently, on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place where such articles are intended to be exported."

He believed that it gave a despotic power to collectors, with military force, to arrest any property going out of the country—to take even a trunk of a citizen, which might have money in it, going from one part of the country to any place where it might probably be exported. This power to seize property in any vessels, carts, sleighs, &c., "apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation," was arbitrary and despotic. Not a cart, he said, could travel northwardly but was going towards the territories of a foreign nation, but would be subject to this despotic power, &c. No similar power had ever been given by any law passed in this country or any other. A man could not carry his wheat to market, if the mill lay in a direction towards a foreign country, without being liable to seizure. The fourth article of the amendments to the Constitution, says, "the right of the people to be secured in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." What was "unreasonable seizure?" If this power to seize, authorized by the bill, were not unreasonable, he could not see what was. Was not this a violation of this article of the Constitution? In article fifth, no man "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." If deprived of his property in this way, was it not, he asked, taking his property without due process of law? If the article of the Constitution meant anything, the bill proposed a violation of it. Mr. P. also adverted to the novelty, if not unconstitutionality, of giving to maritime courts jurisdiction over occurrences taking place on the land. He feared for the consequences of the thing, if the law was enforced. Whilst gentlemen took measures professedly for defending our rights on the ocean, he begged them to take care not to destroy them on the land. The bill was to maintain our right to sail without impediment from either of the belligerents; and for this purpose they were about to destroy the rights for which we had even fought and bled. Thinking thus, he felt himself bound to move the amendment, though he feared it would not be agreed to, for he perceived that this bill was promptly to pass by an overwhelming majority. He did not believe that this bill was necessary to enforce the embargo; and if it was, it was one of the strongest arguments against the embargo itself.

Mr. BASSET observed that all the arguments of the gentleman had been directed against the word "towards." The striking out "towards," and inserting "to," would obviate his objections.—Gentlemen talked of arbitrary measures. Did gentlemen suppose that the power here given to collectors was any way as arbitrary as must exist in military officers in case of war? The advocates of the embargo had adopted that measure as a lesser evil to avoid war. Was it arbitrary to keep produce at home and to compel those who had not the fear of God before their eyes and love of country in their hearts, to respect the laws of their country? Surely not; it was but justice. Was not the design to make laws operate equally, both honorable and laudable? Surely it was. What was so arbitrary in the bill? The objections seemed so changeable, so Proteus-like, that they could not be ascertained. It was altogether destructive of republicanism to say that we could not enforce or support our laws. Laws might be partially evaded; but they must be rendered generally effectual, and that was the object of this bill.

Mr. EPPES said that if he coincided in opinion with the gentleman from Connecticut on the subject of the bill, he should unquestionably vote against it; but he could not believe that it either violated the Constitution or established a new jurisdiction. He was well convinced that if the gentleman from Connecticut would attend to our revenue laws, he would find infinitely greater powers had been given by them. In almost the first revenue law which had been passed under this Constitution, importation by land had been wholly prohibited; and he asked the attention of the House to the terms of the law, because it proved that our revenue officers had exercised jurisdiction on land as well as on water. He read the 70th section of the "act to provide more effectually for the collection of duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships and vessels," as follows:

"That no goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, subject to the payment of duties, shall be brought into the United States from any foreign port or place in any other manner than by sea, nor in any ship or vessel of less than thirty tons burden, except within the district of Louisville, nor shall be landed or unladen at any other place than is by this act directed, under the penalty of seizure and forfeiture of all such vessels, and of the goods, wares, or merchandise, brought in, landed or unladen, in any other manner. And all goods, wares, and merchandise, brought into the United States by land, contrary to this act, shall be forfeited, together with the carriages, horses, and oxen, that shall be employed in conveying the same; provided nothing herein shall be construed to extend to household furniture and clothing, belonging to any person or persons actually removing into any part of the United States, for the purpose of becoming an inhabitant or inhabitants thereof."

H. OF R.

This principle, Mr. EPPES said, was precisely the same with that now proposed. The section was not now in force, but other provisions were substituted in its place. Mr. E. quoted several other parts of laws, in which was given to the collectors a power to search all rafts, boats, carriages, and to stop them when suspected, &c., and in which vessels going from one port to another, of the same State, were compelled to take clearances, or give bond and security, &c.; and persons carrying property, even overland, were required to give security. And yet, said Mr. E., when we now propose to give the same power in the very same words, we are told that we are violating the Constitution and destroying the rights of the citizen! The Constitution, he said, had wisely provided that the citizen should be secure in his person and property. But if a man's property were to be found under such circumstances as to authorize a belief that he intended to violate a law of the United States, was it an infraction of the right of the citizen to compel him to give bond that he will not? The very gentlemen themselves who raised this outcry, had passed laws stronger than this. He was against the amendment proposed, because it authorized no seizures in any situation in which property would not be liable to seizure for infraction of the present revenue laws.

Mr. DANA could not subscribe to the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia, that the principles of this bill were recognised in the revenue laws. He said he would enter into no examination of the question, whether an embargo, laid indefinitely without limitation of time, was Constitutional or not? But he objected to this part of the bill, that it authorized the officers of the United States to seize property to which the United States had no claim. In every case where property became forfeited in consequence of a contravention of the law, that property might, without violating general principles, be seized by the officers acting for the public. The act of seizure brings it before the court, and, if ascertained to be forfeited, it is immediately liable to confiscation. This was not the case in the present bill, for the person whose property was seized was permitted to have it again on giving security for its value. The very idea of a man's regaining his property on giving security was incompatible with the seizure of goods as forfeited. The suspicion of an intent to evade the law could be no ground for seizure. In the case of the revenue laws, the very fact of goods being found within the lines, not having paid duty, was, ipso facto, evidence of their being forfeited, transferred the property to the use of the United States, and made it liable to seizure. On this ground, therefore, he thought the part which was moved to be stricken out was wholly unwarranted.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS suggested a modification of the amendment, which, he believed, would satisfy the fastidiousness (for so he was compelled to call it) of the gentleman from Connecticut. He observed that it used to be penal for a man even to move any part of his property after sundown, and yet he believed that none of the distress had been felt from that law which gentlemen seemed to apprehend from this law.

Mr. LIVERMORE thought this section, and, indeed, the whole bill, could not be understood by gentlemen, or there could be no difference of opinion on the subject. The bill, indeed, had been very essentially altered since it came from the Senate; for, before it was amended, it contained a provision by which a collector, who had any particular hatred to any man, might go with a band of soldiers and seize his property.

Mr. EPPES denied that the bill had contained any such provision.

Mr. LIVERMORE said that the collector was authorized to seize property when he believed it intended for exportation, not confining the right of seizure to any particular limits, were it not for the amendment made by the House. If money had been accumulated in a bank, Mr. L. said that it might have been seized under a pretence of a suspicion that it was intended for exportation. And, as the bill now stood, suppose a man travelling from this place to Baltimore, which is an exporting place, having with him in his carriage or vehicle a sum of money, it would be in the power of any person to seize it, saying that it was intended for exportation, and keep it until he had been able to procure security for its retention in the United States. What would be the consequence if this power should be tyrannically exercised? Why, the revenue officer might be sued for damages, &c. Mr. L. made some observations on the subject of the process in this case, &c. He considered this bill as vesting arbitrary powers in the Executive, and oppressive to the citizen. This, he said, was the way in which all countries had lost their liberties, by gradual assumptions and delegations of powers. Rome had not established a dictatorship in a day; gradual approaches were always made to despotism. He said he should vote against the amendment and against the bill, because he did believe, if passed, that it would be subversive of the liberties of the people of the United States.

Mr. EPPES said, that the gentleman from Massachusetts must have lately taken a trip to the island of Tribnia, described by Dean Swift, and received some instructions from the artists who were so dexterous in finding out hidden meanings in words, for instance, that a flock of geese signified a Senate, a buzzard a Prime Minister, &c., because he had given meanings to the bill which could not be justified by the language of the bill, or fairly inferred from it. The bill as sent from the Senate, Mr. E. said, did not authorize any such seizure; and he asked the gentleman from Massachusetts, as a lawyer, whether any collector would dare to violate the Constitution by attempting to search a house without a warrant? The gentleman knew that he could not; that law could not give such a power. The gentleman had told them that Roman liberty had not been destroyed at once. If they looked into Roman history they would find that Rome was once saved by the braying of an ass; that the cackling of geese once saved the Capitol; that the conspiracy of Catiline had been betrayed by a woman. These were remarkable circumstances, but had no more connexion with the question than the gentleman's case of the dictatorship. Mr. E. said when he saw gentlemen supporting objections, like the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. PITKIN,) he could meet and respect them, but when he heard a gentleman say that, by the bill, an officer could violate a private sanctuary; when he looked into the law, and found no such provision, he could not treat his observations with attention.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, that the gentleman could not have understood him as alluding to the bill as it now stood, but as it had come from the Senate. The gentleman had asked him, as a lawyer, whether a man could enter a house without a warrant, and seize property? He could not, by virtue of a law, and why? Because the Constitution would prevent him. But this did not take away the impropriety of passing such a law. He did not believe that the courts of justice had become so corrupt, or would display such a vile submission to any authority as to submit to carry into effect a law which was unconstitutional. He said that he attributed no wrong intention to gentlemen; but he conceived it possible that their feelings might hide from them the true construction of the law. He warned gentlemen against it. Gentlemen might talk about asses and geese, for he supposed the gentleman meant to be severe upon him; if so, he would return the compliment.

Mr. EPPES said, he had not applied the observation to any one; if there was any application in the case, the gentleman had certainly taken it to himself.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, he had expressed no opinions but such as were founded on mature reflection.

After some remarks, in explanation, from Mr. DANA,

The question on Mr. PITKIN's amendment was taken, and it was negatived—yeas 41, nays 51, as follows:

Mr. STURGES moved to amend the last section by striking out the term of limitation of the law to the duration of the embargo, and inserting as the period to which this bill should expire, "the first day of June next."

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL observed that although he was decidedly opposed to this motion, he wished it not to be understood that, long before the first of June, he might not be willing to adopt a stronger measure, if no change of our situation took place.

The question was then taken on striking out the words in the bill, to make room for the amendments, and lost—yeas 27, nays 75, as follows:

Mr. STURGES's amendment, of course, fell with it.

Mr. STURGES then offered the following, as a new section to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That this act, and the

JANUARY, 1809.

Enforcing the Embargo.

H. of R.

act laying an embargo, and the laws supplementary to it, be repealed on the fourth of March next."

Mr. COOK moved to adjourn—ayes 26.

Mr. BLOUNT said he was not prepared to say that there might not be a time when the embargo ought to be removed, even if our difficulties were not removed; but he was certain that, whenever it was removed, some other measure must be adopted. He moved, as an amendment to the gentleman's motion, the following: "and that, from and after the fourth day of March next, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to issue letters of marque and reprisal to such citizens of the United States as shall apply for them against the nations having edicts in force violating the lawful commerce of the United States."

Mr. LIVERMORE said, it was true that the Congress of the United States had the power of declaring war; but he did not know that they could delegate the power to the President of the United States. He said he was not surprised at it; for they seemed to have arrived at a period when they should choose a Dictator, and vest him with the power of life and death.

Mr. EFES said that the gentleman from North Carolina had expressed clearly his idea; that he was not prepared to vote on the amendment of Mr. STURGES, and merely meant to express his idea that, if the embargo was taken off at this moment, letters of marque ought to be granted. In this opinion Mr. E. coincided with him exactly. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LIVERMORE) did not pretend to say that Congress had not the power to issue letters of marque and reprisal. Who, then, said he, is to sign them? Our Speaker? No, sir; most probably the Executive, to whom the gentleman is so tender of granting power. I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, but do not consider it as pledging me to vote for the whole section of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. STURGES,) as proposed to be amended; though I will not say that on the fourth of March it might not be proper to do so.

Mr. BLOUNT said, I rise to correct an impression which seems to exist in the minds of some gentlemen, that I am desirous of going immediately to war. I can truly say, that no man in this House is less desirous of going to war at this time than I am. In voting for the embargo, I was actuated by a desire to avert that evil; and I have and shall continue to vote for its continuance, because I still believe it will avert it, if, indeed, it be avertable. I introduced the amendment to the amendment now under consideration to show my opinion that the injuries we have received cannot be submitted to, and that if the embargo is abandoned before those injuries are redressed, we must necessarily resort to war. I shall vote for the amendment and against the section as amended.

He then amended his amendment by inserting the words "and neutral rights" after the word "commerce."

Mr. DAVID R. WILLIAMS said it was very easy to discover what was the object of the gentleman from Connecticut—to call the yeas and nays, on one question or other, till the empty seats on his side of the House were filled, and then they would not get the question. He was sorry that the gentleman from North Carolina had made an object so unimportant as important as he did. He really wished that he would withdraw his amendment. Every consideration of policy was against its being decided to-night.

Mr. STURGES assured the gentleman from South Carolina that he had no chicanery in his nature; his only object was to obtain a direct decision of the question. He disclaimed the motive attributed to him.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said, if the gentleman from Connecticut intended to vote for his own amendment, he must certainly vote for that of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BLOUNT withdrew his amendment, with a declaration that, if Mr. STURGES's amendment were adopted, he should move it as a new section.

After some observations from Mr. QUINCY in favor of, and Mr. MACON against the new section proposed—

Mr. CULPEPER moved to adjourn—yeas 25, nays 68.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL opposed the resolution, in a speech of a few minutes.

Mr. DANA spoke about an hour in favor of it.

Mr. MACON spoke in reply for half an hour.

Mr. LYON spoke in favor of the amendments about twenty minutes.

Mr. SMILIE spoke in reply about the same time.

Mr. STANFORD moved to adjourn—yeas 26.

Mr. LIVERMORE spoke in favor of the amendment, and in reply to Mr. SMILIE, about twenty minutes.

Mr. MASTERS.—Mr. Speaker, I perceive that the friends of the embargo are all mustered and marshalled for duty this night. They make so fine an appearance, there is no doubt of victory on their side. Nevertheless, I am determined to raise my arm and my voice against it, and in favor of the repeal. I hope the debate will be continued with all the temper and impartiality that the importance of the subject requires. I do not wish to speak disrespectfully of the measure, but must beg the indulgence of speaking to it with freedom.

We are again called upon for a substitute for the embargo. There are but three ways to be pursued: repeal your embargo laws in the whole, repeal them in part, or make war. The substitute I propose, is, to repeal the embargo laws as to those Powers who are friendly, and suffer your vessels to arm on the defensive. This course has this pre-eminent recommendation, of avoiding the supposed submission on the one hand, and the calamities and horrors of war, with all its attendant miseries on the other.

Let it be recollected, that this course will enable us, in some degree, to increase our commercial resources. Open trade with those countries who are friendly will lead to enterprise far more extensive than we can foresee, and far beyond our depth. If this course is viewed with calm, dispassionate, and sober investigation, I yet hope it will be adopted by the House.

H. OF R.

Enforcing the Embargo.

JANUARY, 1809.

Commerce is blended with our customs and manners, and is our right. Let it not be swept away, and a Chinese policy substituted in its place. Because Great Britain and France insult you, are you to prohibit all intercourse with the rest of the world? Commerce is one of the blessings which flows from a good government; which opens the way to many other improvements—to the introduction of arts, of industry, of all the virtues and sweets of civil life. Can industry, can wealth, can civilization, increase among the great bulk of the people, without commerce? If you repeal the embargo in part, it will open our markets, and give the merchants the use of their capital, and considerably increase the strength of the country, by diffusing the gold and silver of Mexico. It will give life to the operation of commerce and all the improvements of agriculture, and, above all other considerations, it will give quiet and internal repose.

The legal power of government is the guardian of all privileges and rights: that guardian cannot be supported without the respect and reverence of the people. Allegiance is tied to protection: if you deprive the citizens of the benefit of protection, you dissolve their allegiance.

One of the greatest advantages upon which our public welfare and strength particularly depend, is the union of the States, and a spirit of concord. The embargo has a strong and manifest tendency to break the ties of mutual interest which bind and knit us together, and to raise animosities, jealousies, and deadly feuds. Follow not a delusion that may lead to destruction. Do not drive your citizens to madness by your ill-timed measures. Do not quarrel with yourselves.

All classes of men are subordinate to the great laws of society—to the good order, the peace and safety of the country. You must however remember, that your power ought not to be exercised to the grievous inconvenience and detriment of the public. Despotism, in matters of high government to the people, is oppression—is tyranny—wherever it exists. True liberty and good government are inseparably connected. Anarchy is not liberty; despotism is not government. It is in dispensing justice—in protecting the rights and redressing the wrongs of the people—that republican authority best appears to the citizen, and excites his veneration and esteem. When relieved by its care and protected by its power, peace and security will follow.

The coercive and Chinese doctrine of the embargo is false, shallow, and more absurd than the most pestilential theories that were ever engendered by the confused imagination of man—is hostile to the real interest of this country, to national and individual prosperity—and has become one of the greatest scourges this country ever was oppressed with. It was founded on erroneous principles, which is a sufficient reason for its repeal. The idea of coercion is the most contemptible idea that ever entered into the head of man.

We have the best of experience to show how feeble the embargo is, and how inadequate in practice to the great object of coercion.

In contemplating on your embargo and non-intercourse as coercive weapons; the trade of Great Britain to extensive colonies; to Spain and Portugal, with Spanish and Portuguese America; the successes of the British naval force over every sea; the general increase of their power and the extension of their commerce, are events which must be taken into consideration.

Great Britain says you shall not trade to France, and France says you shall not trade to Great Britain. We say, agreed, and pawn our commerce to fulfil the promise. This withdrawing from the ocean is a criminal surrender of our national honor; it is in reality a disgraceful, base, and abject surrender of that rank which we are entitled to among nations. A right to navigate the ocean, and open our ports for exports, is a sentiment in the heart of every American—a law beyond any statute.

Can any man, looking at human nature as it is, contend that your laws cannot be evaded? Will you keep open the door to inroads, to clamor, to evasion of the law, under the false and imposing color of coercion? It often happens that one error in government begets another. If you continue your system, you add error to error. Your measures will give joy to Great Britain and France; and your late election has terminated according to their views and interests. Great Britain and France will soon know that we have got under the same Administration for four years to come, that have for four years back submitted to all the insults, aggressions, and indignities, that they could heap upon us—an Administration that often made great blusterings, but never dared venture anything but proclamations. Although I respect the Executive and his Administration for their pure intentions to preserve neutrality and the blessings of peace, I believe, instead of building imaginary castles, it would have been more wise in due season to have fortified our ports and harbors, and built heavy ships of war. Can we expect that our embargo and non-intercourse will be regarded any more than our gunboats and paper threats? Can we gain satisfaction, as to any one point, by our system? No, sir. The belligerents will expect us to continue our paper warfare and negotiations, and in the meantime encroach upon our rights, and keep us from the ocean, by our submission.

Let gentlemen say what they will, no oratory can persuade me that your paper war, your gunboat war, your embargo war, will not be defeated. Repeal your embargo in whole, or in part, and have an armed commerce. It is my earnest wish that this amendment should be confirmed with the most marked and decided approbation of every member.

Are all our advantages which may be derived from the export of our produce; are all our advantages to be derived from an increase of national wealth, to be retarded by a continuance of the embargo, and by the distractions and divisions of party—by the blind zeal and frenzy of prejudice?

JANUARY, 1809.

Enforcing the Embargo.

H. OF R.

Every one who reflects upon all the circumstances of our situation, I trust, will agree to decide this amendment free from resentment and agitation, uninfluenced by prejudices, and uninfluenced by the passions on account of British aggressions.

It becomes the duty of every member of this House to unite their aid and assistance to give stability and security to some system. It appears to me the middle course is the most wise. If there is anything which should appear defective, it will become, in consequence, a duty to point out that defect, so that it may be remedied.

The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. CAMPBELL) tells us. "The embargo is the only efficient measure we have taken; and if it does not soon answer the purpose, we must have war." Heaven forbid, that the fatal alternative should be decided in favor of that gentleman, or in favor of his embargo! The honorable gentleman appears to go upon the idea that there is an unalterable enmity between Great Britain and the United States; which is to suppose an eternal malice in the original frame of man, and that there can be no such thing as a friendly intercourse between the two nations.

The gentleman's position, then, will bring us to war. Will you pluck the gilded feathers and olive branch of peace from the American eagle, which may gripe and pierce with her talons the liberties of this country? Before wise and good men draw the sword, they consider whether the war in which they are going to engage be practicable or necessary, and what they are going to get. We have so little to get and so much to lose by a war, that nothing but the last necessity can induce me to abandon pacific measures, which ought to be the object of this commercial and agricultural country. A few years more of tranquillity, with our various climate and rich soil, will render the United States the most envied spot in the world, if we are not embargoed, and embargoed to destruction.

The belligerents refuse to rescind their edicts. This can be no reason for our declaring war, unless we have a chance, at least, of obtaining by war what we demand. If we go to war against them without any such chance, we shall forfeit all pretence to the character of being a wise and cautious people. I will go as far as any member in defensive measures, and preparation to meet future events. I hold it a sound maxim, in times like the present, to be prepared for war.

If you go to war with both belligerents, the collision will be with Great Britain; and the consequence will be, that France and America will be united in the same object. Although this Government and nation may not intend it, such will be the eventual operation. The Emperor of France has always destroyed his best friends. If you associate with France, this Republic is pawned to French influence. If ever our unthinking policy—the overbearing power of prejudice and passion—shall produce that fatal consequence, the melancholy moment will be too late to be perceived and remedied. Such are my sentiments. I am not afraid to avow them in the presence of the nation, who, I am proud to say, is not poisoned by the stream of French perfidy, whose friendship touches only to blight and destroy every Government.

[Mr. MASTERS proceeded to show that the object of the Emperor of France was universal conquest, and how he obtained his power in the French revolution, in order to prove the dangerous consequences of an association; when

The SPEAKER remarked that the question was not war, and declared him out of order. To which

Mr. MASTERS replied, if he could not have his own way in the debate, Mr. Speaker might decide the question before the House himself, and he should not appeal from the decision.]

Mr. ELLIOT rose and commenced a speech in favor of the resolution. Before he had been speaking many minutes, he was called to order by Mr. J. G. JACKSON.

The SPEAKER decided that he was not in order.

Mr. GARDENIER appealed from his decision, which was confirmed by a large majority.

Mr. ELLIOT proceeded in reading through the documents communicated this session. He was repeatedly called to order, but the Speaker uniformly decided that, if the gentleman chose to make any pamphlet or book a part of his speech, keeping to the question, he had a right to do so. He was afterward called to order by the SPEAKER, when giving an account of his political life, and the regret he felt at some votes which he had given. He concluded his remarks a little after twelve o'clock.

The Clerk then proceeded to call the yeas and nays on the amendment. After the first member on the list had answered, a member rising to speak,

The SPEAKER observed that it was not in order to debate the question, after the first member called had answered.

Mr. RANDOLPH appealed from his decision, affirming, at the same time, that the member who had answered was not in his seat at the time.

After some little altercation, the Speaker's decision was confirmed by the House—yeas 99, nays 10, as follows:

The question recurring on the bill's going to a third reading—

Mr. STURGES said: Mr. Speaker, it is with extreme regret that I rise to trouble the House at this late hour of the night. Gentlemen will bear me witness that I rarely take up the time upon subjects which come under our consideration.

Sir, I am willing, generally, to sit silent, and hear those who are in the habit of discussing questions; and my principal ambition as a member of this House, is, to give a correct vote.

Of so interesting a nature, however, in my apprehension, are many of the provisions of this bill, as respects the civil rights of the citizen, that I feel it my duty to state my objections before it passes, and I also know this is the case with several of my friends. Sir, owing to a decision of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, when this bill was before that Committee, we have had no opportunity to do this. I do, with the most perfect sincerity, assure gentlemen of the majority—if I know my own heart and the disposition of my friends—there is no desire to protract this debate unreasonably, or to keep gentlemen here to an unreasonable hour of the night. I hope we shall be indulged with another day before the final vote is taken. I, therefore, move that the House now adjourn, and call for the yeas and nays upon this question.

The yeas and nays were accordingly taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 35, nays 79, as follows:

The former question again having been stated by the Speaker, Mr. STURGES rose and addressed the Chair, as follows:

JANUARY, 1809.

Enforcing the Embargo.

H. OF R.

Mr. Speaker, I hope and trust it will never be recorded upon the journals of this House that permission is granted to read this bill a third time. Sir, if this bill shall pass into a law, your coasting trade will thereby be rendered worthless. If the powers and authorities proposed by this bill to be vested in the President of the United States and the collectors, shall be vested in them, your coasting trade will not only be rendered worthless, but will, in all probability, be entirely destroyed. If this bill shall pass, your Constitution will thereby be violated. If it shall go into operation, according to its letter and spirit, the civil liberties of this people will be prostrated; the chains of slavery will be rivetted upon them, so far as the enacting of bills, and an attempt to execute those of such a character, can produce those effects.

At this late hour, I shall not detain the House by reading to them, at large, the very objectionable sections of this bill. I shall endeavor, faithfully, to present a correct summary of them, so far as it is necessary for the argument I propose to offer; and if I am incorrect, I hope gentlemen will point out to me my mistakes or omissions.

I say, sir, the second, third, and fourth sections of this bill, will not only render the coasting trade not worth pursuing, but will totally annihilate it. What is the purport of them? The second and fourth sections provide, that no specie or goods, wares, or merchandise, either of domestic or foreign growth, produce, or manufacture, shall be put on board any ship, vessel, or boat of any description whatever, except by permission of the collector, and under the inspection of the proper revenue officer; nor then, unless a bond has been given by the owner, &c., to the amount of six times the value of the vessel and cargo; nor then, in case the collector shall think there is an intention to evade the embargo laws, except on board of vessels employed in bays, rivers, sounds, or lakes; nor in vessels of the latter description, unless a general permission is granted to them by virtue of directions and instructions from the President; nor then, if the collector shall suppose there is danger of evading said laws; nor then, unless a bond has been given by the owner, &c., to the amount of three hundred dollars for each ton of the vessel. So that, these two sections put it in the power of the President and collectors to stop this trade entirely. Indeed, in the last resort, it vests this power solely in the collectors; for, finally, they are, at their discretion, to say and determine, as respects both description of coasters, whether there is an intention of evading these laws. But the third section may, in some of our large seaports, be still more oppressive. This section provides, that the owner, &c., of any ship, vessel, &c., as described in the second section, which may, at the time when notice of this act shall be received, &c., be laden in whole or in part, shall, on notice given by the collector, either discharge such cargo within ten days, or give bond for the discharge of the same within three days, on penalty of forfeiting the vessel and cargo; and the collectors may order the discharge of such vessels; for the same causes, they may refuse permission to load as mentioned in the preceding section. Sir, I am credibly informed, there are some instances now in New York where rich and valuable cargoes are deposited in vessels lying in that port for safe-keeping, instead of putting them into warehouses, and that such cargoes and vessels are worth $250,000. If, according to the requirement of this section, the collector shall order such cargoes to be re-landed, the bond which must be given will amount to a million and a half of dollars. No merchant can procure a bond to such an amount, or if he could, no man will ask his neighbors to lend his name as surety for such a sum. A common coaster of ninety tons, employed only in bays, rivers, &c., will be obliged to procure bonds to the amount of $27,000. Sir, these requisitions will be intolerably oppressive upon the merchant. If you really mean to destroy the coasting trade, do it directly—say it explicitly—do not effect, in this disguised manner, what you know that you cannot consistently with the Constitution. Sir, you cannot, without a violation of the Constitutional rights of the people, prevent them from carrying their property from one to another part of the same State, or from one State to another State, by water, any more than you can by land. But, Mr. Speaker, I do consider these oppressive encroachments upon the rights of property as of minor consideration; as nothing, compared with the provisions of some other sections of this bill. I refer to the ninth, tenth, and eleventh. By these the collector shall, under such instructions and regulations of the President as he shall receive, with the aid of military force, seize any specie, produce, &c., when he has reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or they are in any manner apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or the vicinity thereof; and the collectors are also empowered to hold and detain them, by the same military force, until bonds shall be given to land or deliver them where the collectors shall direct, at any place from "whence" there is no danger, in the opinion of the collector, of their being exported. There is no limitation, sir, to the most wanton exercise or abuse of his discretion. He may, with military force, stop any wagon, cart, sleigh, or any other carriage, apparently on their way to a foreign country, or the vicinity thereof. And, however wanton, abusive, or tortuous, may be his conduct in the exercise of this discretion, if a suit be brought against him, acting in pursuance of his instructions, he may plead the general issue, and give this act and said instructions in evidence, as his justification and defence. And the only remedy or relief the person aggrieved has, is to petition the district judge, who is to hear and adjudge the case summarily, and who may order a restoration of the property upon certain conditions, or if he decrees against the petitioner, the collector shall be entitled to treble costs. Sir, in my apprehension, a more hideous exhibition of military despotism was never witnessed in any country, than will be if these provisions shall be carried into operation. The military power in array against the civil—in opposition to the usual remedy provided for the injured citizen. The collector is bound to act under such instructions as he shall receive from the President. Are these instructions to be public or private? There is nothing in the bill which determines this question. It is presumable, as heretofore, they are to be private; in his pocket, known only to himself. Let me put the question to gentlemen. What may be the consequence? A collector comes with or without his military force, he shows no warrant, no instructions; he attempts to seize the property of a citizen; the citizen knows not whether the collector acts by virtue of authority; the man whose property is thus attempted to be seized, defends; where is the law which would condemn him for any unhappy consequences which might ensue for his exercising the rights of a freeman, being ignorant whether the collector has such an authority or not?

H. OF R.

Enforcing the Embargo.

JANUARY, 1809.

By the ninth section, the collector is not to permit articles, which he shall seize, to be removed until bond with sufficient security shall be given for the landing or delivery of the same in some place in the States, whence, in the opinion of the collector, there shall be no danger of their being exported. By this section an owner of property may be obliged to remove his property fifty miles, or any other distance, as the collector shall direct, from a seaport into the interior. A person who has, for instance, a thousand bushels of wheat or salt lying in New York, may be obliged to remove them to Albany.

For all these acts of the collector, however wanton and vexatious, I have said the collector is to be completely justified. The tenth section provides that, if the collector is sued, he may plead the general issue, and give this act and instructions, &c., of the President, in evidence for his justification and defence. When I first read this clause, although this phraseology is peculiar to this bill, I was inclined to believe it meant nothing more than to save the collector the necessity of pleading specially. But, sir, the provision that the aggrieved complaining party may petition the district judge, convinces me that the fair construction of it is, that the plaintiff is not, under any circumstances, however aggravated, to take anything by his suit. This opinion is confirmed by adverting to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the committee of the Senate, which letter was the foundation of this bill. The Secretary says "vexatious suits are brought against collectors, which not only perplex faithful officers, but have the effect of intimidating others, and prevent energetic performances of their duties. The only provisions which have occurred to me on that subject are to enable the collectors who may be sued, always to remove the cause before a court of the United States." &c. The fact then, is, the citizen is to be deprived of his remedy before a court and jury of his State against a collector, however wantonly he may abuse his authority. Sir, these instructions from the President, which are to avail the collectors, essentially amount to a power in the President to dispense with the laws and the regular administration of justice in the respective States. You cannot, without a violation of the Constitution of the United States, deprive the citizen of his remedy before a court and jury of his State against a collector or any other officer of the United States, any more than you can against any other private citizen. If he brings his action of trespass or trover against a collector, the defendant must be answerable in damages, unless he can show probable cause. It will be the right and duty of the State courts to disregard this provision of your bill. Even in England, sir, (whose Government gentlemen are so much in the habit of execrating,) the principle is the same. For several centuries no such dispensing power has been recognised to be vested in the King. There, also, a revenue officer is as much liable to a person aggrieved as any private man, unless he can show probable cause for the seizure.

Sir, these seizures in carts, wagons, sleighs, or any other carriage, without warrant and without being obliged to show probable cause, and without oath or affirmation, are expressly contrary to the fourth article of the amendments to the Constitution, which says: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized." Again, sir, this bill will be unconstitutional, in that it authorizes the employment of the militia and other military force, by the President and his subordinate agents, before any insurrection or opposition to law has taken place. It is inconsistent with the principles of this Government to attempt, in the first instance, to execute laws, except through the mild medium of the civil power.

The first article, eighth section, and fourteenth paragraph of the Constitution of the United States, provides, that "Congress may provide by law for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." In conformity to the meaning and spirit of this provision, it is enacted by a law of the United States, passed the 28th February, 1795, that wherever an opposition to your laws cannot be suppressed by the ordinary course of justice, or by the powers vested in the marshals by that act, then, and then only, the President may call forth the militia for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I am bold to say, this bill cannot be executed. I pray I may not be misunderstood in this remark. Do I mean, sir, that there will be insurrections? No, sir, I trust and hope not. Sir, I shall conceive it my duty to be one of the first to discountenance and discourage them. The opposition to this bill will be peaceable, and, from its being peaceable, it will be irresistible. The public opinion will be against it, and you cannot execute a statute in a free country where the public opinion is against it. It has been often said, that this is a strong Government. I hope, sir, there is sufficient strength in this Government to carry into execution all Constitutional laws. But, sir, upon what does the strength of this Government depend? It consists in the good opinion, the attachment, and affections of the people; and note, sir, what I say, it will be a delicate experiment to try its strength in any other way.

I challenge a justification of the principles of this bill from its friends. There is nothing similar in your revenue laws, which the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) read to-day. I have not had time since to look at them, but my honorable colleague (Mr. DANA) has satisfactorily, to my mind, answered the observations of that gentleman. Sir, I shall detain the House no longer. I do hope and trust that there is sufficient virtue and patriotism to prevent the passage of this bill. If I should be disappointed, and it should go into operation, according to my apprehensions, it will be in vain hereafter to talk of civil liberty.

Mr. SLOAN.—Mr. Speaker, I trust my uniform conduct, since I have been a member of this House, will exonerate me from the charge of taking up time unnecessarily, for the purpose of making long speeches. No, Mr. Speaker; I have heretofore been, and still am, governed by a sense of duty, and nothing short of an imperious sense of duty could induce me to rise at this late hour to express, in a few words, my abhorrence of the principle of the bill under consideration, which it is evident a majority of this House are determined to pass before they adjourn. So imperious is my present sense of duty, that not even the charge of being "an old tory"—a refugee—a British agent—or under "the influence of British gold," [alluding to a declaration of Mr. SMITH's, that the opposers of the embargo laws were composed of such characters,] can deter me from opposing this bill, which I consider as aiming a deadly blow at the liberty of my country, and the inherent and inalienable rights of my fellow-citizens, which I am determined to support, not only on this floor, but in all places, even to my latest breath. Before I proceed further, I think it my duty to say that I trust there are not two members within these walls capable of such language, or making so indiscriminate or unjust a charge as the one before mentioned, but that, with a single exception, I consider myself surrounded by gentlemen!

Mr. Speaker, the few days' delay in calling up this bill produced in my mind a comfortable hope that its advocates would have permitted it to perish in its embryon state, from a conviction that it is not only amphibious, but must, if brought to life and raised to maturity, be a mongrel, unnatural monster, boasting itself of being the offspring of liberty, whereas its nature and effect is entirely despotic and tyrannical. I cannot better express my detestation of the bill under consideration than by citing the language of a member in the minority, (Mr. LIVINGSTON,) when, under a former Administration, the alien law was passed—he declared that the mode of deciding the guilt or innocence of an accused person by ordeal or battle, practised formerly by those nations which we term tyrannical and barbarous, compared with that law, was humane and just. Mr. Speaker, that law, compared with the present bill under consideration, was, in my opinion, humane and just; and, in its probable effects upon the people of the United States, not more in comparison than a drop to the ocean. That law the President was under no obligation to execute; nor have I ever heard of its being executed in a single instance. This bill, if passed into a law, and the embargo is continued, I conceive the President will consider it his duty to enforce, in which case, our boasted civil liberty will be at an end, and a military despotism be raised upon its ruins!

I am grieved to see a determination in a majority of this House, instead of relieving the distress and sufferings of the people, to pass a law to silence their complaints with sharp pointed bayonets, and these under the direction of even a deputy collector, to whom a latitude as wide as his own opinion is given.

The introduction of this bill, and the dreadful apprehension of its being passed into a law, and rigorously enjoined, has brought me, by anticipation, into a state similar to one in days of old, (Jeremiah) who, when mourning for the deplorable situation to which the folly of his people had reduced themselves, sought for some case similar, whereby he might comfort them. For a case similar to the present, in modern history, I have sought in vain; howbeit, in ancient history, 10th chapter of the 2d book of Chronicles, I find a case so perfectly applicable, as, in my opinion, to merit the serious attention of this House. There we find recorded that the children of Israel, conceiving themselves aggrieved by the heavy burdens laid on them by Solomon in his latter days, applied to his son to ease them, in which case they would serve him. This his old experienced counsellors advised him to do; but those who were young and inexperienced advised him to answer them roughly, whose counsel he followed, returning for answer, that his little finger should be thicker than his father's loins; and whereas his father had chastised them with whips, he would chastise them with scorpions. Last session we passed laws which have become too grievous for the people to bear; they have petitioned, and are anxiously looking to this session to remove that grievous burden; but, instead thereof, the bill about to be passed contemplates laying it heavier on. The application is too plain to need any elucidation, further than to remind the advocates of this bill that like causes ever have, and consequently ever will, produce like effects!

Mr. LIVERMORE said: Mr. Speaker, it is with extreme reluctance that I rise to make any observations at this late, or rather early hour, [two o'clock, a. m.] and it is at all times a most unpleasant undertaking to make an address to those who appear to have prejudged the cause. But such is the importance of the occasion, and such the extraordinary nature of the bill about to be passed, that I am not at liberty to sit still. It is my indispensable duty to expose its enormities, and some of the fatal consequences which must result to our country, should it become a law. As I wish not unnecessarily to detain the House, and am desirous of a patient and candid hearing, I shall endeavor to condense my argument, and consume as little time as the nature of the case will admit.

It is a duty I owe to my constituents, to the part of the country I represent, to the Constitution, and civil liberty, to oppose the passage of this bill, and declare its enormities.

I do not pretend to possess more patriotism, or a greater love for my country than other gentlemen; but at least I think I may safely contend to have as much as those gentlemen who have declared that this bill contains no despotic or unconstitutional principles; nor contained such, as it came from the Senate, and before it was amended.

Gentlemen have seemed alarmed at perceiving the despotic principles contained in this bill opposed from the quarter whence the opposition came. Upon another occasion, an honorable gentleman declared it was "a miracle," and that "he was almost persuaded to become a Christian."

But it is not by declarations like these, nor by angry invectives against any men, that we wish or expect to prevail, but by cool and dispassionate argument, addressed to the reason and understandings of gentlemen, and by pointing out the evils attendant upon measures, that we expect to avert them.

I agree that it is high time the people of the United States explicitly knew what is to be their fate, and what they are to expect from Congress at their present session: Is the embargo to be continued? Is the Chinese, or Terrapin system, as it is called, to be enforced? And is commerce to be destroyed and wholly given up? The bill, now under consideration, if it passes into a law, will establish the fact beyond all controversy. It is so effectual in its provisions, every avenue is so completely guarded, that if it can be obeyed and carried into effect in the manner contemplated, no man can ever leave the United States and return into it again with any degree of safety, and we should be in a short time, as to the rest of the world, completely isolated. Even the domestic commerce of the United States is laid under such restraints and embarrassments, is so much dependent on the will of a dictator, or those whom he may appoint to distribute his favors, that none but favorites can, with any degree of convenience, continue in its prosecution.

In order that this system may be established and enforced beyond all possibility of evasion, the most arbitrary, despotic powers, are confided to the dictator, that can well be given, except as to corporal punishment. Private rights are to be disregarded, private property invaded, the Constitution is to be prostrated, and liberty annihilated! These are very serious considerations, and lead to a variety of inquiries. Let us analyze this bill, and understand its true import and significance; and then consider whether we are prepared to pass it; whether we are ready to sacrifice all we hold dear in society to gratify a vain desire of obtaining an object, in which we have no rational prospect of success; and from which, after another twelvemonth's labor and sufferings, we shall be as distant as when we began.

Upon examining the first section of this bill, it will be found that no property whatever can be transported out of the United States, either by sea or land, of the most trifling value, without subjecting the owner to heavy penalties. The clothing in his trunk or portmanteau, or the money in his purse, to defray his expenses, would subject him to prosecution. Even the intention is made criminal, and a man is liable to suffer for an inchoate act. This system puts an end to all foreign commerce, or at least suspends it for an unlimited time, which amounts to the same thing. For, if nothing can be carried out, it follows that nothing can be brought in; as we cannot rationally suppose that foreigners will bring us their produce gratis. Here let us pause, and inquire whether Congress have the authority to act thus. The physical power they may have, but the legitimate right is of a very different nature. As I cannot find the power delegated by the Constitution, I am disposed to deny the authority. It is a fundamental axiom of the Government of our country, that all power is derivative, and alone proceeds from the people, and what they have not given, either expressly or by necessary implication, as expressive of their will and intention, is retained by them. This principle is expressly recognised and established by the ninth and tenth articles of the amendments of the Constitution.

I was proceeding last evening (when I was interrupted for want of a quorum) in an argument against the authority contended for, and will not now detain the House by a repetition of what I then advanced. [Mr. L.'s argument upon that occasion is here inserted.] It has already been stated by an honorable member, that the origin of the Federal Constitution was commerce, our relations with foreign nations, or the rights of making war and peace, and treaties, and the debts of the United States, and revenue; it might be added, the relation of each State with the others. And the Government was accordingly made, or intended to be, a federative government, and not a consolidated one, by vesting all legislative powers in the government of the Union. There is not a line or sentence in the Constitution of the United States, which manifests an intention of giving any other powers than those necessary for effectuating the objects I have mentioned.

The letter of the 17th September, 1787, signed by General WASHINGTON, as President of the Convention, is undeniable proof of this fact. He says: "The friends of our country have long seen and desired that the power of making war, and peace, and treaties; that of levying money and regulating commerce, and correspondent executive and judicial authorities, should be fully and effectually vested in the General Government of the Union"—and the Federal Constitution was made in conformity to these principles. The eighth section of that instrument designates the powers of Congress, and the third article gives them an authority "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." The seventeenth article of the same section gives the power of making laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution this power, and the other powers given in that section, and other powers vested in the Government of the United States. These are all the powers vested in Congress by the Constitution relative to commerce.

From reading the Constitution, and attentively considering the articles to which I have referred, no man can possibly conceive that the people, when delegating the power to Congress of regulating commerce with foreign nations, contemplated a state of things in which Congress would undertake to prohibit commerce altogether. We therefore cannot rationally expect to find an express negative upon this head; but the fifth article is strongly an implied negative to the principle; it reads thus: "No duty shall be laid upon articles exported from any State." Congress, therefore, have not the power of laying a duty of one cent upon articles exported, yet, by this bill, a right is assumed of prohibiting the exportation altogether. Congress cannot lay a duty of one cent per bale upon cotton exported, but it is contended that Congress can prohibit the exportation of cotton. This appears to be a very unfair way of depriving people of their rights. It is a method of reasoning neither just nor conclusive. "There is," says Lord Bacon, "no torture more intolerable than the torture of laws"—and so to torture them as to make the people express a grant of power which they never intended, is palpably unjust. As it cannot be contended that the people, in adopting the Constitution, contemplated vesting in Congress the right of prohibiting foreign commerce, or the exportation of articles both by sea and land, inasmuch as it would be the right of destroying the very objects of their association, and of the particular rights and interests of those associated, and as it is expressly laid down that the powers not given are reserved; the inquiry is, by what rule can Congress assume the right? The rule must be this, that it is thought expedient because of the expectation of beneficial results. It is conjectured that the United States may be greatly benefited, and that by these measures we may acquire or obtain satisfaction for injuries we have sustained, and security for rights of which we are deprived. But the argument of expediency, when we are inquiring into Constitutional powers, is wholly inadmissible; for, to admit this argument for one moment, there would be an end of delegation of power or derivative authority, an end to written constitutions and limitation of Government; it would at once be resolved into expediency, discretion, and will. For the same power which to-day can say, you shall not export articles, because we wish to deprive certain nations of the benefit of receiving them, may say to-morrow, you shall not grow tobacco, cotton, or wheat—you shall not catch fish, lest the articles may fall into the hands of those we wish to coerce; by the same rule which you say that we shall not sail ships, you may say, we shall not build them.

By the same rule which you say, we shall not export our produce to countries in amity or at war with us, you may say we shall not raise the produce, or manufacture the articles we wish to export, or even raise or manufacture articles for the sustenance of ourselves and families; and, with like propriety, might the rule be extended to every transaction of human life.

If you can adopt the rule of expediency for your guide, you have passed the Rubicon, and, like Cæsar, assumed the disposal of the liberties of your country.

And there appears to be no more propriety in contending for this power, than there would be under the eighth article of this section, that Congress have a right to prohibit authors and inventors of science and useful arts from exercising their faculties, on the ground that they have the power of securing to them the right of their writings and discourses; or, under the fifteenth article, which gives the authority for regulating the militia, they should undertake to abolish the militia of each State. It may be observed here, that the same rule applies to the commerce between the States, and if Congress have the authority to destroy foreign commerce, they have the right of preventing its being pursued between the different States. The idea that the people would intentionally delegate this power to Congress, is contrary to every principle of reason, and that they have done so without knowing it, is contrary to every principle of volition; and to construe their grant to mean what they never intended, is contrary to every principle of honesty and justice. The Constitution is in the place of divine command, and we have no power to enlarge, or circumscribe it in the least particle, though we might entertain the most serious opinion that infinite benefits might redound to our constituents had we but the power of doing them all the good our benevolence might dictate.

If further evidence is necessary of the power intended by the people to be delegated, and the old law maxim of "what does not appear does not exist," is insufficient, we may with propriety consider, what could have been the opinion of the people of different States in the Union, as resulting from their peculiar circumstances and local situation, at the time of adopting the Constitution. Upon a former occasion I took a view of the benefits arising from commerce—that all our pleasures and conveniences, as well as power and riches, were in a great measure derived from commerce. And that, both in sickness and health, we felt the benign influence of her bounty. That all countries and climates, earth and seas, things animate and inanimate, vegetable and fossil, are made subservient to man through the means of commerce.

Not only our bodily enjoyments are dependent upon commerce, but our mental improvements also. The philosopher in his closet, the farmer or planter upon his estate, the herdsman and mechanic, the fisherman and adventurous mariner, derive their advantages from the same source, and are alike benefited with the merchant in his counting-house. The sciences are cultivated, the mind is enlarged and improved, the manners are softened and polished, and man, from a rude, uncomfortable, unenlightened animal, becomes a cultivated, social and useful being, acquiring and receiving happiness himself, and communicating it to others. By commerce, a country grows rich and powerful; and, without it, would remain indigent and weak, and even become so, in a short period, by altogether divesting itself of it, though ever so rich at the commencement.

History affords us the most striking illustrations of these positions; of countries whose Government might be said to balance the world, and whose importance grew out of commerce, and was lost by its decline. But let us turn our attention to objects with which we are more immediately conversant. I mean the affairs of our own nation. What was the situation of the people of this country in 1787? A poor, defenceless, bankrupt, and impotent people, without the ability to discharge our public or private debts, and scarcely possessing strength enough to support a war with either the Algerines or Indians. But, by adopting our present happy Constitution, (for it has hitherto afforded us the means of obtaining happiness,) and by pursuing an advantageous commerce, under the auspices of a Government of men who well considered its inestimable advantages, we, in the short period of twenty years, have arisen to an astonishing degree of wealth, and, if it had been so directed, correspondent power.

Acknowledged to be the second commercial nation in the world, and with most unbounded prospects of future wealth and happiness—what a strange reverse does the prospect of our affairs now present? Like a man inebriated with success, a check in his career drives him to commit suicide. The sages who formed the Constitution, and the people who adopted it, (at least a part of them,) well understood this subject, and have so expressed their sentiments.

It is, therefore, morally certain, that they did not contemplate a situation of affairs in which Congress would deliberate upon the necessity of destroying that commerce which was a principal cause of their association to regulate, and from which they expected to derive the means of relieving themselves from their embarrassments, and, as the event has shown, they did not miscalculate. If, therefore, they did not think of it, it certainly follows, that they did not intend to invest Congress with the power, and consequently have not given it to them, and the most favorable point of view in which the subject can be placed by the gentlemen who contend for the principle, is, that it is a case omitted, and was not thought of, and this is sufficient to support my argument.

It has been said that the embargo is not to be perpetual; that we do not intend it shall be so.

I know not what is a perpetual law, if the embargo laws are not. Their duration depends upon no event; neither is any period limited for their expiration. They are perpetual as to our power, and that should be our only consideration, in this respect, in passing a law. The question should be, is this act such as we wish perpetual? If it is not, we betray the trust reposed in us by the Constitution, in making it so beyond the power of our control. It is not for us to say that the law may be repealed if the Senate and President consent. The Constitution has made the different branches of the Legislature checks upon each other, and we are destroying these Constitutional checks by placing one branch at the mercy of the other: and it would be a poor apology to say, we had a confidence in the other branch, having once parted with our power over the subject, it is gone from us forever; every law is perpetual whose limitation is not in some way expressed in the act.

I shall be told that there has been a judicial decision in favor of the constitutionality of the law; that a district judge, after solemn argument, has judicially given an opinion. I respect the gentleman who gives the opinion, but I by no means subscribe to the correctness of the opinion given. Perhaps in his situation, as an admiralty judge of inferior jurisdiction, it was the correct course to execute the law, and leave it to the highest tribunal to decide upon the important question of its constitutionality, and it might have been as well if he had gone no further. But, in my situation, I take still higher ground; and although a decision of the Supreme Court would be a sufficient rule as a citizen for me to regulate my conduct as to the force and effect of the law, yet, as a legislator, I must judge for myself whether the Constitution has given me the power to act or legislate upon the subject. I altogether condemn that sophistical way of reasoning by which a man derives power to himself, or pretends to derive it, by alleging it is the appendage of power specially granted, or arises by implication from those granted; because he convinces himself by a fanciful argument it would be better for the people if it were so, when, at the same time, it appears that the grantor could not have had the case in view, but rather a case directly the contrary. If it would be fraudulent so to construe the power of attorney of an individual, what must be the case of the substitutes of the people in misconstruing the instrument of their authority, when the dearest rights of their constituents are implicated? I feel no hesitation in saying, that had this thing been contemplated by the people, or the system that is now endeavoring to be established, there never would have been a union of the States by civil compact; and I am compelled to say, I dread the consequences of a continuation of this pernicious system.

But it has been endeavored to maintain the doctrine upon the principle that Congress have the power of making war and peace. It is presumed that a discreet use will be made of this power, and when we are at war with any nation, commerce, of course, with that nation will cease, or be interdicted during the continuance of the war; and Congress may interdict commerce with a particular nation, which is a species of war. But preventing the citizens from exporting their produce to nations in amity, was never contemplated. It is totally a different case. But, the question has been asked, has not Congress the right to declare war against all the world? And this is the amount of the present bill. Our nation is to become like the Ishmaelites of old—"our hand against every man, and every man's hand against us." So absurd a thing was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

It is so extreme a case that it is ridiculous to ask the question, and so is the absurdity of the idea of our carrying on war with two nations at the same time, who are waging the most destructive war against each other. Would there not be danger, or cause to apprehend that they might cease their strife for a while, and turn their destructive arms against our defenceless coast, and make us severely pay for our folly and temerity?

While I am upon this subject, I cannot help expressing my dissatisfaction upon the information given us by the documents communicated by the President, relative to the offer which was said to have been made to the British Government, to raise the embargo as to them, provided they would revoke the orders of the 7th of January, and 11th of November, as to us. It seems very strange that the British Government should not agree to a proposition of this nature, and so reasonable in itself—for, this must have been the necessary consequence of such an agreement, either that France must instantly have revoked her blockading decrees against England, or we must have had a war with France. To suppose, therefore, that England did not wish our friendship to them, and hostility to their enemies, is next to impossible with me, and, of itself, leads to a doubt of the reality.

But, upon a fair examination, the authority given to Mr. Pinkney does not appear to be adequate to making the agreement, and that he could not have done so, except he should also assume authority by implication. In Mr. Madison's letter to Mr. Pinkney, of the 30th of April last, he is told that, "should the British Government take this course, he may authorize an expectation that the President will, within a reasonable time, give effect to the authority vested in him on the subject of the embargo laws."

Mr. Pinkney, in his letter to Mr. Madison of the 4th of August, says, "that in an interview of the 29th of June, (that is, with Mr. Canning,) he soon found it necessary to throw out an intimation, that the powers vested in the President by Congress, to suspend the embargo act and its supplements, would be exercised as it regarded Great Britain, if their orders were repealed as regarded us." Mr. Pinkney, as an honest man, must have communicated what his powers were, and that he was not instructed absolutely to make this agreement. Mr. Pinkney in his letter to Mr. Canning, of the 23d of August, says, "that he had the honor of stating that it was the intention of the President, in case Great Britain repealed her orders, &c., to suspend the embargo, and was authorized to give this assurance in the most formal manner." We have already noticed what the authority was. For my own part, I cannot conceive the necessity of proceeding in this way in so important a concern; and why authority was not given, in the first instance, to make a direct and positive offer, and demand a categorical answer, whether the Government would agree to the proposal, I am at a loss to conjecture. It seems as if we could not have the whole of the correspondence before us, and as if something had been kept back. To me the affair is inexplicable. I must, therefore, leave it to gentlemen who better comprehend it, and proceed to the further examination of the subject before us.

It has been said that every principle in this bill has heretofore been enacted by Congress, and that precedents may be shown to this effect. In all doubtful questions, precedents are entitled to consideration, but then we ought to be certain the precedent applies to the case; but, if I feel no doubt upon the point, the precedent can have no weight with me either way, and it certainly can be no excuse for us that a former Congress have exceeded their authority. As I feel no doubt of the correctness of my argument, it is not very necessary to consider the cases which are supposed to maintain the doctrine; but, even here, I am willing to meet the objection.

The first case is the embargo of 1794. An embargo, as it has ever been understood in the law of nations, is the preventing in time of war, for a short period, the sailing of vessels from a port or ports, that information might not be communicated to an enemy, and thereby the object of an expedition be defeated. And also, (as it is practised in some countries,) for the purpose of manning a fleet. In the case of 1794, our shores were infested with privateers and armed vessels, capturing the vessels of our citizens even in the mouths of our harbors. The embargo was laid by a resolution for thirty days, and afterwards renewed for thirty more, but raised before the expiration of the time, and when it was supposed our people were sufficiently warned of their danger, and prepared to meet it. By a temporary law, the President was authorized to lay an embargo for a limited time in the recess of Congress, should a like necessity require it.

This case was very dissimilar to the present system. It was merely a momentary measure of precaution. It was not perpetual. Neither branch had divested itself of the power of revocation. It was not intended to destroy our commerce, or prevent, for an unlimited time, the exportation or importation of all merchandise. As it had been practised in time of war by nations, to lay an embargo in the way I have mentioned, Congress might suppose that this power was contemplated to be granted by the Constitution, in granting the powers of war and peace. But it will readily be seen, that as this system of destroying commerce had never occurred in the world, and, as I have before shown, was so contrary to the principles and objects of the association of the people, it could not, in like manner, be said to be granted, being in its nature a very different thing.

H. OF R.

Enforcing the Embargo.

JANUARY, 1809.

But whether the embargo of '94 can be justified in consonance with the principles I have laid down, I am not anxious to inquire. The event was at a season of the year when its operation was not very injurious, and being limited, there was not much complaint against it, and the apparent necessity seemed a justification. But, if Congress exceeded their powers at that time, it is no justification of the present bill.

The question has been asked, where does the power reside if Congress do not possess it? The answer is, with the people, from whom all power emanates; and I will venture to predict they will never relinquish it. Should the question be proposed at any time, their answer would be very prompt. But, gentlemen have said that the people have expressed their approbation of the system by their elections. This opinion I believe incorrect. Two very powerful and influential States, Massachusetts and Connecticut, have, by their Legislatures, explicitly avowed their decided disapprobation; and the Legislature of Massachusetts have requested their Representatives in Congress to use their influence to obtain a repeal of the embargo laws. This request, of itself, has great weight with me, though it is true it is conformable to my previous opinion.

New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, and Vermont, if the elections are fair criteria, have expressed their disapprobation of the embargo system; and the late elections of Representatives in Vermont are incontrovertible proof of the assertion that the elections would have been very different in the United States but for the belief that the embargo was to be immediately raised.

People are very apt to believe the thing they wish, and the rumors which ran through the United States convinced them that their wishes would be shortly realized. The letter, first published in Richmond, which appeared to have the stamp of authority, was printed in almost every paper in the United States; reports, said to come from officers of Government, of high standing, were industriously circulated; all parties appeared to agree in the necessity and belief that the embargo would be raised immediately upon the meeting of Congress, if not suspended before. In this situation the election came on, and the people were asked, will you turn out your old friends and elect others on account of the embargo, which will be immediately raised? The answer was, no! Other gentlemen will form their own opinions, but to me the conclusion is irresistible, that many gentlemen owe their election to these circumstances; and, in this view, I contend that the elections afford no favorable proof of the popularity of the embargo. This question of power ought to be settled by the people, and I make no doubt that the Constitution will receive amendments upon this head.

The second section of this bill establishes a principle which must ever be abominable in a free government; a system of partiality and corruption. This is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, which is, that government was not instituted for any man or body of men, but for the general good. Here power is given to the President and his collector to determine who shall carry on the remnant of trade which, under all the restrictions, is left us—the coasting trade. This is, from port to port in the same State, or from ports in different States. The whole rests in the will and discretion of the President, who may issue his instructions to the collectors, and from them there is no appeal. It has the appearance as if party politics were to be the criterion of the rights of trade. It cannot be pretended that the Constitution contemplates such unjust and arbitrary distinctions. Then where, or from whence, is the authority derived for the exercise of such invidious distinctions? The consequence must be the detestation of the Government, and animosity among the people. It would be placing a good man, who may chance to be a collector, in a delicate situation, and a bad man where he might exercise the most arbitrary tyrannical powers.

This is not merely a speculative opinion. We have already had some practical knowledge upon the subject.

The sixth section establishes a new and strange principle in law, a principle of vicarious punishment, or of punishing one man for the offence of another. But this is not the extent of the mischief. It seems a refinement in cruelty. There are men who have vested the principal part of their property in shipping. By the embargo they have been so long deprived of the use of their property that they are almost reduced to beggary. To relieve their necessities they may wish to sell their vessels; but the provisions of this section will render it impossible to do it with any degree of safety, for the seller may be answerable for an offence committed by the real owner, whose name does not appear upon the register, enrollment, or license; and this, together with the enormous bonds of three hundred dollars per ton of the vessel, which must be given upon the transfer, would be almost a certain means of preventing a sale. But the principles contained in the 9th, 10th, and 11th sections of the bill are infinitely more destructive to liberty, and direct violations of the Constitution.

It is provided by the 4th article of the amendments to the Constitution, that "the right of the people to be secure in their houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrant shall be issued but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." This is the people's Magna Charta, whereby they have declared certain rights inviolate. It seems as if the framers of this article foresaw a time, when the passions of those in power might cause them to overleap all bounds, and, from some strange causes, an attempt might be made at the destruction of men by an attack on, or an improper and unreasonable interference with their private property. The same principle is established in the constitution of most of the States; at least, I find it in nine of them.

JANUARY, 1809.

These principles are also laid down in the constitution of most of the States: that standing armies are dangerous to liberty; that the military shall be subordinate to the civil power. It appears that the people, ever jealous of their rights and liberties, have endeavored to secure them by every possible restriction. They have been aware of the causes which have deprived other nations of their freedom, and have endeavored to guard against the evils; and I think they will frown upon every encroachment. I hope they will not have cause to reflect that they did not consider that their constitutions were to be administered by men, who might put a different construction upon their words from what they intended, and that, in the sequel, they would meet the same fate they appeared to deplore. But, should the present bill pass into a law, their fancied barriers which they have enacted, are completely broken down, and their constitution, in this respect, becomes but a dead letter. To suppress insurrections or forcible opposition to the due execution of the law, a resort may be had to the military; but to use the bayonet in the first instance, to execute the laws, is a power not vested in Congress, and whenever exercised, it must be upon the ruins of liberty.

In order to make myself the more intelligible, I will state certain cases, in which despotism will appear in most glaring colors, and will then prove, by this bill, that such cases may exist, and the law will be such as to authorize them. Gentlemen may say, they are cases not likely to happen; it is not what we intend by passing the bill; we have too great a confidence in our Executive to believe in the dangers you apprehend, or that the power will be improperly exercised. I should answer that it would not be the first time that too great confidence placed in man has led to the destruction of the liberties of the people, and it would be but a poor excuse to say that we placed the power where we did not believe it would be misused. The ancient Romans did not think, when they created Julius Cæsar perpetual Dictator, that they had placed power in the hands of one who would misuse it, any more than Congress apprehend danger from the present President, or his successor. There was no man more accomplished than Cæsar, or who possessed a greater share of popular talents. He, like Absalom of old, "stole away the hearts of the people," but all historians agree that here commenced the destruction of Roman liberty. It should be our only inquiry, May the powers granted be used for unconstitutional or tyrannical purposes? and not whether the agent is so pure, just, and honest, that he will not make an improper use of them.

The cases which I shall state may, at first view, strike gentlemen as extravagant, and not likely to happen; but let them consider whether the power is given by this bill, and then whether, in the present state of this country, they are not something more than barely possible, and do not approach even to probability. For instance, a man in Vermont has a wagon loaded with flour, which he intends to carry to market to pay his debts or supply the necessities of his family. The collector or person empowered by the President seizes it, and will not permit it to be removed until bond shall be given for the delivery of it at some place directly opposite to where it was intended to be carried, and to any distance the arbitrary agent may choose, if within the United States. He has the power to do this, and cannot be called to an account, or punished for his misdoings. For, if the wagon is going in a northerly direction, it is "apparently on the way towards the territories of a foreign nation"—I take the words of the bill;—if it is going East, West, or South, it is "apparently on the way" to Boston, New York, or some other place, where the officer seizing may say, "It is intended for exportation;" and of this, of course, he must be the judge. And the same may be said as to the place where the articles are to be delivered, if within the United States. And he may employ such part of the land and naval forces, or of the militia, as he may judge necessary, for taking into custody, guarding, and keeping the articles seized. The same may be done to the owner of a load of tobacco going to Richmond to market, or of a boat-load of cotton transporting to Savannah.

I will state another case. A gentleman—an honorable Senator, if you please—is travelling to Baltimore, from this city, and has in his trunk a sum of money. The President or collector may send a file of soldiers and stop him, and seize the money, and not permit it to be removed until bond shall be given to deposit it in the Washington Bank; (the stockholders of many banks in the United States would be delighted to have an agent with this power); and this bill completely gives the authority. For, the gentleman having put his specie on board his vehicle, (whatever it may be,) and being apparently on his way to a place where exports have been made, and (if report says true) with great success during the embargo, the act gives the full power to commit this enormity, and no one can call the perpetrator to account; and the remedy proposed by the amendment, which virtually takes away a man's common-law right, is an insult to the sufferer, rather than a redress for the injury.

Let not gentlemen imagine that these are cases not likely to happen. Man is a creature of a variety of passions, and there are none more powerful and prevalent than those of avarice and malice. Money may be extorted for favors granted, or the vengeance of the adversary may be wreaked upon an innocent man, who, by this bill, will be deprived of the power of resistance, or of recovering redress.

It has been contended that the principle of seizure contained in this bill is supported in precedent by the sixty-eighth section of the collection law. This section authorizes the collector (not a military band) to enter on board a vessel and seize goods liable to forfeiture for a breach of the law, in not having paid or secured to be paid the duties upon the goods, or for other causes of forfeiture mentioned in the law. And if they should have cause to suspect a concealment thereof in any particular dwelling-house, store, building, or other place, upon proper application, upon oath, to any justice of the peace, be entitled to a warrant to enter such house, and in the day time only search for such goods, and seize and secure the same for trial; and all such goods so found, on which the duties shall not have been paid, or secured to be paid, shall be forfeited.

H. OF R.

Enforcing the Embargo.

It is to me astonishing that any gentleman can suppose this a precedent in point to support this bill. It shows how far our failings may mislead us in the direction of our understandings.

The case contemplated in the collection law necessarily supposes an offence committed, which is by landing or concealing the goods, not having paid or secured to be paid the duties on them; and for this offence the goods are forfeited; and, if so, there can be no just cause of complaint for their seizure; and the officer must be cautious that he is correct in this, or has just cause for seizure, for otherwise a jury of his country would teach him to respect the private rights of his neighbors. But, the ingenuity of the committee in this amendment is very great. They have found it necessary—a thing never dreamt of by the honorable Senate—to declare an offence, and then a forfeiture of the goods, to justify a seizure to hold for trial. But, to support the case as parallel, let us consider the offence created.

By the amendment, the offence created is this: putting on board a vessel or carriage goods or specie with intent to export, &c. If it should be left simply here, I apprehend the law would have very little operation either way. For, if (as upon common principles) the person seizing must prove the intent to export, for his justification, there would be but few seizures, as the remedy which the law would give would be sufficient to awe the collector. But, in order to obviate this difficulty attending the seizing of a man's property, the other amendment is introduced, which is of as arbitrary a nature as could well be expected. The district judge is to decide in a summary way the question, and a man is to be deprived of his common-law rights; and the inestimable trial by jury, which the Constitution has guaranteed, is to be done away, and the person who dares to complain shall be adjudged to pay treble costs. This is the fair construction and intention of the bill; and although our courts of law may not consent to have the Constitution trodden under foot, yet this is no apology for the bill.

The act of the 5th June, 1794, is also mentioned. This authorizes the President to make use of military force, if necessary, for preventing the fitting out and arming vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and to take possession of any such ship or vessel and her prizes, and to compel the departure of foreign ships and vessels, which by the laws of nations and treaties of the United States ought not to remain. But this power cannot be exercised till after process, issuing out of some court in the United States, shall have been disobeyed or resisted. This act is founded upon the principle that the civil power must be resisted before the military can be called to aid, and is in strict conformity with the Constitution.

The fifth section of the act of the 3d of March, 1805, for preserving peace within the ports and harbors of the United States, is also mentioned. This gives power to compel foreign armed vessels to depart the United States. If foreign armed vessels must be compelled to depart, it must be by military force.

The act of the 3d March, 1807, authorizes the removal by the marshal, without suit or judgment, of persons who are in possession of lands claimed by the United States. I think this act cannot be justified upon principles of reason and natural law, but it by no means comes up to the principle contended for in this bill. The marshal is to remove without process—without an inquest of office, or any judicial decision—and the President is the sole judge. But it is not to be done by a military force. And although it may operate very inconveniently and oppressively, yet in any cases likely to happen it cannot prove so injurious.

There has been some contest in this House on the question, which part of the country suffers most by the embargo? This is not an essential point to be decided; it is sufficient that all parts suffer grievously by its pressure. But, should this system be continued, it is certain our cities must be wholly ruined, and our ship-holders lose their all. Though the farmer must be greatly distressed, yet he has still some chance of supporting his family upon his farm; but the naked walls of a city house would afford little more consolation to the impoverished owner than the walls of a prison. It has been said that there would be no danger of people's suffering through want in this land of plenty—let them move into the country, and cultivate the soil. I cannot subscribe to the humanity of the act of compelling people to desert their habitations in town to cultivate the soil. Little is it imagined what infinite distress such a cruel necessity must occasion. The country gentlemen must pardon us who live in towns, if we cannot comprehend their policy. They inform us that their object is kindness towards us; that they wish to preserve our property by measure; which we are convinced go to the destruction of it. We are also told there would be no trade for you, should we suffer your ships to leave their ports. Then, why this great solicitude to prevent their sailing? The thing would work its own cure, if left to regulate itself. The merchant would find out whether he could prosecute a safe and beneficial trade, and the underwriter would regulate the amount of the risk; and it ought to be left to the people to have dominion over their own property. The calculations which have been made to show how little trade could be prosecuted are very fallacious. If we have forty-eight or fifty millions of domestic produce and manufactures to export, the articles would find a way to a market, and the consumer must ultimately pay the expense. There is another consideration of very great importance to every part of the United States—as well those who have articles to export, as those who make a profit by the exportation. All the articles of exportation in this country may with equal facility be raised in other countries, where the business is as well understood; and there is no preceptor equal to that of necessity. Let the cotton planter, the rice, indigo; and those who make tobacco, as well as those who grow wheat, and the grazier; look well to this. They have put their customers to school, and a fatal lesson for them they may learn. Necessity may compel them to learn a new course of trade, but, when learnt, it may take the same necessity to cause them to retrace their steps. The West India islands may be as well supplied by Spanish America and the British colonies with lumber, beef, corn, and fish, and with wheat from Sicily and Africa; and the immense quantity of cotton which may be imported from Brazil and the East Indies ought to fill the mind of a cotton planter with fearful apprehensions; and as to tobacco, it is indigenous to all soils and climates.

JANUARY, 1809.

Enforcing the Embargo.

H. OF R.

What a singular change there has been in the world in the course of little more than a twelvemonth. Britain and the United States possessed then almost exclusively the commerce of the ocean, but the United States have shut themselves up in their shell, and magnanimously yielded their share to the Spaniards and Portuguese. A commerce which produced a revenue of upwards of sixteen and a half millions of dollars, and employed nearly twelve hundred thousand tons of shipping, and upwards of one hundred thousand seamen, is presented to them gratis. It is true, our commerce has been subject to interruptions and spoliations; but the losses, when compared to the profits, have been much smaller than gentlemen imagine. If the embargo cannot be enforced without the aid of the military, this alone ought to be a sufficient inducement to repeal the law; for nothing can be more calamitous to mankind than a military despotism! It is absolutely time this terrapin system was abandoned; it ought to be given up as a bad job. I do not believe it has been productive of any good, and I am morally certain it cannot now produce any. The idea of making war, or of coercing a foreign nation by destroying our own commerce, has ever appeared to me the most fallacious that could well be conceived. All the evidence we have upon the subject, proves to my mind, most clearly, that we have greatly overrated our means of coercion; that in France it is not felt, and in England it is forgotten. This I believe to be the opinion of sensible men. The idea of coercing England, because of a short crop of wheat and scarcity of cotton, is very ridiculous. A man who reasons from premises of no better foundation, I cannot help imagining, must have motives which I do not comprehend. Neither do I believe in the subjugation of Spain by the vast armies pouring in upon them. I entertain no doubt that a very profitable trade may be carried on with that gallant nation; and I confess I do not feel so cold-blooded towards them as not to wish them success in their glorious undertaking. I should wish the embargo off, for this reason among others, that our citizens might have an opportunity of affording them some assistance, and thus pay, in part, a debt of gratitude—of all others the most congenial to a generous mind. The argument that we had better suffer our ships to rot at the wharves, and our produce to perish on our hands, rather than carry it abroad, for fear we should overstock the market and reduce the price, I should expect from a school-boy rather than a politician. We are distressing our citizens, impoverishing our country, destroying our revenue, ruining our commerce, shutting our bowels of compassion against a noble, valiant nation, struggling for liberty and independence, closing the temples of justice in State after State, introducing arbitrary principles of government and military despotism, corrupting the morals of the people, violating the Constitution in its most essential principles—and for what? In the pursuit of a phantom. We might as well imitate the celebrated Knight of La Mancha—arm, cap à pte, and attack a wind-mill. Should we continue this course year after year we may bring on in the youth of our Government decrepit old age, and by this improper abstinence emaciate and waste the body politic, until we produce a dissolution of all its members, and still be as far from the end proposed as when we began.

It has been said—and there is great propriety in the observation—that in times of difficulty and danger we ought to rally round our Government. Every man will acknowledge the justice of the maxim; and I believe there are no people more patriotic, and who will more ready rally round their Government, in a just cause, than the people east of the Hudson; and there are no people who better understand their rights, or that are more tenacious of them. And they are too independent to give their approbation of a measure of which their consciences do not approve. A majority of them, at least, think their rights invaded by the embargo system, and wish a change. They cannot see into the policy or necessity of the measure; they think it will destroy their country, and be the means of infinite distress. The arbitrary principles introduced to support it fill their minds with alarming apprehensions. They express their sentiments freely upon it, as they have a most undoubted right to do. The most that can be said by gentlemen who differ from them in opinion, is, that they are in an error. If they are in an error, it should be shown by cool, dispassionate argument, and not by intemperate invective—by an address to their reason and understanding. And gentlemen will consider that this is the only method to convince and conciliate. We are called upon for a substitute for the embargo. The answer is, that the proper substitute for a bad measure (especially an unconstitutional one) is a repeal of it. When other measures are proposed by the Executive, or by order of this House, it will be the duty of gentlemen to give them a fair and attentive consideration, and to act according to the conviction of their understanding. But I know of no rule which makes it expedient for the minority to introduce propositions of this nature, which with propriety ought to come from the Executive, or at least be produced by the authority of the House, which the minority cannot be supposed to possess. It is their right and incumbent duty to make such objections as appear to them well founded against any measure proposed, and for the House to judge of their reasons and arguments, which, to understand, must be done with a spirit of candor.

H. OF R.

Enforcing the Embargo.

JANUARY, 1809.

Mr. MOSELY.—Mr. Speaker, in addressing the House at this time I shall not profess, as several gentlemen who have preceded me have done, that I am impelled solely by a sense of duty. In addition to this, sir, I can hardly reconcile it to a sense of civility and the claims of humanity to remain silent, when I perceive so many gentlemen around me apparently gaping for arguments.

But, sir, if I mistake in this particular, the time I must consider as peculiarly propitious. After a continued confinement for more than sixteen hours within the walls of the Capitol, (it being now past three in the morning,) and without any prospect of a speedy release, I think gentlemen may probably begin to have a more feeling sense than they have before experienced of the effects of a permanent embargo.

It is to be expected that gentlemen who have been uniformly opposed to the whole system of embargo will be against any acts that can be proposed for the purpose of enforcing it. But if such acts must be passed, it is not only the privilege but comports with the duty of every one to use his endeavor to have them as unexceptionable as possible—to see that they are not unnecessarily oppressive; and above all, that they do not infringe upon the Constitutional right of the citizen.

Sir, what acts, and how many it may be necessary to pass in order to enforce obedience to this measure, remains yet to be determined. Since the first embargo act was passed, no less than three supplementary acts have been added prior to the one now before us. Still the embargo is violated, and violated to such a degree, say its advocates, as to prevent all the good effects that had been anticipated from it, and which it must otherwise have produced.

Sir, the practicability of carrying the measure into execution was a point that ought maturely to have been considered before it was enacted. For, even admitting (what I never believed) that the embargo might have produced all the wonderful effects that were predicted by its authors—provided it could have been enforced; yet, if this was incompatible with the nature of things—if such was the geographical situation of our country—such the habits, dispositions, and interests of our citizens, that obedience to it was not rationally to be expected, unless enforced by the most rigorous and oppressive measures, (as was urged among other reasons by gentlemen opposed to the act,) it furnished good ground of objection, in the first instance, against passing it, and must operate with increased force against its continuance, as this fact becomes more confirmed by experience.

Sir, in vain do you extend your penalties and multiply your statutes. The more arbitrary and oppressive you make them, the more obnoxious they will become, and the more difficult it will be to carry them into execution. In one point of view, Mr. Speaker, I cannot but regard the present bill with some degree of complacency, notwithstanding its odious and detestable features. I do consider this bill as containing more conclusive arguments against the continuance of the embargo than any which have been offered upon this floor—and I have listened with pleasure to many very able and eloquent ones. This is, indeed, full of argumentum ad hominem. This, sir, presents to the people arguments which they must both understand and feel. If it has come to this, either that your embargo system must be abandoned and given up, or enforced by such acts as this; the people, I presume, will not be long in deciding the question. Why, sir, even the good people of Connecticut, who have been so highly complimented for their obedience to the laws, could hardly be expected to submit patiently to the arbitrary and vexatious provisions of this bill.

And here, sir, whilst it is upon my mind, I must beg leave to express my acknowledgment to the honorable gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL) for the epecumium which he has been pleased to bestow upon the State of Connecticut, from which I am a representative. That gentleman observed that the State of Connecticut, although distinguished for its general disapprobation of the measures of the present Administration, was no less so for its uniform obedience to the laws, not only of its own, but of the General Government. The remark was particularly grateful, because I believe it to be just, and because it is so rare that this State receives anything like commendation from the quarter from whence it came. I have sometimes heard gentlemen on that side express a benevolent concern lest the liberties of the State should be lost for the want of a written constitution, or by the overwhelming influence of the clergy. But this is the first time that I have ever heard even one of its steady habits commended within the walls of this House.

But it cannot escape the discernment of that and every gentleman acquainted with the human character, that the same honorable and intelligent spirit, which ordinarily induces a prompt and principled obedience to the acts of Government, is not easily to be subdued or controlled, when once roused to resistance by such as may be deemed unconstitutional or too oppressive to be borne. Sir, the free and enlightened citizens of that or any other State, are not, I presume, yet prepared to bend their necks to the yoke of military despotism.

I had contemplated, Mr. Speaker, making some more specific objections to what I consider the most exceptionable and dangerous provisions of this bill. But I shall not at this time attempt it. And I feel the less disposition to do it, as the different sections of the bill have been so ably and particularly commented upon by several gentlemen who preceded me. If what has already been urged is not sufficient to satisfy this House of the extreme impolicy and injustice of passing this bill, I certainly should despair of doing it. It does appear to me that it has been clearly shown that this bill goes to subject our coasting trade to restrictions not only vexatious but ruinous. To expose the persons and property of our citizens to innumerable insults and injuries, while it deprives them of the ordinary means of redress; to render the civil subordinate to the military power; and, in fine, to a violation of some of the most sacred principles of the Constitution.

JANUARY, 1809.

Enforcing the Embargo.

H. OF R.

But, say gentlemen, if the embargo is to be continued, it must, at all events, be enforced; and the moment the embargo ceases you must have war. I know that we were informed at an early period of the session by our Committee of Foreign relations that we had no alternative but embargo or war, for of submission I shall say nothing. Too much has already been said upon that subject. Sir, I consider it as a cause of very deep regret that we should be reduced to this deplorable dilemma—that we must either have a war with both the belligerents, or a continuance of the present system.

But when I found further, by that report, that the policy pointed out was to persist in the embargo until its inefficiency should be fully proved—and that the evidence of this fact was daily accumulating, none could deny—it really reminded me of the sage advice which I once knew very generally given: that of two evils, it was best to choose them both, and then you would be sure to have the right.

But I would ask gentlemen who are continually proclaiming that war or embargo are our only alternatives, whether, in case we should not be able to accomplish our wishes, and bring our enemies to terms in that way, we are again to have recourse to embargo? Yes, I am answered by an honorable gentleman, (Mr. CLAY,) from Virginia. Very well, sir, then I understand the system, and I imagine by the time we shall have rung the changes of embargo and war and war and embargo for ten or fifteen years, whatever our wise politicians and philosophers may think, our poets and bards will at least have done singing "Hail Columbia, happy land!" But, sir, I do not believe in the necessity of either of these alternatives. War may be held up in terrorem to reconcile the people to a continuance of the embargo; and this, I have the charity to believe, is all that is meant, by the constant clamor which is made upon that subject.

I have always cherished a belief that, although in the extraordinary conflict in which Great Britain has been engaged—a conflict, as she says, for her existence—she may have been too regardless of our rights as a neutral nation, and has, doubtless, done us many wrongs, yet that an amicable and honorable adjustment, might have been had of all our differences. The door of conciliation is still open, and it is no less for her interest to be on friendly terms with us than it is for ours to be at peace with her.

As to France, we have little to fear from her in the present state of things. And whether we are at war or peace with her will make no difference in her treatment of us. When she is disposed to take our property, and can lay her hands upon it, a pretext will not be wanting. The most solemn treaties, we have ample proof, afford no security.

Sir, I believe that the embargo might be taken off without necessarily involving us in a war, or subjecting us to dishonor.

That we might have some commerce which would not be affected either by the British Orders in Council or the French Decrees, is not denied. With respect to the extent of this commerce, there exists a difference of opinion. But I am persuaded it would be much more considerable than many gentlemen are willing to concede. At all events, I am disposed to make the experiment. I am at least for giving the nation a breathing spell. Instead of adding another link to the chain, I am for breaking the shackles which we have already imposed upon our commerce. Our affairs, I have no doubt, would soon assume a very different aspect. Our enterprising citizens would extend the commerce of our country far beyond our present expectations; and through the channel of that commerce our revenue would again be revived. The body politic would be invigorated, individual industry encouraged, and the nation in some degree restored to its former prosperous and flourishing state. But so long as you continue this deadly embargo, so long you can expect nothing but an increase of the distresses and complaints of your citizens. And this may not be all. It becomes gentlemen who appear so zealously determined to pass and enforce the provisions of this bill, well to consider the hazardous experiment they are about making, lest the blow which they are aiming at the liberties of a generous and enlightened people should recoil upon their own head, and, instead of producing the submission which is expected, should prostrate the power of the Administration.

Mr. GARDENIER opposed the bill.

Mr. DANA moved to strike out the 11th section, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land and naval forces or militia of the United States, or of the Territories thereof, as may be judged necessary in conformity with the provisions of this and other acts respecting the embargo, for the purpose of preventing the illegal departure of any ship or vessel, or of detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody, any ship or vessel, or of taking into custody and guarding any specie, or articles of domestic growth, produce, or manufacture; and, also, for the purpose of preventing and suppressing any armed or riotous assemblage of persons resisting the custom-house officers in the exercise of their duties, or in any manner opposing the execution of the laws laying an embargo, or otherwise violating, or assisting and abetting violations of the same."

And on the question to agree to the amendment, it passed in the negative—yeas 31, nays 70, as follows:

And the House adjourned, a little after daylight, till Saturday.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act making a further appropriation towards completing the two wings of the Capitol at the City of Washington, and for other purposes;" also, a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria to alter their style and firm, and to insure against loss by fire;" to which bills, respectively, the Senate desire the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with a statement of the sums annually received at the Treasury of the United States since the commencement of proceedings under the Constitution; and also a statement exhibiting the annual amount of the respective branches of the customs, and the charges thereon, in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the twentieth ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a statement of the works of defence which it has been thought necessary to provide, in the first instance, for the security of our seaports, towns, and harbors, and of the progress towards their completion. The Message and a report from the Secretary of War on the subject of fortifications, which accompanied the same, were read, and referred to the committee appointed the eleventh of November last, on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session, as relates to the Military and Naval Establishments.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury accompanying his report on the petition of Mary Miller and

10th CON. 2d Sess.—33

Anne Hampton, referred to him by order of the House, on the thirtieth ultimo; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers:'" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the said amendments.

MILITARY OFFICERS.

Mr. VAN DYKE observed that, as an increase of our military force seemed to be contemplated, it would, no doubt, be desirable to have all information on the subject, and for this purpose he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House a list of the names and number of officers, and the number of non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, belonging to each of the regiments of the United States, noting the number now wanting to complete the same; and also a list of the names and number of officers appointed under an act of the last session, entitled "An act to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force," and the number of men that have been enlisted pursuant to the provision of said act.

It was suggested by Messrs. W. ALSTON, EPPES, GEORGE W. CAMPBELL, FINDLEY, DAWSON, and RHEA of Tennessee, that all the information the gentleman wished might be had by him on application to the Department of War; and that an official statement would answer no other good purpose than to expose to our enemies an exact statement of the amount, and precise nature of our regular force. Such a thing was said to be unprecedented, as an official list of the names of all the officers of a nation having been thus communicated to foreign Powers.

The resolution was disagreed to by the House.

EXTRA SESSION OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SMILIE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the propriety of providing by law for the meeting of Congress at an earlier period than the first Monday in December next, with leave to report by bill, or otherwise."

On this motion a debate of three hours took place. Of this debate we can give no more than sufficient to mark its spirit.

Mr. SMILIE observed that, on reflection, every gentleman must be convinced that both our internal and external situation rendered it proper that Congress should be convened earlier than the usual time.

Mr. MACON said that, as the Constitution had given to the President a power to call Congress whenever he should judge it expedient, and as the President would have a full knowledge of the state of our foreign relations, he was willing to leave the power with him, believing that, if necessary, he would not fail to exercise it. He was also opposed to adopting this resolution at this time, because, in six weeks hence, it would be time enough to propose it.

H. OF R.

Extra Session of Congress.

Mr. SOUTHARD observed that the resolution but proposed an inquiry, and no one would commit himself, by voting for it, to vote for an earlier meeting than usual.

Mr. DURELL was opposed to this resolution; for he had no idea of closing the session, without taking further steps in regard to our foreign relations.

Mr. HOLLAND thought the resolution wholly premature.

Mr. TALLMADGE was also opposed to the resolution. He conceived that the House had better proceed in the business which lay before them. When they had progressed farther, they might be much better able to decide this question.

Mr. NICHOLAS said that, if, instead of a resolution, this was a bill on its third reading, he was ready to vote for it. He lamented that the term of service of the present Congress expired as early as the fourth day of March. He wished it to meet as soon after as practicable. He alluded to the State of Tennessee's not choosing its Representatives in Congress before August. He said it would be an embarrassing thing to convene Congress before the Governor of that State could convene the Legislature, to provide for an earlier election, and supply the representation of that important State. Admit that the present Congress were to declare war, no gentleman would deny that Congress ought to convene earlier than usual. If it were not done this session, he would, long before the first of December, give his vote for changing the attitude of the nation. The experiment which we were now making would have been continued as far as justifiable before that time. He said he would not trust the discretion of any one man, under these circumstances, to convene Congress; though he had as much confidence in the person whose duty it would be, as any one man ought to have in another.

Mr. DANA said he had not the slightest suspicion of any intention in the present Congress to declare war. Even the inhabitants of Bedlam would refuse to concur in such a project. He really had no idea of it. He wished the country not to be continually alarmed by these war speeches. Keep out of war if you can, said he; if not, go into it; do not look at it, and proclaim it as so horrible a thing. He was in favor of this resolution, because it was for an inquiry; and he might possibly vote for the bill when reported.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS opposed the resolution. Every circumstance, he said, showed that Great Britain predicated her measures on an idea of our want of stability. He wished not to accomplish her expectations by an early session. If the extra session were proposed with a view to war, it was extremely injudicious; if with a view to the repeal of the embargo, it was equally injurious, as it indicated to our enemies the period at which one measure should commence, or the other cease. He wished to hold on to the embargo; he had no doubt of its proving effectual. If any change of our situation should take place, the Constitution had vested in the head of our foreign relations a power to call Congress.

Mr. STORY had no idea of the resolution producing the effect anticipated by Mr. WILLIAMS. He would be the last man to doubt the ability or integrity of the Administration; but why throw the responsibility on his shoulders? Why shrink from it themselves? When they alone were vested with the power to declare war, why not listen to the warning voice of Providence, attend at their posts, and prepare a whole system which should call for the active co-operation of the people? Did Congress mean to say that the embargo should be co-existent with the Orders in Council? that it was to endure forever? He trusted and believed that this was not the sentiment of any gentleman who occupied a seat on this floor. The time was fast approaching when this measure must give way to one of a more energetic character. And he distinctly understood that it was contemplated that Congress should convene at an early period for discussing this subject. Was Great Britain so totally unacquainted with the subject as not to know that this body had the power to declare war? Certainly not. So far, then, as the call of an extra session could influence Great Britain and France, it would go far to convince them that submission would not be the course of men whose hearts were in their country, and who had their country in their hearts. Mr. S. made some remarks, tending to show that the councils of the mother country were not guided by the cool dictates of reason. When Great Britain lost, as a great statesman had observed, "the brightest jewel of the British Crown," the helm of State was under the guide of an able ministry, but who took council of their passions rather than of their reason. No dependence was, therefore, to be placed on her sense of justice or interest. We must resort at last, to the ultima ratio regum, and we ought to prepare for it.

Mr. BIBB wished foreign nations to know that, unless they changed their measures, we would adopt some other measure. He wished the resolution to be adopted, that the people of the United States might know that the time was not far distant when a change of measures would take place.

Mt. G. W. CAMPBELL was in favor of the resolution. He wished the nation to understand that its Representatives would meet here at an early period; that they would meet the day of danger, and be ready to take stronger measures. He cared not how soon foreign nations knew it. It was high time that they should know it. Mr. C. adverted to Mr. DANA's observations, in relation to the madness of the idea of the present Congress declaring war. He observed that the gentleman had but a few days ago voted, that the nation could not submit to the edicts of the belligerents. The gentleman had also expressed an opinion, that the attack on the Chesapeake was cause of war. He could not, therefore, suppose that to resist by war these accumulated injuries would appear strange to the gentleman.

Navigation Laws.

H. or R.

Mr. TROUP was in favor of the resolution. He regretted not any effect it would have on foreign nations. If Great Britain had rather have war than embargo, said he, let her have it; and let her see that we can be as formidable to her, as an adversary in war, as we are as a rival in peace.

Mr. BACON supported the resolution. He said he had given votes at the present session which he should have given with reluctance, but for the belief that an extra session would take place; and measures were now pending before the House, for which he should vote with reluctance, but under this expectation.

Mr. EPPES said he was not for adhering to the embargo until December; he did not believe that it would comport with the honor or interest of the United States to adhere to it so long. He had declared by his vote that he would not repeal the embargo on the fourth of March, and he was still of the same opinion. But long before the first of December, he said, he should be prepared to substitute another measure in its place.

Mr. J. JACKSON expressed nearly the same sentiments as Mr. EPPES. He did not know whether it would be proper to continue the embargo longer than the first of June.

Mr. DANA observed, that this nation would never go to war, except the objects for which it went to war were distinctly marked and defined; because a war would not otherwise be popular; and a war declared by this Government, to be effectual, must be followed by the general sense of the people. Mr. D. examined some of the points in controversy, and made some observations in relation to the principle, that the American flag should protect all persons sailing under it.

Mr. ALEXANDER moved that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR was in favor of the resolution. The invasion of Canada could not be authorized without an extra session, nor regular force sufficient for offensive operations be organized. The object for which the nation might now justly go to war was sufficiently defined. The gentleman himself (Mr. DANA) had, by his vote, declared it, and the nation had followed their Representatives in the declaration.

Mr. NICHOLAS said he had thought, and still believed, the embargo to have been the best measure which could have been adopted. It had answered every purpose as a precautionary measure; and he believed it would have operated coercively on the principal aggressor on our rights, and in saying so he had no fear of being accused of undue partiality, if every man in the nation had been faithful to his country, and had it not been for circumstances which we could not control. Those who had violated the embargo, those who had encouraged violations of it, he said, were responsible for its failure, if it did fail; those who told the people that it was to subserve the interests of the South; that it was intended to destroy commerce and promote manufactures. Nothing but extreme ignorance could have produced such an idea; for manufactures neither did nor could exist to any extent in the country whose interests were said to have been intended to be promoted. He thought that Congress ought to meet about the 15th of May or 1st of June; that the embargo ought to be continued until the country was in a state of defence, and until means of offence were at hand.

The question on the resolution's lying on the table was negatived—ayes 19. The question on the resolution was carried—62 to 21.

MONDAY, JANUARY 9.

Another member, to wit: JOHN ROWAN, from Kentucky, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

On motion of Mr. STORY,

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to report a bill to this House, authorizing the transmission, by mail, free of postage, of the President's Message of the twenty-third of December last past, and the documents accompanying the same, which have been printed by the Senate and House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL,

Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred, on the thirtieth of December last, a petition of sundry mariners, late masters and mates of vessels belonging to the port of Portland, in the district of Maine, be discharged from the consideration of the same.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of Marsham Waring, and others, inhabitants of the District of Columbia, praying that all executions which have been or may be awarded against the petitioners and other inhabitants of the said District, may be stayed during the continuance of the embargo and non-intercourse laws of the United States; or, that such other relief may be afforded in the premises as to the wisdom and justice of Congress shall seem meet.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill for the relief of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the late and present Army of the United States, reported several amendments thereto; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment of the Senate to the second amendment proposed by this House to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds, in certain cases, and for other purposes:—' Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the said amendment to the amendment.

NAVIGATION LAWS.

Mr. DANA said that, by the present laws of the United States, it was not necessary that an American vessel should carry a single American seaman. His object was to make some provision directly for the interest of American seamen, and which might incidentally contribute to their protection at sea. He wished to make it the interest of American merchants to employ American seamen. And, with these views, he offered the following resolution :

Resolved, That, for the benefit of the seamen of the United States, it is proper to make provision that American registered vessels, after a time to be limited by law, shall not continue to enjoy the benefits and privileges of American vessels, unless some of the mariners on board the same shall be citizens of the United States.

Mr. D. observed that, during the present suspension of navigation, it might be proper to adopt regulations of a permanent nature, to go into effect whenever it was resumed. He moved a reference of the resolution to a select committee, with liberty to report by bill or otherwise.

On the suggestion of Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS, with the consent of Mr. DANA, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DANA then observed that he wished to ascertain the whole number of naturalized seamen in the United States. He believed that, in the annual returns of seamen registered, a distinction was made between native and naturalized seamen. He conceived, therefore, that the following resolution would enable him to attain his object :

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to lay before this House a statement of the whole number of persons born in foreign countries, and legally admitted citizens of the United States by naturalization, who have been registered as American seamen and returned as such to the Department of State, according to the lists collected by the collectors of the customs, in pursuance of the law relative to the relief and protection of American seamen.

The resolution was agreed to.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill sent from the House for employing an additional number of seamen and marines, were taken up. [The amendments propose the immediate arming, manning, &c., all the armed vessels of the United States.]

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL expressed a hope that the House would disagree to the amendments. The President was already authorized by law to fit out these vessels, whenever, in his opinion, the public service should require it; and the expense which would attend them was a sufficient argument against it, if no urgent occasion existed for their service, which he believed did not.

Mr. STORY entertained a very different opinion from that of the gentleman from Tennessee. In case of war there must be some ships of war of one kind or other; and it would take six months at least to prepare all our ships for service. At present they were rotting in the docks. If it were never intended to use them, it would be better to burn them at once than to suffer them to remain in their present situation. He believed if out at sea they might be useful and would be well employed. Why keep them up at this place, whence they could not get out of the river perhaps in three weeks or a month? He believed that a naval force would form the most effectual protection to our seaports that could be devised. Part of our little navy was suffered to rot in the docks, and the other part was scarcely able to keep the ocean. Could not a single foreign frigate enter almost any of our harbors now and batter down our towns? Could not even a single gunboat sweep some of them? Mr. S. said he could not conceive why gentlemen should wish to paralyze the strength of the nation by keeping back our naval force, and now in particular, when many of our native seamen (and he was sorry to say that from his own knowledge he spoke it) were starving in our ports. Mr. S. enumerated some of the advantages which this country possessed in relation to naval force. For every ship which we employed on our coasts, he said, any foreign nation must incur a double expense to be able to cope with us. The truth was, that gentlemen well versed in the subject, had calculated that it would require, for a fleet competent to resist such a naval force as the United States might without difficulty provide, four or five hundred transport ships to supply them with provisions, the expense of which alone would be formidable as a coercive argument to Great Britain. He wished it to be shown, however small our naval force, that we do not undervalue it, or underrate the courage and ability of our seamen.

Mr. COOK followed Mr. STORY on the same side of the question. He compared the nation to a fortress on which an attack was made, and the garrison of which, instead of guarding the portal, ran upon the battlements to secure every small aperture. He thought their attention should first be directed to the gates, and that a naval force would be the most efficient defence for our ports.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays on the amendments.

Mr. SMILIE said that raising a naval force for the purpose of resisting Great Britain, would be attacking her on her strong ground. If we were to have a war with her on the ocean, it could only be carried on by distressing her trade. Neither did he believe that these vessels of war would be of any effect as a defence. They did not constitute the defence on which he would rely. If we had a navy, it would form the strongest temptation for attack upon our ports and harbors. If Denmark had possessed no navy, Copenhagen would never have been attacked. The only way in which we could carry on a war on the ocean to advantage, Mr. S. said, would be by our enterprising citizens, giving them sufficient encouragement. Were we to employ a naval force in case of war, it would but furnish our enemy with an addition to her navy. He hoped the House would disagree to the amendments of the Senate and appoint a committee of conference.

Mr. DANA said that the amendments sent from the Senate presented a question of no small importance to the nation. Without expressing any opinion on the question, it appeared to him to be at least of sufficient importance to be discussed in Committee of the Whole. Coming from the other branch of the Legislature, and being so interesting to the nation, he wished that it might be discussed fairly and fully; and, therefore, moved a reference to a Committee of the Whole.

Naval Establishment.

H. OF R.

Messrs. DANA, TALLMADGE, and STORY, urged a reference to a Committee of the Whole, on account of the great importance of the subject, on which a full discussion would be proper; and Messrs. MACON, G. W. CAMPBELL, and HOLLAND, opposed it, because the seamen proposed by the original bill were now wanted, and the subject of the amendment was already referred to a Committee of the Whole in a distinct bill. Motion lost, 58 to 55.

Mr. MACON observed, that the immediate expense of this arrangement, if agreed to, would be at least five or six millions of dollars, and but four hundred thousand were appropriated by the bill. When he compared this bill with the report of a select committee made to the House of Representatives, he said he was astonished. A part of that report was a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in which the very number (two thousand) contained in the bill as it went from this House, was desired. Mr. M. adverted to the observation of Mr. STORY, that it would cost Great Britain as much to keep one frigate as it would cost us to keep two. He thought the expense would be about equal. The expense of the transportation of provisions would be counterbalanced by the difference of expense between the pay of the British and American seamen, the latter being double of the former generally. He objected to this bill from the Senate because no estimate accompanied it. He thought they would go far enough if they gave the Departments all that they asked. This House had indeed as much right to judge of the force requisite, as any other department; but he did not wish to be called upon to supply a deficit in the appropriation, which never failed to occur even in the ordinary appropriations for the Navy Department. Give the four hundred thousand dollars asked for, and the deficit in the appropriation will be at least ten times the amount of the sum appropriated.

Mr. COOK contended strenuously in favor of a naval force. He detailed the advantages which would accrue to the nation from a few fast sailing frigates. He said they were essentially necessary to defence. He expatiated on the difficulty with which any foreign Power could maintain a force on our coast.

Mr. HOLLAND did not profess to have much knowledge on this subject, but he said it did not require much to overthrow the arguments of gentlemen on the subject. What defence a few frigates would be to the extensive coast of this country, he could not understand. There certainly never had been a time when this country should rely on a maritime force as a sufficient protection. Indeed, he said, if we had fifteen or twenty or more sail-of-the-line, he should hesitate much before he would go to war with Great Britain, because these would undoubtedly be lost. Our power of coercion was not on the ocean. Great Britain had possessions on this Continent which were valuable to her; they were in the power of the United States, and the way to coerce her to respect our rights on water would be attacking them on land. He said, he certainly did not undervalue the disposition and prowess of our seamen; and it was because he valued them, that he did not wish them to go into an unequal contest, in which they must certainly yield. Gentlemen might understand naval matters; but it was no reason that they should therefore understand the efficiency of a naval force. There was sufficient evidence in history to warn the United States against it.

Mr. DAWSON moved that the bill should lie on the table till the amendments of the Senate could be printed. Motion lost—yeas 40, nays 78, as follows:

Mr. TROUP said he rose but for the purpose of stating facts which struck him as being applicable to the subject before the House. He referred chiefly to an extract of a letter written to himself and published in the paper of to-day. [Mr. T. then read the extract which appeared in the National Intelligencer on the 9th instant.] In addition to these facts, letters had been received, in the course of this morning, containing further particulars, which he begged leave to state to the House. After the officer (commander of a British armed vessel) had been forced on board his vessel, and while lying in our waters and within our jurisdiction, he had fired several shots at pilot-boats, passing and repassing, had been very abusive, and threatened the town with what he called vengeance; and, in addition to these facts, letters had reached Savannah from Liverpool, giving satisfactory information that vessels of fifteen or twenty guns had been fitted out for the purpose of forcing a cotton trade with South Carolina and Georgia. This information, Mr. T. said, came from unquestionable authority. And it was because he was unwilling that the people of this country should longer submit to the abuse of British naval officers; because he was unwilling that they should be exposed to the insolence of every British commissioned puppy who chose to insult us; because he was unwilling that armed vessels should force a cotton trade, when every man knew that nine-tenths of the people of Georgia would treat as traitors the violators of the embargo; it was for this reason that he was disposed to vote for the amendments from the Senate. The great objection which had been taken to them was the expense which they would produce. Economy, Mr. T. said, was a good thing in time of peace; but if this contracted spirit of economy predominated in our war councils, if we were forced into a war, so help him God, he would rather at once tamely submit our honor and independence than maintain them in this economical way. If we went to war, we ought not to adopt little measures for the purpose of executing them with little means; neither should we refuse to adopt great measures, because they could not be executed but with great means. It was very true that, in war as well as in peace, calculation to a certain extent was necessary; but, if they once resolved on an object, it must be executed at whatever expense. He was no advocate for standing armies or navies, generally speaking; but, in discharging his duties here, he must be governed by the circumstances of every case which presented itself for his decision, and then ask himself, Is it wise, politic, and prudent, to do this or omit that? He said he would never go back to yesterday to discover what he had then said or done, in order to ascertain what he should now do or say. Political conduct must depend on circumstances. What was right yesterday might be wrong to-day. Nay, what was right at the moment he rose to address the House, might, ere this, be palpably wrong. Conduct depended on events, which depended on the folly or caprice of men; and, as they changed, events would change. It might have been a good doctrine long ago that this country ought to have a navy competent to cope with a detachment of the British navy; it might have been good doctrine then, but was shocking doctrine now.

At that time England had to contend with the navies of Russia, Denmark, France, Holland, Spain, &c. Now England was sole mistress of the ocean. To fight her ship to ship and man to man, and it was impossible that gentlemen could think of fighting her otherwise, if they fought her at all, we must build up a huge navy at an immense expense. We must determine to become less agricultural and more commercial; to incur a debt of five hundred or a thousand million of dollars, and all the loans and taxes attendant on such a system, and all the corruption attendant on them. He should as soon think of embarking an hundred thousand men for the purpose of attacking France at her threshold, as of building so many ships to oppose the British navy. It was out of the question; no rational man could think of it. But that was not now the question. It was, whether we would call into actual service the little navy we possessed. It was not even a question whether we would have a navy at all or not. If that were the question, he would not hesitate to say that even our present political condition required a navy to a certain extent, to protect our commerce against the Barbary Powers in peace, and in time of war for convoys to our merchantmen. He only meant a few fast sailing frigates, such a navy as we have at present, for the purpose of harassing the commerce of our enemies also. He therefore thought our present naval force ought to be put in service. As far as the appropriation ($400,000) would go, it would be employed; but if Congress should hereafter see cause to countermand or delay the preparation, they would have it in their power to do so by refusing a further appropriation.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said it was his misfortune to differ with gentlemen upon all points on the subject of the navy. He was opposed to it from stem to stern; and gentlemen who attempted to argue in favor of it as a matter of necessity, involved themselves in absurdities, they were not aware of. When money had been appropriated for fortifications, there had been no intimation that it would be necessary to prop them up with a naval force. If our towns could not be defended by fortifications, he asked, would ten frigates defend them? The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. STORY) had even gone so far as to say that a single gunboat could sweep one-half of our harbors. If a single gunboat could now sweep most of our harbors, Mr. W. said he should like to know what eleven hundred and thirty vessels of war could do, even when opposed by our whole force of ten frigates! The gentleman from Massachusetts had said it would be cheaper to keep these vessels in actual service than in their present situation. Mr. W. said he supposed that the gentlemen meant that they would rot faster in their present situation than if they were at sea. He said he was for keeping them where they were, and would rather contribute to place them in a situation where they would rot faster. Mr. W. combated the arguments that employing the navy would afford relief to our seamen, and that the maintaining a navy on our coast would be more expensive to an European Power than the support of a larger naval force by us. And he said we should never be able to man any considerable fleet except the Constitution were amended to permit impressments, following the example of Great Britain.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. STORY)

had said that except we begun with this bill, and got his fast sailing frigates, we should never regain our rights. If that were really the case, Mr. W. said he was ready to abandon them. He considered that the sort of maintenance of our rights adverted to by the gentlemen from Massachusetts, would be destructive to those rights. Gentlemen must have forgotten that when Hamburg was in the greatest state of prosperity, she did not possess even a single gunboat. Why! there was not wealth enough in this whole nation, if every one were to carry his all, thus to maintain our rights against the navy of Great Britain. If we were carried into a war, and everything really seemed to be tending that way, we must rely upon the enterprise of our citizens; and that, when set at liberty, would be found more desperate than the navy of any country. When we arrived at the end of the Revolutionary war we had but one frigate, and the best thing we ever did was to give that one away. The State of South Carolina had not yet got clear of the curse. She embarked one frigate in the general struggle, and she had not rid herself of the debts incurred by it yet. Private enterprise must be depended upon. The people from the Eastward had shown in the last war what they would do. When vessels were loaded with sugar they would fight like bull-dogs for it. He recollected a story, he said, of one of our privateers being beat off by a Jamaican, whom they attacked. The captain not liking to lose the prize, and finding his crew disheartened, told them she was full of sugar. "Is she?" said they "by G—d let us at them again." They scarcely ever failed in their enterprises.

In allusion to the case at Savannah, Mr. W. regretted that an insult should be offered to the people of the country. The insult at Savannah had by this time been redressed, he had no doubt. He had no information to induce him to believe so, but the knowledge that the sloop of war Hornet was stationed off Charleston, and of course cruised near the place. The Hornet was perfectly adequate to drive any vessel of twenty guns out of our waters. She was one of the best vessels of the United States, and as well officered as any. [Mr. TROUP observed that the Hornet was off Charleston. Now, he wanted a frigate at Savannah.] Mr. W. said that Savannah was the very place where gunboats would be perfectly effectual. He meant to make no reflection against the proposer of the gunboat system, but he did against those who had only given one-half of the system, and omitted the other—the marine militia. And now, when an attack was menaced at Savannah, gentlemen wanted a frigate! If nine-tenths of the people were opposed to the evasions of the embargo law, Mr. W. said it would not be evaded. The evaders would be considered as traitors—as the worst of traitors. As to preparing a force for the protection of navigation, the gentleman from Georgia must well know that the whole revenue of the United States would not be competent to maintain a sufficient number of vessels to convoy our merchantmen.

Mr. W. concluded by saying, that he wished the nation to be protected, and its wrongs to be redressed; but when he reflected that at Castine the soil had been most abominably violated, he could not view the insults in our waters as being equal to it; for, said he, touch the soil and you touch the life-blood of every man in it.

Mr. DURELL considered the present subject as one of the most important which had been introduced at this session. It would indeed be difficult to reason gentlemen into a modification of a principle to which they were opposed throughout; but he trusted that this House was not generally so disposed. He believed that a large majority of the House were at the present moment in favor of embargo or war, because the House had been so distinctly told by a committee on our foreign relations, that there was no alternative but submission; and almost every gentleman who had the honor of a seat within these walls, had committed himself on the subject, either to persevere in the embargo, or to resort to war. What would be the object of a war? Not the right of the soil, not our territorial limits, but the right of navigating the ocean. Were we to redress those wrongs, those commercial injuries, on the land? Not altogether, he conceived. Would it be good policy, he asked, to let our means of carrying on war on the ocean rot in our docks, and not make use of them? These vessels would also be useful as a defence. Why then should they not be manned and put in readiness for service? It was said that we could not cope with the British navy. Mr. D. said this argument proved too much, if it proved anything. If he did not feel perfectly comfortable in a cold day, should he therefore divest himself of all clothing? Why send out the sloop of war Hornet, alluded to by the gentleman last up—why rely upon it for redressing the insult at Savannah, if naval force was useless? It was no reason, because Great Britain had more vessels than we, that we should not use what we had. Indeed those gentlemen who objected to naval force, appeared to be mostly from the interior, and of course could not properly estimate its value.

Mr. SAWYER was wholly opposed to the amendments from the Senate. The objection to this particular increase of naval force on the score of expense, was not to be disregarded. He called the attention of gentlemen to the state of the Treasury. The expense of this system would be three millions; and when this sum was added to other sums which would be requisite if measures now pending were adopted, it would render it necessary for Congress now to borrow money on the credit of posterity. The expedient of direct taxation would not be resorted to. It had already been the death-blow to the political existence of one administration. This Government, he said, was founded on public opinion, and whenever the approbation of the people was withdrawn, from whatever cause, the whole superstructure must fall.

Mr. S. dwelt at some length on the disadvantage of loans. He said, if this nation was destined to raise a navy for the protection of com merce, it should have begun earlier, in the year 1793, when such outrageous violations had been committed on our commerce. The expense of such an establishment would have far exceeded the amount in value of captures made since that period. He concluded, from a number of observations which he made on this subject, that, on the score of the protection of trade, it would not be proper to fit out a navy. This proposition, he said, was the mere entering wedge. The system was either unnecessary, or would be wholly futile in practice. Our seamen would cost us at least double of what is the expense of her seamen to Great Britain; and it required her utmost exertions to pay the interest of the enormous debt with which her unwieldy navy had saddled her. He therefore certainly thought that an attempt to justify it on the score of profit would not succeed. He deprecated the extension of Executive patronage, which would result from an increase of the Naval Establishment. Need he go back, he asked, to the time when the black cockade was necessary, in some parts of the country, to secure a man from insult from the officers of the navy? He wished to limit the Executive patronage; to adhere closely to the maxims of our forefathers. By sending out a navy, too, he said, we should volunteer to support the ascendancy of the British navy, become the mere jackals of the British lion. Mr. S. went at some length into an examination of the former Administration in relation to a navy. There was nothing, he observed, in the nature of our Government, or of our foreign relations, to require a navy. If we could not carry on foreign commerce without a navy, he wished to have less of it and more of internal commerce, of that commerce which the natural advantages of the country would support between different parts of it. If we were to build a navy for the protection of foreign commerce, we should throw away our natural advantages for the sake of artificial ones. He was in favor of the embargo at present. There was more virtue in our barrels of flour as to coercion than in all the guns of our navy; and we had lately given our adversaries a supplementary broadside, which he hoped would tell well. Mr. S. stated the origin and progress of navies at some length, commencing with the Republic of Genoa. Our chief reliance as to defence must be on our militia. So little did Great Britain now rely on her navy for defence of her soil, that she had called upon every man in the country to be at his post, if danger came. Other nations might be justified in supporting a naval force, because they had colonies separated from them by the sea, with whom they were obliged to have means of intercourse, but we had not that apology for a navy. Mr. S. concluded his observations, after speaking near an hour, not, he said, that he had gone through the subject; but, as it was late in the day, he yielded the floor to some other gentleman.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said, that gentlemen should not be influenced, in discussing the present question, by a belief that they were now discussing the propriety of raising a naval force for offensive purposes. This was not the question. It was only whether, at this crisis, the House would employ a little force for the purpose of resisting attacks made on our territory at home. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) had said that an attack on the soil touched the life-blood of every man in it. Yes, Mr. J. said, it did; whether the invasion was on our jurisdiction, on land or water, it touched equally the life-blood of the nation. He would as soon resist an attack on our territorial jurisdiction on sea as on land. It made no difference with him whether a foreign frigate came up to the piles of Potomac bridge and fired over into the town, or whether its crew came on shore and assaulted us with the bayonet. The territory, he said, was equally invaded in either case. Were we not to resist Great Britain because of her 1,130 sail of armed vessels? This would amount to a declaration that we must succumb to her, because she could at any time send a squadron sufficient to destroy our naval force at a single blow. This was the tendency of the argument. Mr. J. said it would be more honorable to fight, while a single gun could be fired, notwithstanding her overwhelming force. This mode of reasoning had a tendency to destroy the spirit of the people. He would never consent to crouch before we were conquered; this was not the course of our Revolutionary patriots, and he trusted it was one which we should not follow. He would rather, like the heroic band of Leonidas, perish in the combat, although the force of the enemy was irresistible, than acknowledge that we would submit. This naval force was not, however, intended to cope with the navy of Great Britain, but to chastise the petty pirates who trespassed on our jurisdiction; pirates, he called them, because the British Government had not sanctioned their acts. It had not justified the murder of Pierce, or asserted the right of jurisdiction claimed by an officer within the length of his buoys, &c., because, if she had, it would have then been war. For this reason he wished our little pigmy force to be sent on the ocean, notwithstanding the giant navy of Great Britain. Some gentlemen had opposed this on the score of expense. Our most valuable treasure, Mr. J. said, was honor; and the House had almost unanimously declared that it could not submit without a sacrifice of that honor.

A motion was now made to adjourn, and carried—47 to 29.

TUESDAY, January 10.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act making a further appropriation towards completing the two wings of the Capitol at the City of Washington, and for other purposes," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented a petition of sundry officers of the Virginia line of the late Revolutionary army, praying that such compensation may be made as may be equivalent to the respective services and losses of the petitioners, in the capacity aforesaid.—Referred to the committee appointed, the twenty-sixth ultimo, on the memorials and petitions of the late officers of the said Revolutionary army.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria to alter their style and firm, and insure against loss by fire," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

On motion of Mr. NELSON,

Ordered, That the amendments reported, yesterday, from the select committee to whom was recommitted the bill for the relief of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the late and of the present army of the United States, which lay on the table, be committed, together with the bill, to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, presented a bill to authorize the transportation of certain documents, by mail, free of postage; which was read three times and passed.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a representation of sundry inhabitants of Townsend, in the county of Middlesex, and State of Massachusetts, stating certain objections to the manner of appointing Electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the said State of Massachusetts; and praying the interference of the powers vested by the Constitution in the two Houses of Congress, to prevent the establishment of a precedent which, in their opinion, will have a dangerous tendency; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. DANA,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the propriety of amending the law relative to bonds which may be required for enrolled or licensed vessels of the United States, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The House proceeded to consider a resolution proposed, yesterday, by Mr. DANA, and ordered to lie on the table; the same being amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That, for the benefit of the seamen of the United States, it is proper to make provision that registered ships and vessels, after a time to be limited by law, shall not continue to enjoy the benefits and privileges appertaining to ships or vessels of the United States, unless a certain proportion of the mariners on board the same shall be citizens of the United States.

Ordered, That the said resolution be referred to Messrs. DANA, DAVID R. WILLIAMS, QUINCY, MUMFORD, and MCCREERY, with leave to report thereon by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of the Pastor and Committee of the Presbyterian Congregation, in the town of Alexandria, in behalf of themselves and others, praying that an act of Congress may be passed for incorporating the congregation aforesaid, under such terms and provisions as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. VAN HORN,

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire what amendments are necessary in the act concerning the District of Columbia.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines." The first amendment, which was depending yesterday, at the time of adjournment, being again read—

Mr. LYON was in favor of the amendment because it proposed an appropriation of a less sum of money than that sent from this House; and it would require the Executive to call upon the next House of Representatives for further appropriation, before it could be carried into effect, and the subject would then be completely in the power of the House.

Mr. UPHAM was against the amendment. He was as much desirous of relieving our seamen as any gentleman; but, if there was no occasion for the employment of a naval force, he would not vote for it merely to employ idle and starving men. He considered this amendment as a part of the great system for enforcing the embargo, for destroying commerce instead of protecting it. He considered the first embargo perpetual, and Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, for carrying it into effect, of the same nature; and the law lately passed, more unconstitutional than any. He considered it the worst law ever passed under the Constitution.

[The SPEAKER here called Mr. UPHAM to order, as wandering from the subject under debate.]

Mr. J. MONTGOMERY observed that the phraseology of the law was different from any other law on this subject.

Mr. UPHAM observed that he had not relinquished the floor. He considered the last embargo law as more unconstitutional than any other. [Mr. U. was called to order by Mr. JACKSON on the same grounds as by the Speaker.] Mr. U. said that he went on the ground that the law was unconstitutional, and that this bill was to enforce it. [The Speaker permitting Mr. U. to proceed, Mr. JACKSON appealed from the decision of the Chair. This mode of discussion was not in order. He did not, however persist in his appeal.] Mr. U. proceeded in explanation of his remarks. Mr. U. made further remarks on the law passed a few days ago, which, he said, he considered an unconstitutional law; that it laid the axe at the root of civil liberty, and, therefore, he would not consent to vote for this bill for enforcing it. Believing the embargo laws to be unconstitutional, and this bill intended to enforce them, he therefore would not vote for it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY offered an amendment to the amendment of the Senate, making it discretionary with the Executive to arm, fit, and send out the frigates, &c.

Mr. LOVE observed that the adoption of the amendment would render it difficult to ascertain the appropriation which would be necessary for the object.

Mr. DAWSON observed that a law already in force, contained precisely the same power as proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL observed that the adoption of the amendment would not preclude the President from putting the frigates in service immediately, if required. He was willing to adopt the amendment, because a doubt seemed to exist whether the Executive now possessed the power of calling the frigates into service. Without the amendment just proposed, he could not vote for the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. COOK hoped it would not be adopted, because it would divest the bill of the little energy it possessed, and would render it nugatory.

Mr. NEWTON observed that he represented a part of the country where, in case of war, an attack would probably first be made. To the defence of this town, (Norfolk,) a few frigates would be of great service. It was the opinion, he said, of the best informed men that a few frigates, combined with natural advantages, would prevent the town from suffering from attack by sea. Mr. N. believed that the President would consider himself equally bound, whether the amendment were adopted or not, if the bill, as amended, should pass. He adverted to the argument of expense, which, he said, should be of no weight. Mr. N. was proceeding in commenting on the measures of the preceding Administration, in respect to naval force, when he was called to order by the Speaker. He said that this was not a system for enforcing the embargo. It was necessary to order our frigates from the Eastern Branch to the ocean, to protect our coasts from insult. He alluded to the affair lately taken place at Savannah, and observed that, to repel this species of marauding, the Navy of the United States ought to be at the disposal of the President. If they were to decide on incurring an expense which he considered necessary for preparation for war, it might be a means of preventing war; it would convince the nations of Europe, that we were determined effectually to resist; would tell them that if they wished to resume relations of amity with us, they must make overtures, which, when made by us, had been so insultingly received. From what he could understand, the people of the United States looked to Congress for vigorous measures, and if such were not taken, would be grievously disappointed. We, said Mr. N., are the first whom the storm of war would reach; we, (his constituents,) are to be the first sufferers, and we only ask of the Congress of the United States to enable us to make a glorious defence.

Mr. DANA said he should think it rather more expedient for the Congress of the United States to decide this question. Which ever way the President should decide, he might act wrong, in the opinion of those particularly attached to him; and to those who were not, might afford grounds for censure. He thought it proper that the new President of the United States, be he whom he might, should come into office under favorable circumstances in relation to public opinion. He alluded to the difference of opinion, in different parts of the Union, on the subject of naval establishments. It had been supposed by some gentlemen that there might be occasion for this force in May or June. He said it would require considerable time to furnish all the sails, rigging, &c., for a vessel of war, at this place especially; and, if these vessels were necessary, it would be more correct that the House should decide this question, and not throw it on the President. How the amendment of the Senate ought to be decided, he did not say.

The amendment of Mr. MONTGOMERY was negatived, yeas 30.

Mr. TALLMADGE, circumstanced as he was in relation to the bill, could not vote for the amendment of the Senate. Strongly in favor of having the frigates removed from this place to some place where they might be efficient, he wished a bill for that purpose to pass. This had been his uniform opinion. An inducement with him to vote for this bill, Mr. T. said, was the present situation of the seamen of the United States. But, when he considered that we had upwards of one hundred and seventy gunboats—so great a proportion of this inefficient mode of defence—he could not, in conscience, vote for it, nor ever would. He spoke in a qualified sense; for, in all shallow waters, he would give to gentlemen, as far as his vote would go, the whole number they wanted. But, when he saw that this was to be the great naval preparation, he could not sanction it. He therefore moved to strike out "and gunboats."

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL hoped the House would not agree to the amendment, because it must directly tie the hands of the Executive from employing the gunboats at all.

Mr. TALLMADGE said that was not his object. Wherever they could be effectual, he was willing to employ them.

Mr. NEWTON was of the same opinion with the gentleman from Tennessee. Gunboats were an excellent defence for rivers, and for co-operation with fortifications. They were never intended for sea, but to be used in smooth water. Let it be recollected, said Mr. N., that no man can say how long we shall have peace. Gentlemen from every quarter had declared that war must take place, if reparation for our injuries were not made. Recollect that the majority is responsible for the situation of the country, and that it is our duty to avert the impending storm. Were they not to do it, he said, they would subject themselves to the imputation of neglecting their country.

Mr. DANA was opposed to officering, manning, and employing, as soon as may be, all the gunboats. He was willing that they should be ready, however; for, in smooth waters and rivers, they might be effectual. But, as to their service at sea, when they attempted to seize vessels violating the embargo, they were cause of mirth; for, of everything which swam on the water they were the laziest. Really, one of these boats chasing a fast sailing vessel, was something like a snail chasing a Virginia race horse. Mr. D. was willing that all of them should be ready for service, but he was opposed to officering them; for, of all places in which you can put a young officer, they are the worst. It was not a situation in which they would acquire that habit of command and respectable deportment which was necessary for the respectability of our Navy. Placed in a situation in which every coaster laughs at him, and the ungainly thing on which he is fixed, it certainly is not calculated to improve an officer. Old officers might do well on board these vessels; but consider the severe trial to which you put a young man, with no superior over him, in those boats. Mr. D. dwelt at some length on the disadvantage to officers, &c., from being placed on board gunboats. If the gunboats were ready for service, there would be no difficulty in detaching a sufficient number of seamen and volunteers to man them, on any emergency. Even of volunteers, there was no necessity that they should be constantly employed. If you send gunboats to enforce embargo laws, you must get revenue cutters to tow them along. They are perfect floating batteries; and, as to expense, they were the most expensive species of naval force. Mr. D. believed that the law of last session authorized the fitting out the gunboats when public service required; and, if their employment became necessary, it would not need the sanction of this law.

JANUARY, 1809:

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL always understood that the law already gave the same power in relation to the gunboats as to the frigates, and no other.

Mr. COOK observed that, after so strong a vote for building gunboats he should scarcely expect the House would refuse to man them; for, of what use would they be, except they were manned?

The question on striking out the word "gunboats" was taken by yeas and nays, and negative—yeas 28, nays 93, as follows:

The question recurring on the amendment from the Senate,

Mr. DANA said he was placed in a situation in which he approved one part of the proposition presented to him, and disapproved of another. He felt considerable hesitation in equipping the frigates, because of the use to which they might be applied by the Executive, viz: to enforce the embargo laws; to enforce which, in this manner, he did not believe would redound to the credit of the United States, because he did not believe that the effects would be produced by it which gentlemen contemplated. Much greater danger there was of a violation of the rights of the people in executing the embargo laws on land than on water; and when command was vested in inferior officers, much greater tyranny and insolence was to be expected than from superior and responsible officers. Employing frigates for the execution of the embargo laws was the least unconstitutional and the least objectionable of any mode. He felt a regret that these laws should be executed by the navy. He feared that the navy might be associated in idea with the laws which they enforced, and thus give a prejudice against naval force. But, nevertheless, he thought the propriety of employing responsible officers overbalanced this consideration. Another reason why he was in favor of equipping the frigates, was, because it would take some time to prepare them, and if a meeting of Congress took place in May or June, it might be expected that the embargo would be removed, and then all the frigates would probably be put in service, before which time, if now ordered, they could not be prepared. They had been lying at the navy yard here, to rot and be repaired, to be repaired and rot again. Mr. D. observed that, in fresh water, decay took place more rapidly than in salt water; he wished to send them to their natural element; it would be conducive to their health and long existence. Another reason, he stated, why he should vote for the bill: there was an idea amongst some gentlemen, that there was a probability of war. He had no idea of Congress, this session, declaring war, because they had made no preparation for it. And if we were to make war, he conceived that we should not do it like privateers, but like officers; that it should not be a strife of children, but of men, and that preparation should be made for it. Whenever we had war, it must be for maritime and not territorial rights; and he had no idea of abandoning the very ground for which we contended. He was therefore willing to place our frigates on the sea-coast. It was a very different question from that of the establishment of a large navy. Had gentlemen considered the importance of a naval force on our coast? Had they considered the propriety of having a force sufficient to repel insults in our harbors? Mr. D. adverted to the superior advantages of our naval situation over that of other nations which could send a force on our coasts. He had said that he had no idea of our declaring war; neither had he any idea of any of the nations of Europe declaring war against us. Not a corporal's guard could Great Britain send here; without sacrificing objects on which her interest and honor depended; and the Emperor of France, whilst collecting a force to resist the troops of Great Britain in Spain, would he abandon his conquests and the pretensions of his family, to send a force here, when such numerous battalions could be arrayed against them? Another thing: the seasons were against their sending a force here for several months. War therefore was not to be expected this session, except, as had been said, it was a paper war, another supplemental broadside, as a gentleman had observed; but that species of war, Mr. D. said, he did not take into the question. If we were to have war, he wished a unanimity of sentiment to attend it, without which it would be ineffectual. When this unanimity, the result of the exercise of judgment by free and unbiassed minds, existed, we need fear no enemy. This could not exist when the people were called upon to be friends, whilst gentlemen took the attitude of enemies; when they were called upon to be friends with an insinuation that they were traitors in their hearts. He wished this language to be expelled from our councils. Whatever difference of opinion might exist on local concerns, with respect to foreign nations, he thought we ought to show that we are all ready to maintain the cause of the country; and to insinuate a doubt of this conveyed a reproach. And men long habituated to reproach, did not feel that impulse to honorable effort which those felt who were not accustomed to it. He then adverted to the circumstance of one of the greatest military commanders of antiquity having selected a regiment or battalion whose fidelity or courage he had doubted, and placed them in a conspicuous place on the field of battle, appearing to place confidence in them, and thus insuring their good conduct. Mr. D. held up this example to the attention of gentlemen. He concluded, by saying that, because he wished to call into action all the resources of the country, though opposed to a part of this amendment from the Senate, (that part relating to gunboats,) he thought it his duty to vote for the amendment.

Mr. SLOAN intimated that he should vote for this amendment, to get our frigates from the sickly situation in which they were now placed; to get them out of this state of embargo, and to restore them to health and freedom.

The question on the amendment of the Senate was then decided in the affirmative—yeas 64, nays 59, as follows:

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL called for the yeas and nays on the next amendment, relative to the number of seamen, &c.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said he would give all his earthly goods, if the last vote could be recalled; for he valued property and life less than the liberties of the country, which he believed would be destroyed by the consequence of that vote. He believed that they had pronounced against a man whom he had always censured, when he thought he had acted improperly, but who had done great and important services to the country—the President of the United States—a censure which he did not merit. What was this force for? Those who were desirous of war were perfectly consistent in voting for it; but for those who wished for peace, it was the worst thing that could have happened. The first thing done by this navy would be to search out a British frigate, and revenge the outrage on the Chesapeake. But a short time would elapse before it would involve us in war. He hoped a disagreement to the present amendment would take place, so as to defeat the object of the bill; he hoped so, because he was zealous to preserve peace.

Mr. NELSON said, that he was one of the minority on the question just taken; he wished that the decision had been different; but the decision having been made, he should vote for all the other amendments to the bill, because he conceived it a necessary consequence of having adopted the first.

Mr. MASTERS said that, if justice were not done to this nation, we ought to go to war, and to be prepared for it. He thought there could have been no difference of opinion on that point. The only question had been, whether the embargo was the proper measure. The moment that Great Britain laid a tax on us, if not withdrawn, it was a cause of war. He had never entertained a different opinion. He then went into examination of the propriety of possessing some frigates, and declared himself much pleased at the vote just taken.

Mr. DANA had no idea of throwing a censure on the President of the United States, by voting for this bill. Congress had the power to raise and support armies and navies; and it had been doubted whether any discretion should ever be given to the Executive on the subject. He had thought that a discretion might be given, but in this case he had thought it proper that Congress should exercise this right. He understood this force was to be employed in our waters; and if foreign nations did come into our waters and insult our national sovereignty, he said he should wish to teach them to respect it. He had no idea of causing war; he wished to preserve peace; but was peace the yielding to violations of jurisdiction, and to insults in our own waters? and was a resistance of these war? No; it was the exercise of the natural right of all animated nature to resist, when injured, and could not be called war, in the general sense of the word. If the defence of our clear and indisputable rights was to be war, let it be war; for they must be maintained.

Mr. GHOLSON said he had hardly expected that a question once decided, would be again discussed. For the vote which he had given, he was accountable to his constituents and to his conscience, and not accountable to any honorable gentleman on this floor for it. From the commencement of our Government to the present day, he said, our coast had been infested with cruisers and plundering pirates; and it was with a design to drive off these that he had given this vote.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL wished it to be understood that he should vote against this amendment. He believed the vote just taken to be unprecedented, of its own kind; no such thing as that amendment could be found on the statute book; it was giving power without means to carry it into effect; he considered it a dead letter, when connected with the small appropriation for the object, and should vote against the other amendments. They had heretofore given a discretionary power to call out the frigates, but now they had passed a peremptory order that they should be put in service. He regretted that the vote had passed; and believed that before one month had elapsed many gentlemen who had voted for it would wish that they had not given the vote. It would produce a sentiment abroad that we were to have a maritime war, and would thus delude the people. They would say, if we are to have four or five thousand seamen, and only nine thousand men on land, it must be intended to carry on a maritime war. Mr. C. said he was willing to meet any event, if war did become necessary; but he did not wish to provoke it. Gentlemen have said that we have been insulted; but they would not say that our whole force would be competent to meet a single squadron of the British navy. The expense ought not to be overlooked—an expense of four millions; some gentlemen said six. It would be two millions in addition to what it would have been but for the amendments, without an atom of additional security to be derived from the money expended. He was willing to afford any assistance to American seamen in distress; but not to employ them because idle, when he believed their employment would be productive of mischief. He trusted until some way of filling the Treasury was discovered, that they would not totally empty it.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said he had incurred the censure of the House for calling gentlemen to order, for whom he had high respect, during this session. After the example of this day it was time to desist, when, after a principle was solemnly adopted, gentlemen were permitted again to debate it. It was said that the adoption of the amendment was disrespectful to the President of the United States. Mr. J. said he had the highest respect for this venerable sage. This principle of Executive confidence was repugnant to the principle of the Constitution. With this House was vested the power of war or peace, of raising armies and navies, and of levying taxes, and with them properly rested the responsibility of employing the naval force. At a time when the President had been charged with wishing to excite a war pulse, he would of necessity be guarded in his expressions on the subject; and he had not expressly recommended any particular species of preparations. Gentlemen had said that they were desirous of peace. Mr. J. said that peace was already destroyed; and he said that he could not consent to cry out peace, peace, when there was no peace. What was the case which lately occurred at Savannah? But he did not conceive that we should rush into war, without giving an opportunity for procuring peace. Because we prepared for defence, did we invite war? No; and were we to be prevented from protecting our waters, from the fear of exciting sensations in a foreign government? He trusted not. This House had declared that it would not submit; and a permanent abandonment of the ocean would be submission. Our natural rights were to be protected at all hazards, and at every expense. He understood the question very differently from the gentleman from Tennessee. He did not believe that the President of the United States possessed the power to employ all our vessels. There was such a law; but the number of seamen to be employed was limited. It was impossible that the President of the United States could carry the law into effect, and of course the power was nugatory without men and money. He had no idea in voting for this amendment that it involved war, or that it would delude the people into the idea that we meant to carry on a maritime war. If we went to war, he hoped we should adopt measures more efficient. He approved the sentiments of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) and when gentlemen came out in this way, he was willing to do away distinctions of federalism and republicanism, and hail them as whigs, as Americans, as friends to their country. Mr. J. entered into an examination of the necessity of a small naval force, and urged several arguments in favor of its efficacy as a defence.

Mr. SLOAN professed himself highly gratified at the vote which had just taken place, and he was at the same time as much in favor of peace as any gentleman. This measure had been looked for from sections of the country which must suffer in case of war. He thought it would tend more to harmonize than any measure adopted at this session. He rejoiced that the wishes of the people would be gratified by a removal of these frigates from this place, where they had been rotting so long.

Mr. MACON expressed his surprise at the change which appeared to have taken place in the House, within a few days. The current had set in favor of the embargo a short time ago, but its course was turned, and it was for war. He was for holding to the present measures as long as we could. He cautioned gentlemen against measures which would provoke war; and intimated as his belief, from the vote just given, that it would take place in three months. It was yet time for gentlemen to prevent it, by withholding the sinews of the Navy, by disagreeing to the remaining amendments proposed by the Senate. Send out the Navy in its present disposition, said he, and you send it to war. He had been afraid, from the commencement of the session, that we should have war; and war would assuredly follow the going out of these frigates. Did he not appreciate the character of the American seamen, their courage and spirit, he should not fear war from it. He could not account for the change which had taken place in the House within a few days. Whence this leaning to war? Nothing new had occurred that he knew of but the trifling case at Savannah. He knew that for years past we had had cause of war. Not a year since the commencement of the French revolution, in which we might not with good reason have declared war. But he wished a fair experiment of the embargo first. If we were to go to war there was no man in the nation who could foretell its result. He was not surprised that the gentleman from Connecticut should be against the embargo, because he had been so from the first. He would hold on to the embargo as long as he could. He thought he sufficiently understood the interests of the people whom he represented, and of the United States generally, to know that they would suffer by war. When he had said that the attack on the Chesapeake was as much cause of war as the attack on Copenhagen, the changes had been rung through the nation on his words. He was not in favor of war. He was surprised to hear gentlemen saying that the people would not bear the embargo; and that the friends of the measure were yielding to this impression. Come the day when it would, they would find war no slight matter. Gentlemen talked about sending these vessels out to protect trade. If sent out they would fight. He could not see what good ten frigates were to do as a defence. He had always feared that we should have a fleet; and he said no nation could maintain a navy and live well. Liberty was of no value if it was only tongue liberty; and a navy would soon strip the citizen of his property, and leave him but the liberty of speech. He had been in hopes that the country would not have followed the track of Europe. He hoped this Navy policy might not eventually change the form of our Government. Take this bill, said he, with the fifty thousand men proposed—call them what you will—they are not militia—and see what it looks like. With respect to supporting our sailors, was there not now, he asked, a bill before the House for appropriating a sum of money for supporting them? When he compared the number of seamen proposed to be employed with the actual number in the United States, he had no idea that the bill was intended to relieve them. No. It squinted at war. He was not for any of these war measures till it was ascertained that the embargo did not produce an effect. This measure had occasioned less inconvenience than any great national measure could, and had been productive of more benefit by saving property, &c., than any other would have been. Give foreign nations time and time again to reflect on proposals for peace, said he, before you launch into war. He thought, with the gentleman from South Carolina, that the agreement to the amendment was a reflection on the President. This was not the proper place for him to say what he thought of that man; but the censure was undeserved. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) says, that Congress alone has the power to declare war. The President also has a share in the power, and it cannot be declared without his concurrence. Mr. M. referred to the section of the Constitution which says that every order, resolution, act, &c., shall be presented to the President for his approbation. The very next section declared that Congress shall have power to declare war, raise armies, &c., &c., and would any man say that they had the power to do it without the consent of the President? No, sir. [Mr. J. G. JACKSON said that the gentleman wholly misunderstood him. He had no idea that the consent of the President was not necessary.] Mr. M. then observed that the pain he felt in his breast prevented him from proceeding further.

Mr. TAYLOR said as this was a very important question and one which the House had entered into, he should conceive that they wished to come to a conclusion, and would not therefore occupy much of their time. He did not believe with the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NELSON) that it was his duty, because the first amendment was adopted, to adopt the remainder. He protested against the doctrine. He believed that it was in the power of the majority to negative any amendment. The amendment of the Senate contemplated an increase of expense at least double that contemplated by the bill as sent from this House, and yet the Senate had stricken out the sum adequate for one half the actual number now contemplated, and inserted $400,000! He could not understand a system which authorized double the force proposed by the bill sent from this House, and for which it appropriated but one-half the sum. There must be some mode of calculation in that honorable body which he did not understand.

The town is besieged; and instead of taking the system of defence into our closet and examining it, we are to take it in a speech as we can catch it, without having it upon paper to judge of it. It ought to have been upon our tables weeks ago. He would say what he thought of it. It was leading to the abandonment of our most efficient force for our weakest—to the abandonment of the embargo for a naval war. If we were to have war, this was not to be the whole force employed. This sum of $400,000 could deceive no one. With the money necessary for four thousand additional seamen an army of thirty thousand men could be paid who would sweep the Canadas in a year. A landsman, he had heard said, cost the United States $130 annually, whilst a mariner cost $1100, seven and a third times as much. The House had been told that the nation must contend for its rights on the element where we must enjoy them. In the language of the great Chatham, France was conquered in America. Great Britain has been conquered in America, and may be conquered on terra firma again. He said, instead of launching a navy on the ocean, he would advance to the Gibraltar of America, possess ourselves of it, and take from Great Britain her only depot on the American continent. He would force her whole commerce on the northern continent of America to pass under our cannons' mouth. He believed that it would be an extravagance to appropriate this money for a small naval force, when with it we could sweep the enemy from our northern frontier altogether. He wished not to be considered as an advocate of either mode. He was for an adherence to the embargo. If that were given up, he was for putting our resources to the best possible use for the defence of the country, and he was not for launching into an element where our enemy must be master. He believed if we were to have war on the ocean, that we should do more mischief by individual enterprise, by seizing a straggler here and a straggler there, plundering a squadron here and a squadron there, than by any regular force of the United States. With respect to invasion of our territory, he had understood that gunboats co-operating with fortifications were competent to the defence of our harbors. Now it seemed that they could not drive out a picaroon. And would any one say that this immense appropriation for gunboats would have been made under an expectation that they would supersede the necessity of frigates? He said he should not himself have voted for the gunboats if he had supposed that the House would have refused the other part of the system—the marine militia. He adverted to the refusal of the proposition to erect dry docks, and the subsequent proposition for a marine militia. He concluded by observing that he conceived that the tenor of the amendment went to cast a censure on the President, to dishonor that sage whom gentlemen affected to revere.

An adjournment was called for, and carried.

WEDNESDAY, January 11.

On motion of Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a resolution of this House of the ninth of January, one thousand eight hundred and nine, "directing the Secretary of State to lay before this House a statement of the whole number of persons born in foreign countries, and legally admitted citizens of the United States by naturalization, who have been registered as American seamen, and returned as such to the Department of State, according to the lists transmitted by the collectors of the customs, in pursuance of the law relative to the relief and protection of American seamen," be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON, the House proceeded to consider a resolution proposed by him, and ordered to lie on the table, on the thirtieth ultimo; and the same being again read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire into the expediency of removing the Collector's Office from the port of Tappahannock to that of Fredericksburg, in the State of Virginia; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SMILIE, from the committee appointed on the seventh instant, presented a bill to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee appointed on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session of Congress, as relates to the Military and Naval Establishments, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the establishing and organizing a Marine corps;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. NELSON, from the same committee, presented, a bill providing an additional military force; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of Navy officers, seamen, and marines."

Mr. TROUP said he regretted exceedingly that he was under the necessity of again troubling the House, but he felt himself bound, in some measure to state more particularly his reasons for voting for the bill, and to reply to some cogent objections made from a quarter of the House which he much respected. He stated anew the reasons which he had given why the United States should have a small naval force. He thought it indispensable at this time to man and equip our little Navy, not for the one or the other general reason in its favor which he before stated, but to protect from violence and insult the territory of the United States; that territory which gentlemen in this House were so fond of calling the territory of the good old United States—he meant the marine league from the shore—as sacred and inviolable as any spot of earth within our limits. It was for the purpose of protecting this part of our territory, for removing those cruisers which are competent to blockade the mouth of our rivers, that he wished this Navy to be equipped. Gentlemen said the gunboats were competent to the protection of our harbors. Mr. T. acknowledged it; he said he did believe that the invention of man never devised a more competent system than gunboats, co-operating with fortifications, for the protection of our ports and harbors, but they were calculated to act only on shoals and in smooth waters. They were not fit for any other species of service; they could not stand the winds and waves, the billows and the tempests. And notwithstanding our ports and harbors might be well defended by these gunboats, they were not competent to the purpose for which these frigates were to be manned, to prevent blockades of our own waters. He said he had expected, when gentlemen had solemnly resolved not to submit, that they had a serious determination to execute their resolve; and when they solemnly and unanimously resolved to place the country in a posture of defence, that they had seriously determined to do so. For his own part, he said he had been as seriously determined upon both, as he ever was upon anything in his life. And when gentlemen said they would not submit, what did they mean by it? Merely that they would not submit to the orders and decrees of the belligerents, or that they would not submit to violence and insults in their own waters? And when they said they would place the nation in a state of defence, did they only mean to hold the militia in requisition? The militia were already in requisition, and were always subject to it. No, indeed; he had expected a very different species of defence; a defence calculated to meet a decisive and active hostility on the part of a great foreign enemy. He had understood that an army was to be raised, not only sufficient for the protection of our own territories, but sufficient to carry war into the territories of our enemy. He had expected, at least, that our little Navy would have been equipped—for, if you determine to change your present system of measures, how would you get along? Suppose you determine to go to war, you must determine at the same time to have a war commerce, to open a free trade with those nations with whom you shall be at peace—and how will you effect it? In your present situation it would be impossible, for these twenty-gun frigates as completely blockade the mouths of your rivers as the most formidable navy on the face of the globe could. Your commerce cannot move, if they choose to prevent it. Suppose you were to raise the embargo and adopt a non-intercourse with the belligerents; with what effect could you, under the present circumstances of the nation, give such liberty to commerce, when the mouths of your rivers are blockaded, much more effectually than they ever were by your embargo laws? Whether, then, you contemplate raising the embargo and adopting a non-intercourse, or war, a small naval force is absolutely indispensable. Mr. T. said he had to lament what had fallen from an honorable friend of his from South Carolina (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS.) That gentleman, not many weeks ago, with a manly and dignified eloquence, which charmed almost every man who had heard him, scouted a principle which he had but yesterday adopted to all intents, and in all its bearings, viz: that interest was honor, and honor was interest; and that this country could have no provocative to war, and must, at all hazards, be preserved in a state of peace.

Mr. WILLIAMS said he held no such sentiments; if, in his agitation at the vote which had taken place, he had expressed such, he solemnly revoked them.

Mr. TROUP observed that he had understood the gentleman to declare that he was determined to adhere to the system of the embargo as a permanent measure of offence and defence, and from this expression he had drawn the deduction.

Mr. WILLIAMS disclaimed the idea of a perpetual embargo.

Mr. TROUP explained what he had said when up before on the subject of economy. He had spoken of war measures, which, when adopted, the old peace principle, that standing navies, and armies, and funding systems, were great evils, should be discarded. He had spoken of a liberal policy as preferable to that puerile, petty, contemptible, narrow economy, whose means and ends were both calculated and measured by popularity; and he added that whenever this nation was driven into a war, and the great principles of its action were determined on the question of popularity or unpopularity, we should come out of the war with dishonor, disgrace, and ruin.

Mr. SAWYER resumed the observations which he commenced on Monday. On the subject of the Naval Establishment, he said that this system had introduced into our laws a long list of capital crimes heretofore unknown to us, and perfectly incompatible with civil liberty. He disliked the absolute despotism exercised by naval commanders, who feasted in their cabins like bashaws, with their bands of music to entertain them the while, and twenty or thirty men employed for no other purpose than to fiddle and pipe to the crew, at a pay of twenty dollars per month each perhaps. Were these men intended to charm the enemy, as Orpheus of old? [Mr. S. was here reminded by the SPEAKER that he was wandering from the question.] Mr. S. said he presumed, that if he was at liberty to prove the system wrong in whole, he was at liberty to prove it wrong in any part. He did not believe that this naval force would add to the strength of the country, but rather weaken it. The strength of the country depended more on internal improvement and union among the people. Twenty odd millions of dollars, at least, had been expended on this system, and no improvement was visible from it. Suppose this money had been employed in facilitating communication through the country. This mode of expenditure would have been more conducive to the public interest than that of supporting the robust crews of the frigates in idleness. He hoped that Congress would, like the prodigal son, return home and sin no more; that after they had corrected their error in respect to this species of force, they would not again encourage it. Mr. S. spoke of the danger to be apprehended from such a system. Did any one ever hear of a navy taking part with the people against despotism? On the contrary, they were always ready to assist it, for the spirits of the crews were always broken down by severe discipline. He had just as great objections to navies as to standing armies; and, for the same reasons, was against both.

A gentleman had said that we ought to avenge the violations of our jurisdiction. Mr. S. said he agreed with him; he was willing to go to war for them. But because the injuries were committed on the ocean, was it any reason that we should go to war there? So far from wiping off the stain on our honor by this means, Mr. S. said we should make it the more indelible. Should we, single handed, when all the world had fled before the leviathan of the deep, sally out and defy her to combat? He was for meeting her on terra firma; for using the energies of the country, and in that manner which our situation required. Suppose France had exhausted herself in keeping up a navy, what would have been her situation at this time? Would she have been mistress of the Continent? No; she would have sunk into absolute insignificance. Mr. S. said that he was for raising the standard of his country, for enlisting every man who would come forward, and for making an irruption into Canada.

The blood of Pierce could be as well avenged, and the manes of the slaughtered seamen of the Chesapeake as well appeased, under the walls of Quebec as on the seacoast. It had excited his astonishment that Great Britain could have persevered in her unjust conduct so long when it was in our power to sweep her from the continent. If this bill were to pass, it would afford her a proof of the weakness of our policy, which he hoped never to see given. Did gentlemen mean to multiply the odium of the affair of the Chesapeake by increasing the quantum of the means of national disgrace? He said he would ask gentlemen if one frigate brought so much disgrace, how much would fifteen bring? Gentlemen had said that Great Britain could send but a small force on our coast. Mr. S. said that she would always send enough for us. He concluded by observing that he derived some consolation from the circumstance that the terms of this bill were not absolutely imperative; and he had too much confidence in our excellent Chief Magistrate to believe that he would ever carry the power into effect.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS moved to commit the bill with the amendments to a Committee of the Whole. His object was to obtain a reconsideration of all the amendments. He felt a conviction on his mind that the House, having had time to consider the tendency of the vote of yesterday, would agree to rescind it. He wished no national measure to be adopted at this session with a poor, paltry majority of five. The nation, he said, was not to be got along in this way. He said when he had risen yesterday, he had felt an agony of soul which he could not repress or express. He, with his friend from North Carolina (Mr. MACON) was willing to have adhered to the embargo till the last of September, or till its effect was clearly ascertained. And when the vote of yesterday was taken, he had thought he saw war, with all its ruinous consequences, stalking over this once happy land. Under this embarrassment he said he had addressed the Speaker, and appeared to have been misunderstood by the gentleman from Georgia. He wished the bill to be re-committed, because he understood that a part of the seamen were considered as immediately necessary for the public service; he wished not to delay their employment by a discussion of the merits of a naval establishment—for no man opposed to the bill would, he presumed, permit it to pass till he had exerted himself to his utmost to prevent it.

Mr. W. ALSTON was in favor of the motion for commitment. The sum appropriated by this House for the smaller object had been stricken out by the Senate, and a sum inserted for the larger, which would scarcely be sufficient to open a rendezvous for enlisting men; if it were not enlarged, the bill would be a nullity.

Mr. DANA said it was his opinion, if a question had been unexpectedly taken, that it did not establish the point in question. He was, therefore, in favor of a commitment, in order to accommodate gentlemen. Mr. D. replied in a humorous manner to Mr. SAWYER's observations on the subject of the music on board the navy; saying that indeed it was true that they had drums and bells on board of a frigate, and even silver whistles for the boatswain's mates. The seamen were such strange creatures, too, that they would despise an officer who would not make himself be obeyed within the fair limits of his authority. And this subordination, he said, was necessary. The seaman was subordinate to the midshipman, who was subordinate to the lieutenant, the lieutenant to the captain, who was subordinate to the commodore, who was under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, who acted under the Executive; and thus the Executive held the whole, and wielded it at his pleasure for the execution of the law and the general maintenance of public right. He was willing to have the bill committed, but not for the sake of altering the appropriation; for the bill only settled the principle, and the appropriation was for commencing the work.

Mr. BACON said if the nation was really hungry after debate, or thirsting for long speeches, he should have no objection to go into Committee of the Whole; but, believing this not to be the case, he should object to it, because it could answer no purpose but delay.

Mr. FISK was in favor of the House taking the responsibility of this matter upon itself, and not for throwing it on the President's shoulders. He wished this force to repel infractions of our laws and rights. Armed ships, in violation of our laws, were now carrying on trade within our waters; and information was received that armed vessels were coming on our coast to force a trade. Was this to be permitted? Of what efficacy were our embargo laws, if armed vessels were to come and go when they pleased? What, he asked, could we get by persevering in a system which was thus rendered of no effect but to injure the honest part of the community? He said he wished to treat such violators of the laws as pirates. Unless such a measure was adopted, our embargo laws would be of no effect. It would answer no good purpose to go into Committee of the Whole on the bill; for the object of the motion was to defeat the bill. The bill rested on this basis—would they or would they not take measures at this time to meet the crisis, or would they rely wholly on the embargo? This was in fact the true question. The passage of this bill would give of this species of force no more than its due proportion. Mr. F. said he was no friend to standing armies or navies, but, in legislating, judgment must be guided by circumstances. It had been said that the sending out our frigates to sea would produce war; that the spirit of our officers was such that they would engage. He hoped they would not, at the same time that he believed they would resist all encroachments on our rights. Decatur had been at sea for many months with a frigate, and no such consequence had been produced. Mr. F. replied to the observations of Mr. SAWYER, in relation to the conduct of captains; and concluded with some general arguments in favor of naval force.

Mr. ALEXANDER was in favor of going into a committee, and was opposed to the amendments of the Senate. He said, if we were to have war, the ocean was not the theatre on which we should attack Great Britain. It was in another quarter. The course which had been adopted by the Administration, and wisely adhered to, he wished first to have a fair experiment. Though he was a friend to the embargo, he did not think that it should be continued for a long time. As long as a hope of adjustment remained, he did not wish to make preparations for war.

Mr. BURWELL hoped that, after a majority appeared to be in favor of the principle, no gentleman would delay the adoption of the other amendments of the Senate. He said he had no idea that any gentleman had been taken by surprise in the vote he had given. The observation of Mr. WILLIAMS, about a bare majority of five, Mr. B. said was not correct. A majority must always prevail. He was opposed to going into a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KEY said, he was not surprised that gentlemen who were wholly opposed to the bill, should wish to have it recommitted. The amendments of the Senate presented but one question to his mind; whether it would be proper, in the present situation of our country, to arm those vessels which we have. He was a little surprised that gentlemen should hesitate, after what had been so often said on this floor. He recollected that those who a few weeks ago had spoken in favor of a middle course, were treated almost as enemies to their country; it was even said that every man was an enemy to his country, who was not in favor of a continuance of the embargo, or war.

Gentlemen had said that the line should be drawn, that the distinction should be made between friend and foe. And now, when a defensive measure was brought into consideration, how stood it? It was no quixotic idea of a navy to meet the mistress of the ocean on her own ground. That, said he, is not the question. Let us not be deceived by the idea. The solitary question is, whether, when our ships are lying in our waters, we shall man and equip them—for what? For the protection and defence of our homes. We have information that the proclamation of the President of the United States has been violated, and even at this moment may be violated. The lion is bearded in his den—the eagle strangled on its perch. It was for the purpose of compelling foreign nations to respect our rights within our jurisdictional limits, that he would give this additional quota of naval force. He was among the number of those who thought that if our frigates, instead of laying in our docks, had been heretofore sent out, no instance of such hostility would ever have taken place. In one case alone had these violations appeared to have been premeditated, when there was a fleet in the mouth of the river watching the motions of the Leopard, and ready to insure success to her. All other instances had been insulated. Gentlemen had said that they would not provoke war. Mr. K. said neither would he. But was honorable defence of our rights war? Far from it. To be prepared for war was one of the best preventives of war. Weakness invited, strength repelled insult and injury. He was, therefore, for arming those vessels which we have, and sending them out, but not for building others. This was very different from an attempt to protect foreign commerce in this way, which he hoped never would be made. The marine league on the coast was as inviolable as the soil. From headland to headland of the coast, and all the water within this line, had always been considered as part of the territory; and he contended, politically speaking, that an insult on our sovereignty there was as great as if the forces of a foreign Power were to land on our shores, come up to our houses, and murder and plunder the inhabitants. If we had a force upon the water, did any man believe that a single ship of twenty guns, commanded by a lieutenant, would have come within the limits of the harbor of Savannah, and fired a gun? No. Within these limits he would not permit insults on our sovereignty, and therefore wished these vessels to be sent out. His idea was that this force, as an auxiliary to gunboats, whether further to enforce the embargo, or to protect our territorial limits, ought to be given to the President of the United States. One gentleman had said, let us try the present system until September. What then? When all chance of negotiation had ceased, in what situation should we be placed? Unarmed, the vessels rotting, and not ready for any service. We should be better employed in placing ourselves in such a situation that if war be inevitable, we may better and more firmly resist it. We are a peaceable nation, and I hope we may have peace yet; but a preparation for war will guaranty peace. A man has two neighbors hostile to him; he would not go to attack them, but the moment they put their foot over his threshold would repel them with force, and chastise them, if in his power. This is the case of this nation, and I would employ the means which God has given us to repel invaders of our territory, whether maritime or territorial. Mr. K. said he could not agree to refer the subject to a Committee of the Whole, for the proposition was so simple that it would be a waste of time longer to detain the House on the subject. He said he had voted for the gunboat system, not that he was in favor of it, but because it was a defensive measure, in what he thought a difficult crisis. He thought war now still more probable, and if it were, he said, sound policy, and a regard for the destinies of the country, dictated that we should be prepared, and not let the enemy come upon us without resistance.

Mr. EPPES said he should vote for a commitment, in conformity with the vote which he had yesterday given against the amendment. When this subject had been presented to the House, he had not then or now attached to it that importance which gentlemen appeared to give it. Many questions had been brought to bear on it which were not now connected with it. It was not now a question whether we should commence a naval system. Whilst the House had been amused with an examination of the whole naval system, the only question was, whether, in the present situation of our affairs, it would be proper to employ 6,000 or 4,000 seamen, the difference between the bill as sent from this House and as received from the Senate being two thousand seamen. The principal objection to the bill in its present form was the manner, in which it had been introduced into the House. We received a bill from the Senate, which is now before a committee of this House; whilst this is under consideration, another bill of the same nature is sent to us, and we are called upon to vote blindfolded, without a single estimate or designation of the object for which this force is to be raised. If convinced that 6,000 seamen were necessary, Mr. E. said he would as soon vote for them as for 6,000 troops. But before he incurred an expense of six millions of dollars, for he averred that this would be the consequence of passing the bill, he must be convinced that it was not only necessary that the bill should pass, but that it should pass immediately; and at the same time totally disclaimed any intention of submitting to insults within our waters. The zeal which gentlemen had now displayed would have been better shown in the case of the Chesapeake. Why did they not then drive the British squadron out of our waters? This affair, however, had blown over, and now, when a twenty-gun vessel went to Savannah, the House was called upon to employ all our vessels to drive it out! Our Executive, he said, was now by law authorized to employ all the armed vessels, and if, with the 2,000 additional seamen granted by this House, he could not drive these vessels out of our waters, he could not do it with all our armed vessels. Mr. E. said he should vote for commitment, because it would enable him again to vote on the amendment of the Senate. He disclaimed all the doctrine which had been laid down in respect to navies. Whenever we had war, he said he would employ those armed vessels which we have, he would send them out to sea, and if they should be taken or destroyed, let them go. He had rather they should be destroyed contending for our rights, than suffered to rot in this place. It might be proper here to observe something respecting the situation of the frigates. If gentlemen would come forward with a call for an official statement of their situation, whether they were more rotten now than they would be with their complement of seamen sailing along the coast, he believed it would be found that this was not the fact. Ordinary merchant vessels were kept in good condition at an expense of about ten per cent. per annum, and he believed not more had been employed on the frigates; and that all but two of them could be prepared for service in a short time. Mr. E. also objected to the amendments from the Senate, because they were at variance with the measures which the House had adopted. He was for adhering to the embargo yet a while longer. He believed it more for the interest of the nation to husband its resources, than to squander them on an object which could produce no real good. What was to be done with all these frigates? Were they merely to sail along the coast? No; and he knew not in what gentleman would employ them. He was for waiting until the period arrived at which they might be of service; he was, therefore, opposed to the amendments of the Senate. He disclaimed permitting them to rot, when there was an occasion for their actual service; but he was not for sending out these vessels to force a war, before a single soldier was ready to march where they ought. So soon as our troops were ready to send to Canada, he was ready to send out the frigates. Whenever it appeared that we were ready to resort to war, Mr. E. said, he should be as ready to employ all the energies of the nation as any man.

Mr. JOHNSON expressed his pleasure at perceiving that the arguments in favor of and against this bill proceeded from the heart, and were not the bickerings of party. He was not disposed, however, to pass a law making it imperative on the President to employ our naval force; he could not see that it would be necessary for defence, because Congress would have authorized the President, independently of the amendments of the Senate, to employ 171 gunboats, and ten small armed vessels, whilst the fortifications of our harbors were progressing with all the rapidity which the season would permit. For enforcing the embargo they were not necessary. Because the President was already authorized to employ twelve additional revenue cutters, and to hire thirty other vessels, if necessary. They were not necessary for the protection of commerce either; for what protection would ten frigates afford to the vast tonnage of the United States against the great navies of Europe?

Mr. J. said that Congress had already induced the nation to believe that they would not take off the embargo during the present session, but that it might be removed in May or June. Mr. J. said the people would draw this conclusion from the decision of the House on the amendments offered for enforcing the embargo. And, if the House had determined not to strike a blow at this session, was not the proposition now before the House directly in the teeth of the system which they had determined to adopt? He said it was known to many members of the House, and he was not ashamed to avow it on this floor, that if the majority had thought proper to abandon the embargo system, he had been prepared to take other measures. But he took it for granted, from the sentiments of a majority of the House as expressed by their vote, that it would not be repealed at their present session. Will you, then, now take offensive measures? said he. No; for you have determined to enforce the embargo. For offence, indeed! Mr. J. said that he considered this naval force inadequate, incompetent, and inefficient. Whenever there was war on water, he conceived that it must be carried on by private armed vessels; and, whenever we did wage war, it must be as much on land as possible. Gentlemen spoke lightly of economy. Mr. J. said, he would venture to say that rational economy would be necessary to carry the nation through the storm, even with the aid of loans and taxes. He thought it proper that the two thousand seamen proposed to be given by the bill as sent from this House, should be authorized, for the purpose of more strongly fortifying New Orleans, which was the outlet to the whole Western country; and he thought it more expedient to keep in the Treasury the money which the bill from the Senate proposed to expend.

Mr. DURELL professed his astonishment at the opposition made by gentlemen in the minority to the prompt passage of the bill, for he had always understood it to be the duty of the minority to yield to the majority, when its will was fairly expressed. Some of these frigates, he said, were so far gone that they would soon be not worth repairing, and that was one reason why they should be immediately put in a state of preparation. The gentleman from Kentucky wanted two thousand seamen, to go to one place to the Southwest. Mr. D. said he wanted two thousand, to go to the East. He did not consider this proposition as at all premature. Was this House to come to a declaration of war before it could be induced to pass this bill? Gentlemen had said, that, if the embargo did not produce an alteration in our situation before September, they would abandon it, and take a measure more coercive. Supposing this to be the case, in what situation would the nation find itself? Completely unprepared. The preparation for defence belongs to us, said Mr. D.; the direction of it when prepared, is reposed in the Executive. He said that gentlemen seemed to think that these vessels could be prepared for sea in four and twenty hours. Not so; it would require three or four months, if ample appropriations were made, to prepare them for sea. It would be two months before a single frigate could get out of the capes of Virginia.

Mr. TAYLOR said he agreed with his colleague, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) that any important measure taken by this House, ought to be adopted by something like an imposing majority. In addition to this idea, he said, he would call the attention of the House to what he alleged yesterday, and neither denied then nor now, that that Department of our Government which was responsible for the execution of all laws, and for keeping the nation in a state of peace—in terms as clearly to be understood as if conveyed in a formal Message for the purpose—had declared that it did not want this additional force. He thought it fair to conclude that a difference of opinion existed on this subject in the three great Departments of the Government. Even if the principle were not, in itself, all important, Mr. T. said, it would seem to him that the extraordinary situation in which we were placed, would require that this subject should have a full discussion. And, besides, said he, it seems to me to be a duty which we owe to ourselves, that the honorable body which sent us these amendments, should not, in this way, force upon us a measure, when they have already, in the usual course of business, presented the same measure to our consideration which has been referred to a Committee of the Whole. It was all important, he said, in a matter of such magnitude, that all branches of the Government should move hand in hand. There had been no estimate of the expenses of this thing. He asked if there would not be a propriety, if it was the conviction of this House and the other branches of the Government that these vessels should be put in service, in directing the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Committee of Ways and Means, to find out a source from which those expenses were to be raised, and in inquiring whether the nation must not again resort to eight per cent. loans for the support of this establishment.

He believed, that this proposition, if meant to enforce the embargo, was leading to an abandonment of the embargo system. This was clear to his mind; for if the nation were once convinced that the expense of this system was as great as the expense of an actual war would be, there was no doubt what would be the voice of the nation. The embargo would be abandoned, and war adopted in its stead. If we were to have peace, as he had heard from all the gentlemen who were in favor of the amendments from the Senate, then he would say, notwithstanding all the disregard to popularity which gentlemen might profess, the incurring the expense of fitting out all this navy, of retaining a regular army of 10,000 men and a provisional army of 50,000 men, who were to be clothed, and fed, and paid from time to time, and which, disguise it as they would, was but a standing army of 50,000 men on furlough—the expense necessary for carrying on such a system as this, would bring gentlemen, whether they would or not, to think of the popularity of the measure. Why was not this measure carried into effect at the last session of Congress? Was it that Great Britain had discovered a greater disposition to yield her Orders in Council than she did now? Mr. T. said, the nation stood in the same situation now as it did then, except that the breaking up of the negotiation with Mr. Rose, at the last session, seemed to give the atmosphere more of hostility and war, than at any time during the present session. When the affair of the Chesapeake had been recent, and a mockery of discussion had taken place on it, why had not this measure from the Senate, the members of which held their seats for the term of six years, and were secure in their seats for two, four and six years, been adopted then? Mr. T. recalled to the recollection of the House, the circumstances which had broken down the former Administration, amongst the most prominent of which was the establishment of a Navy. The fact was, he said, that no Administration, even if composed of Adamites, Pickeronians, Jeffersonians, and Madisonians, all combined to assist one another, could uphold this navy system in time of peace. The common sense of the nation would frown them down. He said he was willing that the next Administration should have fair play. There seemed to be a disposition to identify the future Administration with the present—he liked it the better for it—the future Administration would then be opposed to having this millstone swung round its neck, for the present Executive had given an intimation as plainly as he could that he wanted not this force. He wished every President to have fair play, and where his patriotism was undisputed, that he should not have measures forced upon him, which he did not desire. Mr. T. said, he had not expected to hear from the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. KEY,) who last year voted for gunboats as auxiliaries to fortifications, that he now wanted frigates as auxiliaries to gunboats. Next, 74-gun ships would be wanted as auxiliaries to frigates, till they got to ships of 120 guns, as auxiliaries to gunboats! The example of former nations, he said, ought to impress gentlemen with the importance of this subject. Gentlemen had said, that the marine league from our shore had been violated; and so Mr. T. said, that of France had constantly been, except where her batteries had driven them away. But had France sent out frigates for guarda costas? No; with all the revenue which she had at command, she had considered the naval system as a system of profusion, of throwing away money. And when the few frigates which she possessed had escaped from her harbors, had they hugged along the coast? No; for that was the place of greatest danger; they had ran on in the night time till they got off from their own coast for safety. And if we were to send out frigates he hoped they would not be guarda costas, but go off to some distance, and play hide-and-seek with the enemy, and not stay in the very place where they would be sought for.

Mr. NEWTON said he was willing to support on his shoulders all the odium which the adoption of this measure would excite. Instead of a millstone hung around the next President's neck, it would be a buoy to support him. If any effect was produced on the popular feeling, it would be against those who refused to adopt the measure. In case of an attack anywhere, would not every man who refused to send out this force, be censured for having done so? Surely he would. Those who are opposed to us, said Mr. N., who say that we are in possession of power and abuse it, will justly come forward and say that the helm of State ought to be wrested from our hands, because we shall have left the nation exposed to the insults of a foreign Power. When the subject presented itself thus, he said it had an awful bearing. There was no fear of war from sending out our navy. Was the power of peace or war placed in the hands of a naval commander? No. Gentlemen had said that the Decatur of the nation would be seeking opportunities to wipe away the disgrace of the affair of the Chesapeake. Did gentlemen recollect that Decatur and the Chesapeake had been out some time on the coast? There was no fear of their precipitating the nation into war. But it was said that the President did not want this force, because he had not required it. Mr. N. called upon gentlemen to recollect that the President had at the opening of the session devolved upon Congress the work of preparation. He quoted the President's message to show that he had not said what should or should not be done, but that the representatives of the nation, coming from the midst of the people, were the best judges of what ought to be done. Mr. N. said no man within these walls or in the United States had more respect for the President of the United States than himself. As much as he respected that man for his eminent services, the reward of which he trusted he would receive, and that his retirement would be as honorable as that of any statesman or patriot that ever lived, yet, if he differed in opinion with this exalted character, he said he should consider it his duty to pursue the dictates of his judgment. If this bill were not passed, he conceived that the President, seeing from the debates of Congress the disposition of a considerable portion of the representatives of the nation, and those from the parts most exposed to foreign attack, would immediately order all the naval force to be put into requisition. Impressed as he was with the necessity of this measure, and not seeing any good which could result from the recommitment of the bill, he should adhere to the vote which he had given; and particularly as he considered that the safety of the United States required the passage of the bill.

And the question on recommitting the bill being now taken, it passed in the negative—yeas 58, nays 59, as follows:

THURSDAY, January 12.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States;'" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines." Whereupon, the second amendment of the Senate to the said bill, which was depending yesterday at the time of adjournment, being again read at the Clerk's table, and farther debate arising thereon, a motion was made by Mr. JOHN MONTGOMERY, that the said amendments of the Senate, together with the bill, be recommitted to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House: And the question being taken thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 53, as follows:

Resolved, That the said bill and amendments be made the order of the day for to-morrow.

An adjournment was then called for, and carried.

FRIDAY, January 13.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with a statement exhibiting the amount of duties and drawbacks on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and exported therefrom, during the years 1805, 1806, and 1807, inclusive, prepared in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the third of March, 1797; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MUMFORD presented memorials of the surviving officers of the late Revolutionary army and navy of the State of New York, respectively stating their claims to the interest on final settlement certificates for pay, and on commutation certificates; also, the interest upon one-third of the principal of their respective final settlement certificates and commutation certificates, from the periods or dates therein mentioned.—Referred to the committee appointed, on the twenty-sixth ultimo, on the memorials of sundry late officers of the Revolutionary army.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting the account of the fund established for defraying the contingent expenses of Government, for the year 1808. [Of the twenty thousand dollars appropriated for that purpose, two thousand dollars were deposited in the hands of the Attorney General of the United States, to pay expenses incident to the prosecution of Aaron Burr and his accomplices, for treason and misdemeanors alleged to have been committed by them; nine hundred and ninety dollars were paid to the order of Governor Williams, on the same account; and the balance of seventeen thousand and ten dollars remains in the Treasury unexpended.]

Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to incorporate the Trustees of the Presbyterian Church in the town of Alexandria; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of sundry late officers of the Revolutionary army, residing within the State of Maryland, praying that they may receive an allowance of half-pay for life, in consideration of the respective services rendered by the memorialists in the capacity aforesaid, in lieu of the commutation of five years full pay, which had been accepted by the officers of the said Revolutionary army, at the close of the war with Great Britain, as an equivalent for the said half-pay.—Referred to the committee appointed, the twenty-sixth ultimo, on the memorials of sundry late officers of the said Revolutionary army.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States,'" was read twice, and committed to the committee appointed, the eleventh of November last, on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session of Congress, as relates to the Military and Naval Establishments, to consider and report thereon to the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the committee appointed on the twenty-seventh ultimo, presented a bill for the relief of Alexander Baillie; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. GEORGE W. CAMPBELL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL presented two memorials, on the subject of the batture at New Orleans, which were referred.

IMPORTATION OF SALT.

Mr. BURWELL, from the committee appointed to inquire into the propriety of providing for a supply of salt, reported, in part, a bill authorizing the President of the United States to permit vessels to depart from the ports and harbors of the United States for the purpose of bringing in salt; which was twice read, and committed.

The following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury was also laid before the House:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

January 7, 1809.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your letter of the 27th ult. requesting such information as I may possess respecting the means of obtaining immediate and permanent supplies of salt from the establishments of the United States.

The annexed statement A shows the annual consumption of imported salt for each of the calendar years 1802 and 1807, after deducting the quantities used for the cod fishery, and also for pickled fish and salted provisions exported from the United States.

The annual average is almost three millions of bushels, weighing each 56 pounds, equal to 75,000 tons, and requiring in fact 125,000 tons of shipping for its importation. It must also be observed that the deductions above mentioned being calculated by the allowances on fishery and drawbacks; and the allowance being in fact greater than the amount of duty on salt employed in the cod fishery, the quantity of imported salt actually consumed in the United States is greater than appears by the statement.

The statement B is intended to show the gross amount of salt annually imported for the years 1802 and 1807, and the countries from which imported. The manner in which the accounts are kept at the Treasury has rendered it more convenient to give the amount in this instance for the years ending the 30th September than for calendar years.

It will be perceived by the statement A, that the domestic establishments have not increased, even in the same ratio as the population of the United States, for the average of their consumption of imported salt is greater for the last than for the first years of the statement. Considering also the regularity of the importations, and the well known fact that the article has been principally imported as ballast from England, there is reason to believe that the quantity of salt now in the country is very inadequate to the supply of the present year; and I am confident that there can be no reasonable expectation of the deficiency being supplied for that year from internal resources.

I am, therefore, clearly of opinion, that every encouragement should be given to immediate importations, and that measures should at the same time be adopted for the purpose of insuring for the succeeding years a supply from domestic establishments.

The only means of promoting immediate importations appear to be: 1st, either to except salt from the operation of the non-intercourse act, or to put off the general operation of that act till the first of July next; which last alternative appears in every respect the most eligible. 2d. To authorize the President to permit American vessels to proceed, during the continuance of the embargo, to such foreign ports as may be designated by law, for the sole purpose of bringing in cargoes of salt.

The internal resources must be drawn from either the salt springs in the various parts of the Western States, from the Onondago springs in the State of New York, or from the Atlantic shores.

The high price of salt in the Western States does not arise from the actual expense incurred in manufacturing the article, for it does not cost more than seventy-five cents per bushel at the Indiana or Wabash Saline, and yet its market price has not been less than two dollars. It follows, that the price is kept up by reason of the quantity made being much less than the actual demand, and therefore that no considerable addition can be expected from the quantity—none certainly beyond the wants of that part of the country.

The quantity of salt made at the Onondago springs may certainly be considerably increased. I have been informed that about 300,000 bushels are now annually made, and that the amount might, perhaps, be increased to 600,000. On that subject, however, I cannot form a positive opinion, but am satisfied that the most sanguine calculations fall very short of the annual consumption of the United States, and that the principal resource to be relied on is the increase of establishments on the seashore. These may be multiplied in numerous places from Massachusetts to Georgia; and although the repeal of the law laying a duty on importation has checked their progress, experience has proven that capital may be advantageously employed in that manufacture. I think that nothing more is necessary to induce, at present, the application of a capital sufficient in a short time to produce an adequate supply than the certainty of not being ruined by the competition of large importations at reduced prices. But it is doubtful whether it would be most eligible to effect that object by a bounty on the domestic manufacture, or by a renewal of the duty on the importation, to take place after the first of January 1810, and to continue for — years. A combination of both would perhaps be best calculated to insure success, and also most equitable. But a duty on importation alone is the easiest to execute, and is not liable to any Constitutional objections.

The encouragement thus given to domestic establishments may indeed, during the number of years to which the duty or bounty would be limited, increase the price of salt. But that temporary inconvenience should be cheerfully submitted to, if an adequate supply of that necessary article may thereby be ever after insured on reasonable terms, and from internal resources not liable to be affected by war or by any other interruption of commerce. I have the honor to be, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. W. A. BURWELL, Chairman &c.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the amendments of the Senate to the bill for employing seamen and marines.

Mr. J. MONTGOMERY moved to strike out the first amendment of the Senate requiring the President to cause to be manned and employed all the armed vessels and gunboats of the United States, and insert a provision, leaving it discretionary with the President to employ them whenever in his opinion the public service may require it.

A division of the question was called for, so as to take it first on striking out the words in the amendment of the Senate.

On this motion a desultory debate of three or four hours took place, in which Messrs. J. G. JACKSON, G. W. CAMPBELL, SLOAN, SMILEY, SOUTHARD, BACON, GARDNER, GHOLSON, DAWSON, NEWTON, LLOYD, MOSELY, LOVE, LYON, and VAN DYKE partook.

The motion to strike out was carried, 53 to 42; and the motion to insert negatived, 55 to 47.

It was understood that this vote destroyed the first amendment in Committee of the Whole; but that the House might disagree to the report of the Committee.

The question was taken separately on each of the other amendments from the Senate, (for adding to the number of midshipmen, corporals, seamen, and marines,) and carried by majorities of four, five and six votes.

The Committee then rose and reported to the House their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and their agreement to the remainder. And the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, January 14.

The House proceeded to consider the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines," together with the amendments proposed by the Senate thereto: Whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. NICHOLAS that the further consideration of the said bill and amendments be postponed until Monday next. And the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

DISTRESSED SEAMEN.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of sick, disabled, and distressed seamen.

The blank for the sum to be appropriated for the purpose was filled with $200,000—sixty-eight rising in the affirmative. The Committee rose and reported the bill. The question on concurrence with the Committee in filling the blank, having been stated—

Mr. BURWELL said he should vote against this, because he did not consider this class of the community as particularly entitled to relief from the Government; and even if it were proper, there was no security in the bill that the money would be properly applied. He did not believe that there was any such distress among the seamen as represented.

Mr. NEWTON explained that the Secretary of the Treasury had the direction of the fund for the relief of distressed and disabled seamen, which had heretofore been supplied from a tax on their wages. This fund was now exhausted; and the Secretary of the Treasury said, if money were not appropriated, the doors of the hospitals must be closed against them, an office which the Secretary did not wish to perform. He had, therefore, recommended an appropriation of $200,000 for their relief. Mr. N. then stated the peculiar hardships attached to the seaman's situation, &c.

Mr. HOLLAND considered this a novel measure. The seamen who were in distress, he conceived, entitled to relief from the respective States in which they might be, who were bound to support their poor. Indeed this money could not be applied to the use of the embargoed seamen generally, because it was only for the relief of those who were subject to the municipal regulations of the State in which they may be.

Mr. QUINCY observed that the fund for the support of distressed seamen had heretofore been derived from a tax on the wages of the seamen. This fund, which had heretofore been sufficient, having been destroyed by the suspension of commerce, he asked whether the General Government was not pledged to do something for these men, who would not have suffered but for its measures?

Mr. SMILIE was in favor of the bill. The funds heretofore established for the relief of our seamen had been destroyed by a measure which had been deemed necessary for the good of the country, and he thought assistance ought to be given to them. Mr. S. called for the reading of the Secretary of the Treasury's report on the subject.

Mr. TALLMADGE said that every gentleman who attended to the reasoning of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, could not fail to be convinced of the rectitude of his statement, and the conclusion which he had drawn from it. The General Government had destroyed the service by which the seamen had heretofore been supported; in doing which they had thrown a burden on the community in the same ratio as the service had been destroyed. The Secretary of the Treasury had fairly and candidly told the House that the fund for the support of the distressed seamen was destroyed. What should be done? Should nothing be apportioned from the funds of this Government to support the establishment? He hoped and trusted that there would. For the information of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BURWELL,) who did not know that this class of men was more distressed than any other, Mr. T. said he would mention that he had letters from different parts of the Union, particularly from Philadelphia, from one of the most respectable merchants in that city, informing him that the merchants had formed a fund for the relief of these persons, which had been exhausted, the seamen being in the greatest distress, without a stick of wood in the severe weather even to cook their victuals, and requesting him as a member of the General Government to exert himself for their relief. Mr. T. said he would venture to declare that this was the case in all the ports of the United States, and he thought it most unquestionably became the Government to grant some sort of relief to these citizens. He believed that the appropriation proposed was proper, and that less than that would be too little for the purpose.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS thought the object of the bill very laudable, but he wished a modification of the principle. He was willing to advance the $200,000, subject to be refunded from the funds hereafter to be received for the support of this establishment. He thought this amendment would be highly proper, because, from a document in his hands, he found that the funds of the establishment for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, had always been more than sufficient for its support. In June, 1802, the balance of the fund was $76,188; in 1803, the balance was $67,443. This showed that the funds arising out of the twenty-cents-a-month-tax on the seamen's wages, was more than adequate for the purposes for which it had been established, and that the fund would hereafter be able to refund to the Government the moneys now about to be appropriated. Considering the commercial prosperity of this Government since 1803, it was fairly presumable, that at the time of the imposition of the embargo, the balance on hand was greater than at the former period. Under this view of the subject, though he had not the slightest wish to delay the bill, he moved that it lie on the table until an amendment could be prepared.

Mr. NEWTON said that the fund heretofore derived from the tax on seamen, had not been more than adequate to their support. In the town in which he lived, persons had not been admitted into the hospital who were acknowledged to be entitled to relief. In consequence of the construction put upon the law, a great many of the very people who had paid twenty cents a month out of their wages had been thrown upon the community as paupers, and supported by the community at large.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS replied that the result of the amendment which he contemplated would be, that if there never was a balance in the funds the moneys appropriated would never be repaid.

H. or R.

Distressed Seamen.

Mr. STORY deprecated the delay which would result from the bill lying upon the table. The means of supporting this fund were destroyed by a law of the United States, and he thought that the General Government should, by giving an aid to it, supply the deficiency. He represented the peculiarity of the seaman's general character; having no thought for to-morrow, when deprived of his monthly pay, he was of course subjected to distress. In the protection of the general rights of the community, the General Government had been compelled to subject the seamen to a particular calamity. He, therefore, thought that an additional aid for the support of the sick and disabled should be afforded by Congress.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS withdrew his motion for postponement, with a view of moving an amendment.

Further debate took place on this subject, in which Messrs. SLOAN, ALEXANDER, QUINCY, STORY, SMILIE, NEWTON, and D. R. WILLIAMS, advocated the principle of the bill, and Messrs. HOLLAND, BOYD, GARDENIER, and MACON, opposed it. Mr. GARDENIER started a Constitutional objection to the bill; he said that there was no power given under the Constitution by which either House of Congress could be converted into an alms-house; it was assuming the exercise of the legislative powers of the States, which had never even been proposed to be given to the General Government. He said he thought he saw a disposition in a certain part of the Government to encroach upon the rights of the States; and in however pleasing forms those encroachments were dressed, they ought to be guarded against. To this it was replied by Messrs. QUINCY and STORY that, as, under the sanction of a law of the United States, hospitals had been erected, and they labored under a temporary embarrassment, it was in the power of the General Government to afford them temporary assistance. If the General Government had a right to establish marine hospitals, (which question had been settled and acted upon for many years,) and the funds for their support should fail, it was in the power of Congress, under the general clause of the Constitution, to provide temporary funds for their support.

The question on inserting $200,000 was taken by yeas and nays, and carried—Yeas 69, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—Evan Alexander, Willis Alston, jun., Ezekiel Bacon, Joseph Barker, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, William Blackledge, John Blake, jun., John Boyle, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, John Culpeper, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, jun., Josiah Deane, Daniel M. Van Rensselaer, and Robert Whitehill.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS moved to add to the clause making the appropriation the following words: "And that the same shall be refunded into the Treasury of the United States out of such sums as may accrue to the fund for the relief of disabled seamen." This amendment was modified, on the suggestion of Mr. QUINCY, by adding to it the words: "At such times and in such manner as may not defeat the general purposes for which such fund was established." The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. STEDMAN moved to add to the bill the following sentence, which he conceived would make the bill conform to the Secretary of the Treasury's letter on the subject: "And shall be expended therein in proportion to the amount collected in each, (port,) on account of the fund, for the relief of sick and disabled seamen during the year 1807." This was objected to by Messrs. MACON, D. R. WILLIAMS, and NEWTON, who declared that it would defeat the object of the bill, and if adopted would compel many to vote against the bill. Mr. STEDMAN, desirous that the bill should pass, withdrew his amendment.

And on the question, "Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?" there were in favor of it 54—against it 24.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time on Monday.

MONDAY, January 16.

Mr. VAN HORN presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants and proprietors of lots or parcels of land, in Georgetown and its vicinity, in the Territory of Columbia, stating certain objections to the provisions contained in a bill now depending before the House, supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the charter of Georgetown;" and praying that the said bill may be revised and amended in such manner, previous to its passage into a law, as to the wisdom of Congress shall appear best calculated to promote the convenience and benefit of the memorialists, and others.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole to whom was committed, on the fifth instant, the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the charter of Georgetown."

The bill for the relief of Edward Beamont, now imprisoned for the sum of four hundred dollars, due as a penalty, to the United States, went through the Committee of the Whole, was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

DISTRESSED SEAMEN.

An engrossed bill for the relief of sick, disabled, and distressed seamen, was read the third time; and on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 66; nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—Evan Alexander, Willis Alston, jun., Joseph Barker, Burwell Bassett, William Blackledge, John Blake, jun., John Boyle, George W. Campbell, John Culpeper, Richard Cutts, Samuel W. INDIANA TERRITORY.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the division of the Indiana Territory. The blanks in the bill were filled, and it was reported to the House.

[The bill, as reported, provides that after the 1st day of March next, all that part of the Indiana Territory which lies west of the Wabash river, and a direct line drawn from the said Wabash river and Post Vincennes, due north to the Territorial line between the United States and Canada, shall, for the purpose of temporary government, constitute a separate Territory to be called Illinois, and that until otherwise ordered by the Legislature of the said Illinois Territory, Kaskas-ia, on the Mississippi, shall be the seat of Government of the Territory.]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading without a division.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of Navy officers, seamen, and marines." Whereupon, the first amendment, to which the Committee of the Whole reported their disagreement on the thirteenth instant, being again read at the Clerk's table, in the words following, to wit:

"Section one, line two. After the word 'assembled,' insert, 'That there be fitted out, officered, manned, and employed, as soon as may be, all the frigates and other armed vessels of the United States, and gunboats: That the President of the United States be authorized and empowered to cause the frigates and armed vessels, so soon as they can be prepared for actual service, respectively, to be stationed at such ports and places on the seacoast, as he may deem most expedient; or to cruise on any part of the coast of the United States, or territories thereof, and:—"

Mr. MILNOR explained the reasons why he should now vote differently from his vote on a former occasion. He wished that the House would not concur with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the first amendment.

Mr. STURGES assigned the reasons for his vote in a speech of about twenty minutes.

Mr. STORY made a speech of about an hour and a quarter, in favor of the amendments from the Senate.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, spoke about five minutes against them.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS replied to Mr. STORY in a speech of an hour.

Mr. SMILIE spoke on the same side for about fifteen minutes.

Messrs. BACON, LYON, and DURELL, each spoke a short time in favor of the amendments from the Senate.

The question was then taken on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and carried—yeas 68, nays 55, as follows:

YEAS—Evan Alexander, Willis Alston, jun., David Bard, Burwell Bassett, William Blackledge, Thomas Blount, Adam Boyd, John Boyle, Robert Brown, William A. Van Alen, Philip Van Cortlandt, Nicholas Van Dyke, Archibald Van Horn, and Killian K. Van Rensselaer.

The question was then taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the second amendment, and resolved in the affirmative.

The third amendment, to which the Committee of the Whole House also reported their agreement, was again read, in the words following, to wit:

“Section one, line five. Strike out, ‘two thousand seamen,’ and insert ‘four thousand four hundred and forty-seven able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys.’”

The question was then taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the same, and passed in the negative—yeas 41, nays 73, as follows:

The fourth and fifth amendments of the Senate to the said bill, were then again read, and, upon the question severally put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

The title, as amended by the Senate, was then read, in the words following, to wit:

“An act for manning, arming, and equipping, for immediate service, all the public ships of war, vessels, and gunboats of the United States:”

And, on the question that the title be so amended, it passed in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. BASSETT that the House do reconsider their vote of concurrence with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the second of the said amendments; and, on the question for reconsideration, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The question was then taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the said amendment, and passed in the negative.

TUESDAY, January 17.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Edward Beamont was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments disagreed to by this House to the bill, entitled “An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of Navy officers, seamen, and marines,” and desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendments; to which conference the Senate have appointed managers on their part.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating certain letters which passed between the British Secretary of State, Mr. Canning, and Mr. Pinkney, our Minister Plenipotentiary at London.

The Message and accompanying papers having been read—

Mr. BURWELL moved that 5,000 copies of the Message and documents be printed. He said, while up, he could not refrain from expressing his regret that the Executive had not taken a different course to counteract the effect of Mr. Canning's letter than the one which he had chosen. It was impossible that any new evidence should have been wanting to prove that our Government had acted with justice and moderation. But it is so perfectly plain that we are waging a war of honor and candor against treachery and intrigue, that it is surprising that a stop has not been put to it. Why is it that our presses are teeming with treachery? A regular system is going on to overthrow the Government. How is it that men high in the Government say that no formal offer was made to Great Britain to repeal our embargo on the revocation of her Orders in Council, when there are documents before us proving directly the contrary? Yet, sir, it was asserted, by men high in office in this country, that our Minister had acted only in his individual capacity long before this British Minister's letter was published. But what does this singular letter amount to? Mr. Canning wishes to prove that the offer to repeal the embargo was made in an unofficial manner, when there is a formal letter from himself in answer to the official note of Mr. Pinkney, making the proposition as from his Government. Why did not Mr. Canning meet him? This letter of his is but a continuation of that infamous system of misleading the people of this country which has been so long persisted in. Recollect the speech of Mr. Canning on the floor of Parliament on the 24th day of June last. Sir, I am sorry to mention this subject here, but when I see the rights of my country insulted, and public sensibility worked upon as it has been, I cannot restrain my feelings. It is time to put a stop to this underhanded system. Can it be forgotten what were the sentiments of the people of America when the famous Genet commenced his appeal from the President, who properly put a stop to it? Why does Canning contend that the Orders in Council were not known to us at the time that the embargo was laid? It is to meet the feelings of the country, and to support views taken in this nation. I hope that 5,000 copies will be printed, and that this is the last time we shall be under the necessity of counteracting these insidious appeals to the people.

Mr. NICHOLAS observed, that the letters which had just been read furnished another evidence of the fidelity and ability of the public servants; and another signal to warn the people of this country of the danger which hangs over them, to show that the British Government is in a course of intrigue for the purpose of separating the people from their Government. I want no other evidence of this than the letter of Mr. Canning, which has just been read. How did that letter get into the papers of the United States. It must have been sent here by the British Government—for what purpose? It is an appeal by the Government of Great Britain to the people of America. On what ground is this appeal made? On the ground of justice, of truth, or of sincerity? Neither, sir; it is for the purpose of deceiving the people of this country with the most ungentlemanly and unmanly misrepresentations. God forbid that I should believe that Great Britain has many adherents in this country; but that she has some, this business is to my mind full demonstration. How is this production received? How is it ushered into the public view? Have the printers who first gave it publicity shown even a common impartiality between their own Government and that of a foreign nation? Have they shown a desire to hear what their Government could say? Can these men be Americans? No, sir; they are British partisans, pleading the cause of the British Government against their own. Mr. N. said, he had before him a paper called the Boston Centinel, containing some comments on Mr. Canning's letter. [Mr. N. here quoted some passages from these comments, stating this letter of Mr. Canning's to be evidence of a partiality in the Government of the United States to France, &c.] This is an American print, said Mr. N., and this letter is exultingly given to the American people as tending to show that their Government has practised a deception upon them.

Mr. TROUP said, he believed that the publication of this letter was intended by the British Government to influence the people; and in order that the whole truth might be widely disseminated, he moved that ten thousand copies be printed.

Mr. GARDENIER concurred most heartily in the motion for printing, and also in the proposition for the largest number of copies. Assuredly if there was a matter upon which it was important that the people of the United States should be correctly informed, it was the subject which the message of this morning placed before the House. I for one, he said, cannot help regretting deeply that the public confidence in the administration of the Government should have been so shaken by some cause or other, as that gentlemen of the first respectability and no common influence in this House, should be driven to the necessity of combatting on this floor the ebullitions of the editor of a newspaper. Are these publications of newspapers the topics fit for discussion in the House of Representatives of the United States? Is it come to this, sir, that a Representative of the people, to protect his Government from public odium, thinks it necessary to array the Representatives of the nation against the humble editors of a newspaper? I feel humiliated that the affairs of this country should be brought into such a condition that it should be necessary that the editor of a newspaper, for the first time, should be refuted by a member of this House in his place. I had thought that these ebullitions passed by the Government as an idle wind which it heeded not. But if the Government is brought, either by its own weakness or the machinations of a foreign nation, to such a situation that it cannot stand a paragraph in a newspaper, it is brought to a low pass indeed. But the remarks of this editor have been introduced into the House. I do not wish at this time to go over the ground and admit or deny the proposition which he conceives he has established. But I regret that this humble editor should have been made the subject of such severe remark, not only because I wish that he should have been unnoticed in this House, but because I confess that in the material matter of fact, I can see nothing of harm which this poor editor has done. He has printed the letter of Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney; and it appears that he has published a document which the Administration had not thought proper to communicate, but which was genuine and true. From these facts, now established beyond controversy, this editor has undertaken, for the amusement and instruction of his readers, to make certain comments which appear to his mind proper. If the fact be as the editor has stated it, his comments are of no importance, especially at this moment, when newspapers on both sides have given themselves up to such misrepresentations. Whether his inferences be correctly drawn or not, is matter for the people to decide. Those remarks are but reflections upon a document which on all hands is conceded to be matter of fact—and why should gentlemen be alarmed if his inferences be absurd or ridiculous? If the integrity of the Administration opposes that impenetrable shield to the shafts of its enemies which it always should do, whence this alarm? I am fearful that the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NICHOLAS,) whose known prudence and good sense I cannot avoid respecting, saw something more in all this than the mere usual efforts of the editor of a newspaper; and in the same proportion as he attaches importance to them will the people do the same. It is unfortunate for the Administration that this course has been pursued; it will awaken remark and mischievous curiosity among the people. Probably if mention had not been made of it, it might have passed without notice; but now I fear that suspicions will be entertained which but for this mode might never have been excited by the editor of a newspaper. After all I must confess that I do not find a great deal of fault with this editor of a newspaper for the publication of a document; and his remarks are out of the question. The people of the United States cannot know too much. However the Administration may have thought it of little importance to communicate the documents heretofore, yet it can do no harm to the good sense of the people to read all that has passed. I see no danger in it; and whether it comes from the Cabinet of Great Britain or from our own, I have that confidence in the people of the United States, that I am willing to trust them with it. If circumstances throw no blame on the Administration, they need not fear it. I am for publishing the whole because I am desirous that the people should know everything, and shall always be thankful that a necessity (for whatever reason) does exist for informing them. And if I have cause of regret on this subject, it is not from the same source as that expressed by the gentleman from Virginia. My regret is that this communication should not have been made before this time; and that the necessity of making these documents public should in this manner have been brought about. As a Representative of the American people I feel humbled by this; and whatever importance may be attached to it, am sorry that the Administration has not heretofore seen the necessity of laying before the public everything relating to their proposition to repeal the embargo; for the whole argument in favor of the continuation of the embargo has turned very much on the rejection by the British Government of our candid offer. It is of importance that the people should be apprized of everything connected with that matter, because it is the pivot on which the embargo has turned; and I regret exceedingly that the President of the United States should not have seen the importance of making these documents public hitherto—that he should have seen it only when one of the letters was published. If I understand the message of to day, the reason why this communication is made, is, that Mr. Canning's letter is calculated to make an impression unfavorable to the character of the Government, and the answer is necessary to set them right. It would have been a much better reason for communicating it heretofore, that the people ought to be fully informed. I know not whether the strongest sensation of regret which I feel is; that it has not before been made public by the Administration, or that this House should be made the organ of communication, for the purpose of preserving to it the confidence of the people. Let gentlemen remember that as long as the liberty of the press exists, it will be licentious; that as long as the Republic exists, there will be parties, those in power and those out. It is to be expected that they will assail each other frequently, ungenerously, and with much calumny; and Administrations may again fall as they have fallen. It is one of the evils attending the invaluable liberty of the press. If the printers publish untruth, I have no objection to punish them, but I do not like these denunciations of a printer, who will laugh at them. He does not care; he will acquire new vigor, and those who participate in his sentiments will like him much better for the publicity given to his name.

H. OF R.

Foreign Relations.

JANUARY, 1809.

Mr. LOVE said, as he presumed from his observations that the gentleman from New York was not in the House when the message was read, he rose to state that the answer of Mr. Pinkney was not in the possession of the Government when the formal correspondence on the subject was published. Whether or not it was correct to notice newspaper effusions on the floor, it was certainly quite as correct for one gentleman to comment upon them as for another to rise in their defence. The statement which he had seen in the newspapers was not correct, and could only be intended for deception and to mislead the people at this critical moment.

Mr. MASON said, notwithstanding the licentiousness of newspaper editors, he was against any law for curbing them. Let them run their whole length, said he, I only ask the liberty of buying such of their papers as I like. As long as the press is free, newspapers will make their own comments; and a great many will make those which I do not approve. But it is really to be regretted that I do not know a paper in the United States that takes up both sides. I wish there was such a one. On the subject of this message, to be serious, it strikes me in a different point of view from that in which it has appeared to any other gentleman. Compare the fact of the extraordinary mode of publication of Mr. Canning's letter in New York, (some say in Boston) with several late transactions, as the invitations of our citizens to violate our laws, the vessels on our coast forcing a trade, &c., and I can consider them in no other light than as appeals to the people of this country by the British Ministry. Instead of alienating the affections of this people from their Government, it will more strongly attach them to it. That Great Britain should address this runaway proclamation to our people, is not surprising. We are a people made up of emigrants and descendants from different nations, and there are some men amongst us who are not as virtuous as a Cato or Aristides. This circumstance will induce European Governments always to make attempts of this sort. Mr. Canning's letter has struck me in a curious point of view, compared with the documents heretofore communicated. At one time he wants conversations, and at another time written communications. The letter read to-day completely satisfies my mind on this subject. At the very time that this letter of the British Minister is published at Boston, a public armed ship appeared on the coast of Georgia, cruising after cotton. Sir, nothing can be stronger evidence to me of the efficiency of the measures which this nation has taken in relation to Europe, than a fair examination of the conduct of Great Britain towards us since. Why the proclamation encouraging evasions of our laws? Why these publications? Why the ship or ships on the coast of Georgia, sir? Facts speak stronger than words, the efficacy of our measures. Can it be possible that a proclamation inviting violations of our laws would be issued, that armed ships would be sent on smuggling expeditions on our coast by any civilized nation which did not feel our measures? The worst Government that ever existed, as well as the worst man that ever existed, is desirous of maintaining a good character with the world. This proclamation was not issued whilst we had anything left afloat. When they cannot plunder you, they will harbor your runaways. That is the plain English of it, sir. On the subject of the embargo, as it has become fashionable, I will state my impressions of circumstances as they existed at the time of its passage. As well as I recollect, there were reports in circulation, that the British Orders in Council had issued. I cared not for it. I was satisfied that they would be, if they were not, issued, and under that impression I voted for the embargo. I am glad, sir, that we had sagacity sufficient to be so quick upon their heels that they caught no plunder by their orders. I must here say, because it is my opinion, that the Administration have not acted in respect to the embargo as they should have done, because they offered that to Great Britain which they did not offer to France. Instead of partiality to France, sir, the documents prove they have displayed a partiality to Great Britain. I would have offered the same to both, although Great Britain is our greatest tormentor, because she has a navy, whilst the other has not. The gentleman from New York (Mr. GARDENIER) seems to think that it is necessary to publish these documents in order to strengthen the Administration. I much doubt, sir, (and it is well known that on a difference of opinion with the Administration I have come out and opposed them with as much zeal as any man in this House) if you ever have another Administration in these times of confusion, which will go out as popular as this. Every new Administration will naturally carry with it some men who are willing to sing hosannas to the powers that be; to pay their devotions to the rising sun. This will always happen; but no Administration going out will be as popular as the present.

Sir, I care not with what view these documents were sent to us—I am glad they are come. But I believe that the gentleman from New York is mistaken in one statement he made—that this was the first time that a newspaper had ever been commented on in the House of Representatives! I have seen a paper called the Aurora, repeatedly brought into this House, and commented on to prove the necessity of passing a sedition law. Perhaps there are some gentlemen in the House who may recollect the circumstance. [Mr. GARDENIER said that this was before his time.] With the gentleman from New York, sir, I am willing to trust the people; and I believe truth wants but half fair play to prevail, for I have seen her prevail when she could not speak—when she had a padlock on her mouth. Truth will prevail, and it is the interest of every Administration that acts honestly to publish all. I should wish to see the Administration of this Government lay aside the practice of giving a little at a time, and come out at once and say, I wish to do this; and then, if we will not consent to do it, there is an end of it. With respect to our Government playing cunning against any other Government, it is idle; it can never do good whilst they have untold millions of secret service money against our single cent. I should therefore wish that foreign nations had no Ministers here, nor we any there. Instead of giving Ministers nine thousand dollars to go there, I would rather give them fifty thousand to come home. I wish the whole proceedings of our Administration to be at the door of every man in the nation; that every man should have a copy for himself, for his wife, for each of his children, and indeed for all his household. Had this been done heretofore, the present crisis would have been nothing like what it is. They would there have seen truth, and facts precisely as they exist, neither curtailed or exaggerated by this or that party paper.

Mr. BACON said, that he rose merely to correct an error of statement into which the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MACON) had fallen, as to the source from which the first publication of the British Minister had originated. The gentleman had attributed it to a New York paper. This Mr. B. believed was incorrect. Being desirous, if either honor or censure could be attached to any American press, from the circumstance of its being considered the official organ of a foreign Government, that it should lie at the right door, he thought it proper to state, that the first appearance of that letter was, as he understood, in a paper called the "New England Palladium," printed in Boston. There was one other fact which he mentioned with some regret, it was this; that by some unfortunate concurrence of circumstances, assuredly without any improper intention, the printers of this paper had been by the Legislature of Massachusetts in the course of the present year, designated as the printers of their public acts, and their paper was a sort of State Gazette. On this unlucky coincidence, it would be as painful to him as it might be indecorous to indulge in any comments. From the known patriotism of that honorable Legislature, however, there could be no doubt that if they should perceive any sort of incorrectness in the conduct of their subordinate agents, if it should strike them as an incongruity that their servants should appear to be acting in a double capacity, they would so manifest their sense on the subject as should best accord with their views of propriety, and their feelings of national honor.

Mr. Fisk thanked the gentleman from New York for his compliment to the people of New England on their "mischievous curiosity." The gentleman seems to suppose, said Mr. F., that it would have been more proper for the President of the United States to have communicated these documents for the purpose of giving a correct view of our affairs, than for any other reason. I would ask the gentleman to point out what different view the present letter of Mr. Canning, published first at Boston, has given, from the documents which have heretofore been published? Certainly none, sir. The only inference to be drawn from it, is the insincerity or intrigue of the British Government; for, if the fact was, that Mr. Canning did not accept the offer of Mr. Pinkney, because it appeared to be unauthorized, how happened it that Mr. Canning forgot to state it in his official, formal letter, instead of those reasons which he has given for the rejection of the proposal? The gentleman regrets that newspapers, or their editors, should be noticed here. It is not from a disposition to give them importance beyond their merits; but we discover something from their publications, and it is for that that they are noticed—to show that there is an intrigue carrying on in this country; that the British Government is endeavoring to divide the people—to separate them from their Government through the means of the press. In the course of this session, sir, many insinuations against our own Government have been thrown out on this floor. My colleague (Mr. ELLIOT) made one the other night, in the course of a long speech, which I cannot now notice.

Mr. GARDENIER called Mr. FISK to order, for alluding to an argument which the gentleman (Mr. ELLIOT) was prevented from making, by a decision of the Speaker that it was out of order.

Mr. FISK said he alluded not to what his colleague had meant to say, but to what he did say. Mr. F. said he had merely risen to ask, if the gentleman from New York considered his insinuations to be true, that he would show to the House how or wherein they were true. He hoped the documents would be printed, and sincerely joined with the gentleman from North Carolina in wishing a universal diffusion of information.

Mr. TAYLOR observed, that, although not opposed to printing a very considerable number of the documents sent to the House, yet in themselves he did not give them that importance which some gentlemen were pleased to give them. And he confessed, that, when a gentleman had handed him a paper containing the famous letter of Mr. Canning, he had concluded, from the paper itself, and the pitiful and pimpling manner in which it was ushered into view, that it was a forgery. What is it? said Mr. T. A relation of conversations on particular topics, in which the writer himself assisted—not with a view, it seems, of bringing them to an issue by conversation, for he required that these conversations should be considered as nothing, by demanding that his propositions should be made in writing. They were brought forward in writing by our Minister. The authority of his Government for them was vouched to the British Minister; and of that proposition, a rejection in the most insulting terms was returned by Mr. Canning to our Minister. And now, sir, the public mind here is to be misled by a relation of a conversation which took place at several meetings by this very polite gentleman, who has been convicted by a whole nation of falsehood, by observing, in June, that no remonstrance had been made by this Government against the Orders in Council. The fact is, that the Orders in Council will not bear examination. For the honor of the House I assert it, no gentleman has come forward on this floor and vindicated the Orders in Council. And yet the public mind, it is supposed, can be led from this great subject, in which the honor and independence of the nation are concerned—that the people are to be deceived by a tea-table talk of Mr. Canning! I could not have supposed that a man of his wit could have been concerned in so weak a project—he could not have been concerned in it. Since the effort has been made by some incendiary, let us pour upon this pitiful scintilla—this small spark of wickedness—the overwhelming torrent of conviction to the public mind, which is contained in Mr. Pinkney's answer to that letter. But we read eternally in the newspapers of a partiality to France in this Government. Why, sir, the very circumstance of this letter being withheld from Congress by the Administration is a proof of a disposition in the Government not to put at hazard our present relations (precarious as they are) with Great Britain. The letter of Mr. Canning ought to have been, as it was, withheld till the answer was received—and why? Because, the broad calumny which is uttered against this nation, in this cowardly manner, when the whole truth in Mr. Pinkney's letter comes out, is found to allude to newspapers, the very things we have been talking of. Taken unexplained, I ask whether it would not have set in flames the people of this nation? Read this clause:

"You gave me, on that account, the most satisfactory proof that such misrepresentation did not originate with you, by communicating to me that part of your despatch in which the conferences particularly referred to were related correctly. But this very circumstance, which establishes your personal claim to entire confidence, proves at the same time that a faithful report of a conference on your part is not a security against its misrepresentation."

As the thing stands unexplained, who are the persons supposed to be capable of making misrepresentations? The Government, sir. The Administration has had in this instance to suppress feelings in which, had the letter been published, all the honest part of the community would have participated, till the explanation came. As this explanation has come, it does show that the persons alluded to as capable of making misrepresentations are the editors of newspapers. I do not, with the gentleman from New York, regret the particular notice taken of the editor of a newspaper on this subject, because the article alluded to bears a peculiar character. It does not proceed from the fumes of the cauldron or the paws of little devils, alluded to the other day (by Mr. QUINCY.) No, sir; an arch fiend had a hand in it—whether on this or the other side of the Atlantic, I care not. It is an appeal to the people of this country, made in favor of the British Government against our own.

Mr. KEY said that he would give his hearty vote for printing the greatest number of copies proposed; for he did conceive that the American people ought to have full information, and that the antidote should accompany the poison. I consider the late publication, said he, as the most direct and insidious attempt of a foreign Government to take advantage of and influence the parties in this country, and that too by dishonorable means. The paper alluded to could only have been in possession of our own Administration or of the British Government. It came not from us; it must have proceeded from the other—and from what view? Had fair information been the object, the letter of Mr. Pinkney in reply would also have been made public, that one might have been confronted with the other. If it proceeded from that quarter, the separation of the reply from the letter, is evincive of the attempt to impose on the people. I consider it an attempt to set the people at variance with their Government, and an insolent attempt of a foreign nation to interfere in our affairs, in three points of view. First. Mr. Pinkney is expressly exonerated from the charge of misrepresentation; but no man can understand it otherwise than as having allusion to the Executive of the country—an insinuation which there is no proof to support, and in support of which none can be adduced. Whatever difference of political opinion may exist between us on some points, I respect the Administration on the whole, and every honest man of every political opinion must side with me. Secondly. There is an insinuation that the President of the United States had only permitted our Minister at London individually, not formally, to make a proposition on the subject of the embargo. This is unfounded in fact, because the documents before the House prove to the contrary. Thirdly. A question is raised whether actual knowledge of the Orders in Council of November, was in possession of our Government at the time of the laying the embargo, which Mr. Pinkney has fully explained, that the American papers showed that it was well known before the passage of the embargo that such would probably be the measures adopted by the British Government. It is upon these three great questions, that this letter is insidiously calculated to delude the American people. I, think therefore, as ample publicity should be given to the truth as may be. However we may differ as to internal regulations, I hope we shall feel as husband and wife, who, however they jar, will not suffer the interference of a third person. In case of such interference, I trust we shall always be ready to rally around the constituted authorities, as protecting the true interests of the country.

Mr. COOK said that these documents showed, that, instead of being more favorable to France than Great Britain, (as had been said for party purposes,) our Administration had been far less favorable to France than Great Britain, and less favorable than they ought to have been. I shall never feel cordial, said he, in going to war with France, until we make to her the same liberal offer which we have made to Great Britain, and it shall be refused. The publication of this memorable letter of Mr. Canning's is but another attempt to mislead the people, and rob the Executive of their just confidence. The letter itself is of little consequence. It appears that the conduct of the President has been perfectly correct. It would have caused a false impression had Mr. C.'s letter been published before Mr. Pinkney's answer was received. Mr. Canning, however, acting with less candor than the President of the United States, has thought fit to publish one without the other; and therefore I wish the reply to be circulated fully.

Mr. LYON considered the documents of very little importance, conveying no new information; but made some observations on the mode of printing them.

Mr. STORY said he was sorry to rise, because the patience of the House must be exhausted; but it was a duty incumbent on him to take the floor. This is not a new occasion, said he. More than once in twenty years, the same attempt has been made by foreign intrigues; and when the attempt has been made, there was scarcely a man in America but considered it insidious and disgraceful. Like the gentleman from New York, it was before my time; but I gathered the feelings of the moment, and held sacred the same feelings as were avowed by the Father of his Country. Whatever may be our political differences, sir, it is incumbent on all of us to frown indignantly on any foreign Government, that should attempt to influence the people. The publication of garbled and mutilated documents, purporting to be real correspondence between one country and another, has been a means used to lead the public mind into a state of distempered jealousy, and array the citizen against his country. It has been too long the case in Europe. Whenever the sword has been drawn, corruption has preceded it; and when I find the same means used to detach the people of this country from their Government by similar attempts, I cannot repress my contempt of them. It is not any importance which I attach to Mr. Canning's letter that excites my indignation, because the very letter compared with his formal answer to Mr. Pinkney's note, is a complete answer to itself; for, in the documents long ago published, we find an offer in the most formal manner, by Mr. Pinkney, to repeal the embargo as related to Great Britain on the suspension of the Orders in Council; and Mr. Canning in his formal reply has not even intimated the least suspicion that the offer was not the open act of the American Government. Mr. P. with his usual candor, exhibited his own instructions to satisfy Mr. Canning not only that this offer was made by the authority of the Government, but that it was made in the spirit of conciliation and sincerity. And by this letter a new feature is exhibited, for the purpose, almost avowed, of dissolving the Union. I regret to see that our miserable little differences have induced foreign nations to tamper with us; that they have dared to believe that we are not intelligent enough to know our own rights. I regret that our divisions have been such as to induce a foreign nation thus to present a picture to the world of what she believed our real state. It is proved too truly that our own conduct has lessened us in the opinion of foreign nations, has induced them to believe that we are a divided people; it is proved too truly that they have thought the American nation either corrupted with luxury or overawed by the iron hand of despotism, and that they have not strength for a moment to sustain their political structure. The letter of Mr. Canning but for this would not have been published in the Eastern part of this country, to foment those divisions produced by existing circumstances. Sir, I cannot but notice the honorable conduct of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. KER.) who, though opposed in political opinion to the present Administration, has shown himself to be a real friend to his country. If the same spirit which he has manifested, was exhibited throughout our country, instead of dissensions on this floor, that moment an attempt was made by a foreign nation to injure our rights, our differences on minor points would dissolve into air. It is not necessary for me to state, because the gentleman from Maryland has clearly shown, the reason of the publication of that letter. As one, sir, I do know that it was not only understood that the Orders in Council were about to issue, but that, before I heard of the embargo, I had seen letters and newspapers which informed that these orders were signed in the Cabinet, though not published to the world. In respect to Mr. Canning's saying that the offer to repeal the embargo was not authorized, the despatches laid on our table, at the commencement of the session, show to the contrary; and his own formal letter is a denial of the insinuation in the letter to-day communicated.

Why then was this letter published in this extraordinary manner? To add to the divisions and lessen the confidence of the people in their Government; to enable Great Britain to take advantage of these divisions and resume her dominion over the Northern States. With this view of the subject, I cannot but conceive that this letter is but a part of a system which has for its object the degradation of our country. I trust we shall on this occasion unite; that we shall not allow any foreign Minister to believe that he can publish ex parte statements of, or garbled extracts of official correspondence; that divided as we may be on other subjects, we are united in a determination to support our rights.

Mr. GARDENIER said, by this time the editor of the Columbian Centinel must be pretty well mauled. The fact is, said he, as regards myself, that I have never read with attention the documents said to be official; and therefore unfortunately am not in a situation to determine whether in this respect our Administration is to blame or not. I am one of those men who cannot comprehend all the details of such a negotiation at first glance. I do not believe that knowledge is to be attained by so rapid a progress. Therefore, I shall not at present follow other gentlemen in their verdict of acquittal. I hope to be able to do it. A gentleman from Vermont (Mr. FISK) appeared to be offended at my imputing mischievous curiosity to the people of New England. If the gentleman supposes that I mean any harm to the people of New England, he is mistaken. It is not necessary for me to take up any time of the House in expatiating on the respect which I have for the people of New England. New England was the cradle of American liberty. Sir, it was there the Revolution commenced. From that same quarter I apprehend that the same spirit will again arise. A light appears first in the East, which I hope soon to see break forth into the most perfect day. The gentleman from Vermont, after this declaration, I hope will not impute to me any disrespect to the people of New England. They will not submit either to the insolence or injustice of foreign nations, or to any other. Nature intended them for a great and happy people. The gentleman from Vermont has misunderstood me in one thing. I did not say that Mr. Canning's letter contained any view of the subject not heretofore given; and therefore have no occasion to answer his question.

The question on printing the documents was then taken, and five thousand copies ordered to be printed.

An engrossed bill for dividing the Indiana Territory into two separate governments was read the third time: Whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. BISH that the said bill do lie on the table. And, debate arising thereon, an adjournment was called for, and carried.

relief of Jacob Barnitz; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the committee appointed on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, at the commencement of the session, as relates to the erection of fortifications for the security of our seaport towns and harbors, presented a bill making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States; and to defray the expense of deepening and extending to the river Mississippi the canal of Carondelet; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to whom was referred, on the fifteenth ultimo, a petition of sundry inhabitants of the counties of Alexandria and Washington, in the said District, presented a bill to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's causeway to Alexandria; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. MARION, from the committee to whom was recommended, on the 19th of December last, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act further to amend the Judicial System of the United States," reported their agreement to the same, with an amendment; which was read, and, together with the said bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

DIVISION OF INDIANA TERRITORY.

The House proceeded to take into further consideration an engrossed bill for dividing the Indiana Territory into two separate governments.

Messrs. THOMAS, SLOAN, LYON, and W. ALSTON, supported the bill; and Messrs. MACOM, EPPEE, and J. G. JACKSON, opposed it.

The arguments in favor of the bill, generally, were: That the line of demarcation which the Wabash affords between the Eastern and Western portions of said Territory, added to the wide extent of wilderness country, which separates the population in each, constitute reasons in favor of a division founded on the soundest policy, and conformable with the natural situation of the country; that the vast distance from the settlements west of the Wabash to the present Territorial government, renders the administration of justice burdensome and expensive in the highest degree, amounting almost to a denial of justice; that the scattered situation of the settlements over this extensive country enervates the power of the Executive, and renders it almost impossible to keep that part of the government in order; that the division of the Territory is a matter of right under the ordinance, and the inconveniences to be removed by an immediate separation would encourage the speedy population of the Territory; that there are about 28,000 inhabitants in the Territory of Indiana, and 2,700 souls between the ages of 16 and 21, in that part proposed to be constituted a new Territory; that there can be no objection to the proposition but the expense, which it was expected would be fully compensated to the United States by the increased value of public lands in each district.

The arguments against the bill, generally, were: That this bill proposed to multiply officers without any advantage proposed from it, which was contrary to republican principles; that the expense to the United States for this new government would be $6,950 yearly, when the people to be governed amounted to but 2,700, between the age of 16 to 21, the whole population of the Territory proposed to be divided containing but 28,000 souls; that the City of Washington contained at least as many as the portion proposed to be erected into a new Territory, and the District of Columbia as many as the whole Territory, and it would certainly excite some surprise, if Congress were to erect two Territorial governments in the District, one on one side the Potomac, and one on the other; that this proceeding might be very convenient to the men who should be appointed governors and judges, but for no other good purpose; that there was no other part of the United States in which the same inconvenience was not felt as that complained of by the inhabitants of Indiana Territory, whose situation was very different from that of the Michigan Territory; that there were many places in different States whence the people had to go two or three hundred miles to the courts; that a compliance with this petition would but serve to foster their factions, and produce more petitions.

On the passage of the above bill there were for it 69, against it 37, as follows:

On motion of Mr. NEWTON,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the conference desired by the Senate on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the said bill; and that Mr. MACON, Mr. SMILIE, and Mr. UPHAM, be appointed managers on the part of this House.

And on motion, the House adjourned until tomorrow.

THURSDAY, January 19.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain Alabama Indians;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying his report, and sundry documents in relation to invalid pensioners of the United States, transmitted in pursuance of the third and fifth sections of "An act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war;" which were read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom were referred, during the present session, the petitions of sundry inhabitants of the State of Ohio, praying a remission of the forfeitures accruing on the instalments due on the purchase money for lands purchased of the United States, and the allowance of further time for the payment of the principal, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the whole House, to whom was committed, on the twenty-third of November last, a report of the Committee on the Public Lands on a memorial of the House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory.

Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, from the same committee, presented a bill to alter the terms of sale of the public lands of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. Lewis presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the county of Washington, in the Territory of Columbia, praying a repeal of the fourth section of a law of Congress, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia."—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. MARION, from the committee who were instructed, by a resolution of the House, of the twentieth of December last, "to inquire into the expediency of extending jurisdiction to the superior courts of the several Territories of the United States, in which a district court has not been established for the trial of treason, and other offences committed against the laws of the United States, within the limits of the said Territories; and to empower said courts to pronounce such judgment or sentence on conviction of the offender or offenders, as the law directs;" presented a bill extending jurisdiction, in certain cases, to the Territorial courts, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

EXTRA SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SMITH the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to alter the time of the next meeting of Congress.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON moved to strike out the "fourth" Monday in May, and insert the "last," stating as a reason, that as the Virginia elections took place in April, the Representatives could not arrive here in time.

Mr. MACON wished a division of the question so as first to strike out, with a view to insert "September," instead of May. The motion to strike out was negatived—62 to 35. It was supposed that this question tried the principle of the bill.

The Committee rose and reported the bill.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS moved to strike out May for the purpose of inserting "September."

Mr. MILNOR hoped the motion would not be agreed to. If the new Congress could commence its session on the 4th day of March next, he said he should think it extremely proper that it should do so. And, if he could think that the majority would fix an earlier day than the fourth Monday of May for the meeting, he should vote for the present motion. He agreed with gentlemen that this was a momentous crisis; that the country was in a situation of extreme difficulty and danger. It appeared to him, therefore, that Congress, who were the guardians of the public welfare; to whom were confided the destinies of the nation, so far as the nation could control them, should be constantly in session, till a more favorable state of affairs took place. It was possible, but was it probable that any event would occur to alter our situation for the better? There was no hope that the belligerents would recede from their injurious restrictions on our commerce. It was not probable that anything would occur which would do away the necessity of an extra session. The present Congress having determined to persevere in the embargo and the present system of measures a while longer, the peace and welfare of the country required that a different system should be adopted. The present had been sufficiently tested, and would never produce those effects anticipated from it. It was proper that an early opportunity should be given to the next Congress to approve the present system, or give it up and adopt some other in its stead.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said he was opposed to Congress coming here at the time proposed. Why should they come here then? He wished some one to answer, and let him understand why they were coming. In his opinion there was every possible objection to such a procedure. On the fourth day of March, a new President comes into power. Is it not presumable that the President would choose to have some communication with our Ministers abroad before the meeting of Congress? Could any man say that it was not proper that he should have it? Mr. W. said he hoped that the President would send special messengers, unfashionable as that policy was. If you are willing to wait for a declaration of war till the fourth Monday in May, will there be any necessity of declaring it before the first Monday in June or July? You have suffered the public mind to assuage in its resentment, and I very much doubt, that before a full experiment be made of the embargo, it will be wholly allayed. It has been said through the nation, and indeed avowed on this floor, that the Administration does not wish for peace. Having failed to take hold of the affair of the Chesapeake for a declaration of war, you have nothing now to give the people that interest which I hope they always will have in a declaration of war. Suppose you were to send special Ministers, and they were to be treated as our Ministers to France were under a former Administration, would not this treatment make every man in the nation rally around you? Would it not prove beyond doubt that the Administration was sincere in its wishes for peace? Undoubtedly it would. Why are your Ministers now loitering in foreign Courts? With a hope of accommodation, sir. I would send other Ministers there, and if they failed of immediate accommodation, would order them all home. If they are compelled to return, you will have the whole nation with you, which you must have when you go to war.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON replied to Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman had asked emphatically why Congress should convene here in May. Occurrences of every day, said Mr. J., are presenting themselves in such a way as to render it highly important and necessary that some other ground should be taken. Are we to adhere to the embargo forever, sir? I have said, and again say, that a total abandonment of the ocean would be submission. I think, by passing this bill, we give the nation a pledge that it shall be the ne plus ultra, which shall give to foreign nations time to revise their conduct towards us, and will give them time to consider whether or not they will have war with us. The gentleman wants a special mission. Sir, are we to continue in this state any longer? Shall negotiation be spun out further? No man can doubt the capacity of our Ministers abroad, and their disposition to represent their Government correctly. The doors are shut in the face of our Minister at the Court of St. James, and worse than shut at the Court of St. Cloud—for, from the latter, contemptuous silence is all the answer we have received, if indeed silence can convey an answer. Are we to renew negotiation, then, when every circumstance manifests that it would be useless? Need I refer to what took place the other day—I allude to the publication of a letter by Mr. Canning, in a highly exceptionable manner, through Federal presses, or presses more devoted to the interests of that country than any other? One universal burst of indignation accompanied the publication of that letter in this House. And are we, under such circumstances, to renew negotiation by extra missions? I conceive that the cup of negotiation and conciliation is exhausted to the dregs, and that we should but further degrade ourselves by sending further extra missions. It has been stated to me that a proposition had actually been reduced to writing by a member of this House the other day for sending away foreign Ministers and calling our Ministers home; and I am sorry that the proposition was not offered to the House, for, under present circumstances, it might not have been improper to have adopted it. The gentleman asks if the Government has in its power any thing to rouse the people? There is no occasion for it, sir; they impel us towards war; we can scarcely keep them out of it; we can scarcely maintain our course a moment. Nothing but a disposition to confide in the constituted authorities prevents them from expressing their inclination more loudly. Passing over everything else, are not the orders and decrees sufficient to induce the nation to impel us to take the attitude of war, if the time was proper for it? The best answer to the gentleman's question may be found in the vote of this House, which has unanimously declared, with an exception of but two members, and those two I understand to be opposed to the declaration because it was a self-evident proposition, that we cannot submit to these edicts without a sacrifice of our rights, honor, and independence. And are these to be sacrificed without first struggling to maintain them? I trust not.

Mr. SMITH said, if there were no other reason, the present suspension of commerce, and discontents at home, were sufficient reasons for calling Congress earlier than the first Monday in December. When the new Administration should come into office, it was proper that they should have an opportunity of meeting Congress as early as possible. It was his opinion that, at the next session, a change of measures would take place. What would be the substitute for the present measure he could not say; but, at this time, he must say that he could see no way of avoiding war. With regard to extra missions, he really had no idea of a measure of that kind. If there should be any other means to secure the interest and honor of the nation but war, he hoped in God that it would be adopted, but he did not now see any such prospect.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, said it was of no importance in the consideration of the present question what the next Administration should think or do. He wished that there could be an understanding with foreign nations for our good, but he much doubted such a result. He would not undertake to say whether war, or what other measure, ought to be adopted at the extra session; but, it was his opinion, that Congress ought to meet, and he should vote against every proposition going to defeat the object of the bill. Although this nation had not immediately retaliated the attack on the Chesapeake, would any man rise on this floor and say that the act of dishonor was done away because the House refused immediately to avenge it? He believed not; and, as long as it remained unatoned, it was cause for this nation to act. The only question for the House now to determine was this: Are there reasons to induce gentlemen to believe that a meeting of Congress is necessary on the fourth Monday of May next? As it appeared to him that such reasons did exist, he said he was bound on his responsibility to vote for the bill.

Mr. DURELL asked if gentlemen meant to continue the embargo forever? He believed somewhat in the doctrine that an explosion might take place under it in a certain portion of the country. Gentlemen said an extra session was, therefore, necessary to save the nation. Mr. D. asked, if the nation was to be saved by long speeches? He had seen almost two whole sessions of Congress pass away, the one of six months, the other of three, and the nation in the same situation still, and still told, in long stories, from day to day, that it was in a critical situation. He had no idea that the nation was to be saved by much speaking. He did firmly believe, that more than forty-eight hours would not be necessary to pass all laws to meet the impending crisis. If a declaration of war was thought proper, this would be sufficient time for it; if an extraordinary mission, as suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina, forty-eight hours would be time enough for the House to decide on recommending it. The present was a state of suspense, from which the nation ought to be removed, and he was unwilling to prolong this state by the passage of the bill.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said that the observations of gentlemen themselves were the landmarks by which he would steer. Gentlemen had said that they would wait under all these accumulated injuries, the weight of which Mr. W. acknowledged, till the fourth Monday in May. Now, he said, he wished to wait a little longer, that the Executive might, if he chose, take advantage of the interval. He said he had alluded to the case of the Chesapeake as an eminent illustration of the desire of the Executive for peace; though he should not trespass upon truth if he said that the affair of the Chesapeake rested not now as it had done. Admitting that we had ample cause for war, what did gentlemen propose to gain by postponing it? The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Jackson,) had said that the nation was pushing them to war. Mr. W. asked if there was a petition on the table to that purport from any portion of the United States? No, really; whilst a large portion of the people, the South almost unanimously, had expressed a wish that the Government should adhere to the embargo, till it produced an effect, or its capacity to produce the effect was disproved. You are like to be driven out of the embargo by war? asked Mr. W.; why, sir, look at the sensation in New England and New York, and talk about going to war, when you cannot maintain an embargo! There is a large portion of the people of New England, who, through misrepresentations and the efforts of your enemies have been taught to believe that your Administration has not sought for peace. Could any man have the hardihood to say so, after another special mission had failed? Certainly not; and it is no treason to mention it, although gentlemen should not like it. If you do not adopt war before the fourth Monday in May, will the nation be ruined if you postpone it still further? How could gentlemen denounce the course which he recommended, when it was now pursued? For a vessel was now advertised, he observed, to go on public business to Great Britain and France, and new despatches were going, he supposed. Even if war was determined on, would there be anything inconsistent, anything degrading, in giving to foreign nations yet another chance to do us justice? Mr. W. said he would do everything he could, in an honorable manner, to prevent war. He believed that the men who wished to prevent war were quite as patriotic as those who appeared desirous of promoting it. He felt more satisfaction in seeing the poor emigrant or exile from the troubles of Europe sitting peaceably and in comfort at his fireside or cabin door, than in hearing of the most splendid victories. When the last step to preserve peace had failed, then would he be willing to rouse the people to mount the Capitol and sound the tocsin—but not till then. He was for giving a fair opportunity to hear from Europe; for if Congress met in May, there would yet be a foreign messenger abroad; and waiting his arrival, they would do nothing.

Mr. BURWELL said he was one of those who would vote for an earlier meeting of Congress than usual. In Great Britain, in whose government there were some features approximating to ours, there was always an uneasiness, lest the Parliament should not meet often enough. Whence could be the objection to Congress meeting at an earlier day? If the public sentiment was not then prepared for war, it would not be adopted. It appeared to him that an early session, instead of producing mischief, would essentially contribute to tranquillize the minds of the people. If peace was attainable, we must have peace; but if not, we have no choice but war. The gentleman from South Carolina suggests the propriety of sending a special mission said Mr. B. Let me ask him, if Administration should not take this course, whether it would not be perfectly proper that Congress should be in session? Certainly it would. With respect to a special mission, Mr. B. said he was perfectly at a loss to conceive what could be the nature of any proposition which could be made to Great Britain. A proposition had already been made to her, in effect, to go to war with her against France, and insultingly refused; for no other interpretation could be made of the offer to suspend the embargo, if she would rescind her Orders in Council, except Mr. Canning chose to misunderstand everything that could be said. Unless gentlemen would point out some new proposition, which could be made to Great Britain or France, he could not see the propriety of the course recommended. As to the continuance of the embargo, Mr. B. said it seemed to be perfectly well understood by every man, that when the Government determined on that course, it did not determine to persevere in it eternally. If it could be made manifest to him that any particular favorable consequence would be produced by postponing the session beyond the fourth Monday in May, he might be induced to accede to it. As to the disposition of the Administration to preserve peace, could the gentleman conceive it possible to remove the impressions of those who were determined not to be convinced? This nation had sued for peace, but in vain; they had offered to give up almost everything in contest, if Great Britain would yield a thing which neither Mr. Canning nor any other member of the British Government ever said they had a right to do, and which was only justified on the ground of necessity. There was therefore no plausibility in the assertion that peace had not been earnestly sought for.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said that if nothing occurred between this time and the time proposed, by the bill for the next meeting of Congress, which would particularly render a change necessary, he was yet of opinion that it would be then necessary to change our situation; for this reason: that at that period, time sufficient would have elapsed to give us information as to what ground Great Britain would take, after she had heard of the position which Congress had maintained. After that ground was taken, Congress would know how to act. I never voted for the embargo as a permanent measure, said Mr. C., nor did I ever use an expression which would authorize such a supposition; nor do I suppose that any other gentleman entertained such an idea. As to a special mission, I should as soon think of sending a special messenger to the moon as to Great Britain or to France, for the cup of humiliation is exhausted already, and I will never put it in their power to offer us another cup.

The gentleman from South Carolina asked why our Ministers still continued at those Courts. Though I have no objection that the gentleman should animadvert on this topic, it is not a question for our determination; but I think it proper that as long as we can maintain our situation, intercourse may remain open. At the moment when we determine on war only ought we to recall our Ministers. We are told, sir, that we cannot carry the people with us into war; that we must do something to excite them. This looks something like the doctrine of European countries. I believe that the people have trodden the same course that we have in everything which has taken place, and are as capable of determining on the propriety of the course which we pursue as we are ourselves. I believe that no impulse is necessary to be given to the people. If we act correctly, there is no doubt that the people will support our conduct. With respect to the affair of the Chesapeake, which has been alluded to, it was not, in my mind a proper occasion for war. If it was so, I cannot really comprehend why we are told that it is necessary to do something to excite the people to go to war. If we were to send a Minister, what could he do but repeat the same course? There seems to be an idea entertained by some gentlemen, sir, which I wish to disavow. The change of President about to take place, appears to be considered as the commencement of a new dynasty. The change of that officer cannot affect our general relations, for it is the people and not the President who are to point out the proper course to be pursued.

Mr. MACON said he had not intended to have said anything, but that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BURWELL) had broached a doctrine which he did not approve—that this Government was like that of Great Britain.

Mr. BURWELL explained that he had said that the Governments were, in some of their features, alike.

Mr. MACON said that the reason of the fear in Great Britain that the Parliament would not meet often enough, was extremely obvious. The only voice which the people had was in the House of Commons, and they wanted them to be always in session, to keep the King and nobility off from them. In Great Britain the King dissolved Parliament at his pleasure. Here, he said, there was no power to dissolve Congress. Indeed, there was no similarity in the two Governments. He said he had no fear of any mischief being done by Congress meeting earlier; but he was opposed to their meeting earlier, because they would do more good by staying away. Could any man say what would take place between this day and the third of March? And yet the House were now called on to determine on an extra session. He was for giving such time, after the deliberations of the present session closed, as that Great Britain might see what we had done, and consider whether she would retract or go to war, for if she did not retract, war must be the consequence. Mr. M. said he would give every opportunity for peace; he would not be for hurrying the matter. He had no opinion that Congress being in session would have any effect on the people. The cry of an intention to destroy commerce was not to make him do a single thing which he would not otherwise do. No man can believe that we who raise produce should wish it to lie on our hands, as is now our situation. It is maritime rights for which we contend. For these we planters are making sacrifices, and we know it. As to the grower it is immaterial in point of interest into what ship or wagon his produce goes; but he is contending for the interests of his mercantile brethren. A great deal has been said about repealing the embargo to put an end to discontents. Let gentlemen beware of it, lest in trying to please everybody, they please nobody. Let us do what is right, that is the only ground for us to take. Whenever we begin to temporize, that principle is abandoned. I disagree with the gentleman from Tennessee as to the expediency of continuing the embargo; I do not believe that it would be inexpedient to try it beyond May. I believe we ought to try it beyond September. This is my opinion. What effect do gentlemen expect that the embargo will have had in May? Not more than at this moment. While every day from that time till September, it will be more and more effectual. I never voted for it as a permanent measure; but my opinion was, as I stated it, that it might be necessary to hold on to it for one, two, or three years. I might be wrong, but this was my opinion then, and I have not changed it. As to an extra session, I have never thought of it; but I am willing to leave it to the Executive. It has been so suddenly suggested, however, that I would not undertake to decide positively on the subject. I should rather incline to let them send to us now; we have sent to them long enough. As to the people being tired of the embargo, whenever they want war in preference to it, they will send their petitions here to that effect. When gentlemen from the Eastern States say, that the people there are tired of it, perhaps they speak correctly. As to all the talk of insurrections and divisions, it has no effect on me. When the sedition law was passed under the former Administration, it was said that the people would not bear it. I thought then as now, that the elections would show their disapprobation, and that they would manifest it in that way alone. When the people are tired of the embargo, as a means of preserving peace, they will tell you so, and say, "Give us war!" But none have said so; and yet, sir, I know well that myself and some others are blamed for our adherence to this measure. I can only say, that it is an honest adherence. I do believe that the continuance of that measure, with the addition of a bill now on your table, (non-intercourse bill,) is the best thing you can do; and if I thought that Congress would declare war in May, I should be much more averse to meeting then than I am now; but I do not believe it will. Put the question to every man in the nation, War or embargo? The certainty of that alternative would make them more favorable to the embargo than they are now. I should not be surprised that the opposition to the embargo would themselves wish it to be continued a little while longer. I agree with gentlemen that the people will point out what should be done. Do not declare war before you adjourn, and I have no fear of your doing it when you meet again. Let each man put the question to his neighbor, whether he will have war or embargo, and there is no doubt but he will answer in favor of the latter. I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee, that the new Administration should not be considered as a new dynasty. But when new politics come into office, it is something like it; and we have seen it in our days. But, believe me, sir, in my opinion, there is no danger of insurrection in any part of this happy country.

Mr. SLOAN was against the passage of the bill, because it would keep the people in suspense—a state which he himself did not like. He had expected that when we met here, the embargo would have been repealed. He wanted to know whether the embargo was to remain until September? He would not, however gloomy the prospect, forego the hope that Congress would relieve the people from the burden which they could not bear. Any man might see what would be the effect of this law. Congress would meet in May, and would continue the measure a little, and a little longer, and eventually rise without removing it. He wished once again to restore the smiles of content to this once happy land, and to do it without an extra session.

H. OF R.

Mr. QUINCY.—Mr. Speaker, if the bill under consideration had no other aspect on the fates of this country than its terms indicate, I should have continued silent. If the question upon it involved no other consequences than those of personal inconvenience to us and of expense to the public, I would not now ask the indulgence of the House. But I deem this bill to be a materially component part of that system of commercial restriction under which the best hopes of this nation are oppressed. I consider this measure as intended to induce this people still longer to endure patiently the embargo, and all the evils which it brings in its train, by exciting and fostering in them delusive expectations. A great crisis is, to all human appearance, advancing upon our country. Gentlemen may attempt to conceal it from the nation, perhaps from themselves, but every step they take has an influence upon that crisis; and, small as they may deem the decision on this bill, in its effects it will be among the most important of any of the acts of this session.

It is very painful to me, Mr. Speaker, to be compelled to place my opposition to this bill on ground resulting from the conduct of the Administration of this nation. I say, sir, this is very painful to me, because I have no personal animosity to any individual of that Administration. Nor, if I know myself, am I induced to this opposition from any party motive. But, sir, acting in a public capacity, and reasoning concerning events as they occur, with reference to the high duties of my station, I shall not, when I arrive, in my conception, at a just conclusion, shrink from any proper responsibility, in spreading that conclusion before this House and nation. One thing I shall hope, and certainly shall deserve from the friends of the Administration—the acknowledgment that I shall aim no insidious blow. It shall be made openly, distinctly, in the daylight. Be it strong, or be it weak, I invite those friends to parry it. If they are successful, I shall rejoice in it not less than they.

This is the position in relation to the conduct of Administration which I take, and on which I rest my opposition to this bill: That this House when it passed the embargo law was under a deception touching the motives of Administration, in recommending that measure—that it has been, in adopting that measure, instrumental in deceiving this people as to the motives which induced that law; that if it passes this bill, it will again act under a deception touching those motives, and again be instrumental, unwarily and unwillingly, as I believe, in deceiving this people, in relation to them. I think I have stated my ground of opposition so clearly as to admit of no misconception. And I invite gentlemen to meet me candidly on it. When I speak of deception, I beg gentlemen not to misunderstand me. I will be as just to Administration as I mean to be true and fearless in the performance of my duty to this people. By this term I do not mean any moral obliquity, any direct falsehood or palpable misrepresentation. But I intend by it political deception. That species of cunning, not uncommon among politicians, which Lord Bacon calls "left-handed wisdom." This is exhibited, when ostensible and popular motives are presented as inducements to a particular line of conduct, and the real and critical ones are kept behind the curtain. This is practised when those who have obtained an influence over others, troll them by the means of fair promises upon a dowsy path, and so are enabled gradually to shove them, by gentle motions, farther than at first they had any intention to go. We witness this species of political deception, when we see men meshed in the toils of a complicated policy, and then dragged whithersoever their leaders will, through sheer shame, at breaking the cords of that net in which they have suffered themselves incautiously to be entangled.

In support of my first position—that this House, when it passed the embargo law was under a deception, touching the motives of Administration, I shall ask the House to recollect as far as possible all the motives which induced it to pass the embargo law, and then I will attempt to show that the motives of Administration were different, in kind or in degree, from those which operated on this floor. I will recapitulate them as distinctly as possible, excluding no one which I have any reason to think had an influence in the House, imputing none which did not exist. One motive was the preservation of our resources—that is, the saving of our seamen and navigation. This was the ostensible and popular motive—that avowed by Administration. Another motive was, that many thought war was inevitable, and that embargo would give an opportunity to prepare for it. Again. Some thought that it would have a good effect on the negotiation then daily expected, and frighten Mr. Rose. Again. Others supposed that it would straiten Great Britain at a moment the most favorable to make her feel the importance of the United States. The system of commercial pressure was in full operation in Europe, and should this country complete the circle of compression, they thought that it would be impossible for her not to yield to our pretensions. Again. Some thought that the French Emperor was contending for maritime rights, and that it was time for us to co-operate. [Here Messrs. SMITH and EPPES required of Mr. QUINCY to know to whom he had allusion.] I am surprised, said Mr. Q. to hear that question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. If, however, it be denied as a motive, I have no objection to withdraw it. What I am now doing ought to excite no passion. I am not about to question the motives of this House. I am only recapitulating all those which there is every reason to believe existed. If any gentlemen say a particular one did not exist, for the present argument I reject it. My present object only is to be complete in my enumeration, in order to make more forcible the bearing of my principal argument, that it does not include those which principally had an influence with Administration in recommending the measure. I do not recollect but two other motives besides those already mentioned.

H. OF R.

Extra Session.

JANUARY, 1800.

Some voted for this embargo, because they thought this House ought to do something, and they did not know what else to do. Others intimated that it might have an effect to injure France in the few West India possessions which remained to her. But this was urged so faintly, and with such little show of reason, that I doubt if it were an influential motive with any man. The preceding enumeration includes all the motives, as I believe, either urged on this floor or in any way, silently, operative in producing that measure. Now I do not think I state my position too strongly when I say that not a man in this House deemed the embargo intended chiefly as a measure of coercion on Great Britain; that it was to be made permanent at all hazards, until it had effected that object; and that nothing else effectual was to be done for the support of our maritime rights. If any individual was influenced by such motives, certainly they were not those of a majority of this House. Now, sir, on my conscience, I do believe that these were the motives and intentions of Administration when they recommended the embargo to the adoption of this House. Sir, I believe these continue to be still their motives and intentions. And if this were fairly understood by the people to be the fact, I do not believe that they would countenance the continuance of such an oppressive measure, for such a purpose, without better assurance than has ever yet been given to them, that, by adherence to this policy, the great and real object of it will be effected.

The proposition which I undertake to maintain consists of three particulars. First. That it was, and is, the intention of Administration to coerce Great Britain by the embargo, and that this, and not precaution, is, and was, the principal object of the policy. Second. That it was, and is intended to persevere in this measure until it effect, if possible, the proposed object. Third. That it was and is the intention of Administration to do nothing else effectual in support of our maritime rights.

Having in my mind a perfect conviction of the truth of every one of these propositions, I should be false to myself and to my country, at such a crisis as this, if I did not state that conviction to this House, and through it to my fellow-citizens. I shall not, however, take refuge in mere declaration of individual opinion, or content myself simply with assertions. I shall state the grounds and the reasonings, by which I arrive at this result. I invite gentlemen to reply to them, in the spirit in which they are offered. Not with the design of awakening any personal or party passion, but to fulfil the high duties, which, according to my apprehension of them, I owe to this people.

When we attempt to penetrate into the intentions of men, we are all sensible how thick and mysterious is that veil, which, by the law of our nature, is spread over them. At times it is scarcely permitted to an individual to be absolutely certain of his own motives. But when the question is concerning the purposes of others, experience daily tells how hard a task it is to descend into the hidden recesses of the mind, and pluck intentions from that granite cell, in which they delight to incrust themselves.

The only mode of discovery is to consider language and conduct, in their relation to the real and avowed object, and thence to conclude, as fairly as we can, which is the one, and which the other. This course I shall adopt. If there be anything fallacious, let the friends of Administration oppose it.

When I state that precaution was not, but that coercion on Great Britain was the principal motive with Administration in advising the embargo, I do not mean to aver that precaution did not enter into the view, but only that it was a minor consideration, and did by no means bear so great a proportion in producing that policy, in the Cabinet, as it did before the world. This will appear presently. That the principal object of the embargo policy was coercion on Great Britain, I conclude from the language of the friends of Administration, in this country, and the language which the Minister of Administration was directed to hold across the Atlantic, as also from their subsequent conduct. Here all the leading calculations had relation to coercion.

The dependence of Great Britain upon her manufactures, and their dependence upon us for supply and consumption—the greatness of her debt—her solitary state, engaged with a world in arms—the fortunes and the power of the French Emperor—the certain effect of the commercial prohibitions of combined Europe upon her maritime power; such were the uniform considerations in support of this policy, adduced by the friends of Administration on this floor, or in this nation.

There, on the contrary, the considerations urged as the motive for it were altogether different. Let us recur to the language which our Minister was directed to hold to the Court of Great Britain, on this subject. The Secretary of State, in his letter of the 23d of December, 1807, to Mr. Pinkney, thus dictates to him the course he is to pursue in impressing on the British Cabinet the objects of the embargo:

“I avail myself of the opportunity, to enclose you a copy of a Message from the President to Congress, and their act in pursuance of it, laying an embargo on our vessels and exports. The policy and causes of the measure are explained in the Message itself. But it may be proper to authorize you to assure the British Government, as has been just expressed to its Minister here, that the act is a measure of precaution only, called for by the occasion; that it is to be considered as neither hostile in its character, nor as justifying, or inviting or leading to hostility, with any nation whatever, and particularly as opposing no obstacle whatever to amicable negotiations and satisfactory adjustments with Great Britain, on the subjects of difference between the two countries.”

Here our Administration expressly declare that “the policy and causes of the measure are explained in the Message itself.” And in that Message the “dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, are threatened,” and “the great importance of keeping in safety these essential resources," are the sole causes enumerated as explanatory of that policy.

At the Court of Great Britain, then our Minister was directed to represent this measure as merely intended to save our essential resources. But the Administration were not content with the direct assertion of this motive; they abjure any other. They expressly direct our Minister "to assure the British Government that the act is a measure of precaution only," and "that it opposes no obstacle whatever, to amicable negotiations between the two countries." Here then the friends of Administration, speaking, as is well known, its language, allege, in this country, that the embargo is a measure of coercion, and that if persisted in vigorously, it will reduce Great Britain to our terms. Whereas the Minister of the United States, speaking also the language of Administration, is directed, unequivocally, to deny all this in Great Britain and to exclude the idea of coercion, by declaring it to be a measure of precaution only. Certainly never was there a policy more perfectly characteristic. It is precisely that policy which one deeply skilled in the knowledge of the human character, described as "a language official and a language confidential." A language for the ear of the American people. An opposite for the ear of the British Cabinet. If this had been, as the Minister of the United States was directed to assure the British Cabinet, "a measure of precaution only," why were the friends of Administration permitted to advocate it as a measure of coercion? Why is it continued after all pretence of precaution has ceased? Did not Administration know that if it were supported here, on the ground of coercion, that this fact would necessarily be understood in Great Britain, and that it must form "an obstacle to negotiation," notwithstanding all their declarations? If therefore it had been truly "a measure of precaution only," would not Administration have been the first to have counteracted such an opinion, and not permitted it to have gained any ground here or elsewhere? Yet they countenance this opinion in America, at the moment they are denying it in Great Britain. And why? The reason is obvious, and is conclusive in support of the position, that it was at first, as it is now, simply a measure of coercion. The mode adopted by Administration is the only one they could adopt, with any hope of success, in case the object was coercion, and the very mode they would avoid, had it been really precaution. There is not an individual in the United States, so much of a child, as not to know that the argument of precaution was good only for ninety, or at farthest an hundred and twenty days. After our ships and seamen were in port, which within that time would have been principally the case, the reason of precaution was at an end—upon the principle that the self-interest and intelligence of the merchant and navigator, are the best guides and patrons of their own concerns; and that the stake which society has in the property of the citizen, is better secured by his own knowledge and activity than by any general regulations whatsoever. It was necessary, therefore, in the United States, to resort early to the idea of coercion, and to press it vigorously; otherwise, the people of America could not be induced to endurance beyond the time when the reason of precaution had ceased. In America, therefore, it was coercion; but in Great Britain the state of things was altogether the reverse. Administration knew perfectly well, not only from the character of the British nation, but, also, from the most common principles of human nature, that once present this embargo to it as a measure of coercion, to compel it to adopt or retract any principle of adopted policy; and there was an end of negotiation. It would have been like laying a drawn sword upon the table, and declaring, "yield us what we demand, or we will push it to the hilt in your vitals." In such case, it was perfectly apparent that there could be received, from an independent nation, but one answer: "Take away your sword; withdraw your menace; while these continue, we listen to nothing!" Aware of this inevitable consequence, Administration not only aver that it is precaution, but, even condescend to deny it is anything else, by declaring that it is this, and this only. Thus, in Great Britain, precaution was the veil under which a sword was passed into her side. But, in the United States, coercion was the palatable liquor with which Administration softened and gargled the passage, while it thrust, at the point of the bayonet, the bitter pill of embargo down the throats of the American people. It is this variation of the avowed motive, to suit the unquestionable diversity of the state of things in this country and Great Britain, combined with the fact that the embargo is continued long after the plea of precaution has ceased to be effectual, that produces a perfect conviction in my mind that precaution was little more than the pretext, and that coercion was, in fact, the principal purpose of the policy. Indeed, how is it possible to conclude otherwise, when the very mode of argument adopted in each country was the only one that could have made coercion successful, and the very one which would have been avoided, if precaution had been the real and only motive? I cheerfully submit the correctness of this conclusion to the consideration of the people.

I come, now, to my second proposition. That it was the intention of Administration to persevere in this measure of embargo, until it should effect, if possible, the proposed object, and, as I believe, at all hazard. The evidence of this intention, I gather not only from the subsequent perseverance in this system—in spite of the cries of distress heard in one quarter of the Union, and the dangers, not to be concealed, resulting from an adherence to it—but, from the very tenor of the law; from its original form and feature. If this had been, as it was asserted by Administration, originally a measure of precaution only, there was every reason why it should be limited, and none why its duration should be unlimited. A limited embargo was conformable to precedent, in this country. It was conformable to practice, in others. There was less question of its Constitutionality; and, certainly, much less reason to be jealous of it as a transfer of power to the Executive. The question of precaution having reference to the interests of the merchant, and of the other classes of the community, was, naturally, one which the members of this House, emanating directly from the people, were best qualified to decide, and was the last which they ought, or would, in such case, have submitted to the entire control of another branch of the Legislature. But as, notwithstanding assertions, it was, in fact, a measure of coercion, a very different principle operated in its formation. It was to be used as a weapon against Great Britain. If drawn against her, it was necessary to be put into such a situation as most certainly to effect its purpose. If drawn it was not to be sheathed, until this had been done, or, until it had reached the marrow and vitals of the enemy. But, with such a purpose, a limited embargo would have been a nerveless weapon. At every term of its limitation, it would have been under the control of this House; a body deeply responsible to the people, liable intimately to be affected by their feelings and passions. These would have immediately operated upon this House, which never could have been brought to continue the measure one moment longer than it was for the interest, and consentaneous to the wishes of the mass of their fellow-citizens. But, if the intention was to keep, if possible, these restrictions upon the people until they effected their object, at all hazards, then no other course could be adopted but that of an unlimited embargo. The whole commercial power given to us by the Constitution was thus transferred, absolutely, to the President and twelve men in the other branch of the Legislature—men, from their situation and their tenure of office, not so likely to be affected by the interests of the people, or so able to sympathize with them as the members of this House. If it were intended, then, to keep this instrument of coercion aloof from the influence of the people, so that it might be maintained long after they had ceased to approve it, this was the only course which could be adopted. This House could not be trusted with the power of re-enacting it. The weapon would be shortened and weakened, if it remained in our control. But, in the exclusive possession of the President and twelve men, its whole force might be wielded with the greatest possible efficacy. It is from this feature of the embargo law, reconcilable to no other intention than to persevere in it, aloof from the people's sufferings, until it had effected, if possible, its object, as well as from the actual obstinacy of adherence, after the most manifest symptoms of discontent in the commercial States, that I draw the conclusion that such was the original determination of Administration. And not only so, but I am perfectly of opinion that such is still their intention, and that, if the people will bear it, this embargo will be continued, not only until next May, but until next September. Yes, sir, to next May twelve months. Having this conviction, a sense of duty obliges me to declare it and thus to state the reasons of it.

I come now to my third position. Not only that embargo was resorted to as a means of coercion, but that, from the first, it was never intended by Administration to do anything else effectual, for the support of our maritime rights. Sir I am sick, sick to loathing, of this eternal clamor of "war, war, war," which has been kept up, almost incessantly on this floor, now for more than two years. Sir, if I can help it, the old women of this country shall not be frightened in this way any longer. I have been, a long time, a close observer of what has been done and said by the majority of this House, and for one, I am satisfied that no insult, however gross, offered to us by either France or Great Britain, could force this majority into the declaration of war. To use a strong, but common expression, it could not be kicked into such a declaration by either nation. Letters are read from the British Minister. Passions are excited by his sarcasms. Men get up and recapitulate insults. They rise and exclaim, "perfidy," "robbery," "falsehood," "murder."

"Unpacking hearts with words,
And fall a cursing, like a very drab, a scullion!"

Sir, is this the way to maintain national honor or dignity? Is it the way to respect abroad or at home? Is the perpetual recapitulation of wrongs the ready path to redress, or even the means to keep alive a just sense of them in our minds? Are those sensibilities likely to remain for a long time very keen, which are kept constantly under the lash of the tongue?

The grounds on which I conclude that it was the intention of Administration to do nothing else effectual in support of our maritime rights, are these: that, if it had ever been contemplated to fight for them, less would have been said about war, and more preparation made for it. The observation is common, and just as true of collective bodies of men as of individuals, that those fight the best who make the least noise upon the subject. The man of determined character shows his strength in his muscles, in the attitude he assumes, in the dignified position in which he places himself. Just so is it with men determined to maintain the rights and honor of the nation. They consider the nature of the exigency, the power of the nation with which they are likely to involve their country—what preparations are necessary to its ultimate success. They do not content themselves with evaporating words of passion. They look to the end, and devise and put in train such means as are suited to a safe and honorable issue. This conduct speaks more terribly than any words to the fears of foreign nations. And as to our citizens, they find in it an assurance which can be given them by no enumeration of wrongs, however accurate or eloquent. But it is not merely by what has been said, but by what has been done, that my mind is satisfied that Administration never seriously contemplated a war with any nation under heaven. That all this clamor so ostentatiously raised, and all this detail of the horrors of war, are nothing else than the machinery by which it is intended to keep this people quiet, through apprehension of a worse state, under their most oppressive evil, the embargo. We have been told, from Divine authority, "by their deeds, ye shall know them." The rule is just as true in relation to professors in politics, as to professors in religion. I ask, sir, what has this majority done during the two years past, in every moment of which the people have been kept under almost a daily anticipation of war, towards an effectual maintenance of their rights? Why; we have built 170 gunboats. We have in requisition one hundred thousand militia. Are either of these intended to fight Great Britain, or competent to maintain our maritime rights? But, we have an army of five thousand men. And how have you appointed officers to that army? Have you done it in a manner to create that sentiment of unanimity so necessary to be inspired, if your intention be to fight, seriously, a foreign enemy? In the last session, when the proposal to raise that army was before the House, no cry was so universal as that of union. Well, sir; and how did those gentlemen, whose sentiments usually coincide with mine, act upon that occasion? Did we make a party question of it? No. It was supported, very generally, by us. Now, upon what principle have you conducted in your appointment of officers to that army? As though you wished to unite every heart and hand in the nation in opposition to a foreign enemy? No. But as though you had no other project than to reward political adherents, or to enforce the embargo laws. I mean not, unjustly, to charge any member of the Administration; but, I am obliged to state that I have satisfactory evidence to my mind, that it has been established as a principle by the Secretary at War, not to appoint any man to a command in that army who was not an open partisan of the existing Administration. If I am in an error, appoint a committee of inquiry, and I will be the happiest, if it be proved, to acknowledge it. [Mr. LOVE asked if Mr. QUINCY was in order? Mr. SPEAKER conceived he was not.] Mr. Q. continued: I am performing what I deem a great duty, and, if the connexion between this topic and the subject before the House be denied, I am prepared to establish it. I am contending that if the purpose, for which this army was raised, were to meet a foreign enemy, this principle would never have been adopted in the appointment of officers. I do not believe the fact I state will be denied; but, if it should be, it is easily to be ascertained by comparing the applications for appointments to those offices, with the list of those appointments. Now, sir, if the intention were to unite the nation, as one man, against a foreign enemy, is not this the last policy which any Administration ought ever to have adopted? Of all engines, is not a party army the most dreadful and detestable? Is it not the most likely to awaken suspicion, and to sow discontent rather than concord? This is one reason on which I rest my opinion that it was not the intention to go to war, or they would have adopted a principle more harmonizing in relation to the organization of that army.

Again, sir, you talk of going to war against Great Britain, with, I believe, only one frigate, and five sloops of war, in commission! And yet you have not the resolution to meet the expense of the paltry, little navy, which is rotting in the Potomac. Already we have heard it rung on this floor, that if we fit out that little navy our Treasury will be emptied. If you had ever a serious intention of going to war, would you have frittered down the resources of this nation; in the manner we witness? You go to war, with all the revenue to be derived from commerce annihilated; and possessing no other resource than loans or direct or other internal taxes? You! a party that rose into power by declaiming against direct taxes and loans? Do you hope to make the people of this country, much more foreign nations, believe that such is your intention when you have reduced your revenue to such a condition? [Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL asked the gentleman, if he could tell how much money there was now in the Treasury. Mr. QUINCY continued.] My memory has not, at present at command the precise sum, but perhaps twelve or thirteen millions of dollars charged with the expenses and appropriations for the year. But what is this? Make any material preparation for such a war, as you must wage, if you engage with either of the European Powers, and your whole Treasury is exhausted. I am not now examining the present state of our finances. But I would address myself to men of sense, and ask them to examine the adequacy of our revenues, in their future product, to the inevitable exigencies of war. Sir, you have no other resources, commerce being gone, than loans or internal taxes. Great Britain and France know this fact as well as you. Nothing can be conducted in such a country as ours, without public notoriety. The general resources of our country are as well known in Europe as they are here. But we are about to raise an army of fifty thousand volunteers. For what purpose? I have heard gentlemen say "we can invade Canada." But, sir, does not all the world, as well as you, know that Great Britain holds, as it were, a pledge for Canada? And one sufficient to induce you to refrain from such a project, when you begin seriously to weigh all the consequences of such invasion? I mean that pledge which results from the defenceless state of your seaport towns. For what purpose would you attack Canada? For territory? No. You have enough of that. Do you want citizen refugees? No. You would be willing to dispense with them. Do you want plunder? This is the only hope an invasion of Canada can offer you. And is it not very doubtful whether she could not, in one month, destroy more property on your seaboard, than you can acquire by the most successful invasion of that Province? Sir, in this state of things, I cannot bear such perpetual outcries about war, without declaring my opinion concerning them.

When I say, sir, that this Administration could not be induced into a war, I mean by its own self-motion. War may—I will not assert that it will not come. But such a state, Administration do not contemplate, nor are they prepared for it. On the contrary, I do believe that the very tendency of all imbecile measures is to bring on the very event their advisers deprecate. Well did the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. TROUP) warn you the other day, not to get into war. He told you it was the design of the Federalists to lead you into that state, in order that they might get your places. Now I agree with the gentleman, that if, by your measures, you get this country into a war, that you will lose your places. But I do not agree that in such case the Federalists would get them. No, sir. The course of affairs, in popular revolutions, proceeds not from bad to better, but from bad to worse. After Condorcet and Brissot, came Danton and Robespierre. Well may gentlemen dread, on account of their places, being involved in war. For let the people once begin to look on the state of the country, with that anxiety which the actual perception of present danger never fails to awaken; let them realize the exigencies, which that state involves, and compare with them your preparations for it; let them see an army, in which perhaps a full half of your citizens cannot confide; a small navy, rendered less by natural decay, and even the few ships we have, not in a state to give battle; our Treasury exhausted, as it will soon be, and all the ordinary sources of commercial supply dried away; and they will hurl you from your seats, with as little remorse, with as much indifference, as a mischievous boy would slight so many blind and trembling kittens, six to a litter, into a horse-pond. Yes, sir, be assured that war is the termination of your political power, unless you have prescience to prepare an effectual force, worthy of this nation, worthy of either adversary you may elect to engage. But, remember, you must rely upon something else than the paltry surplusses of your Treasury, which, in fact, in one year will not exist; upon something else than loans or direct taxes.

H. OF R.

JANUARY, 1809.

This bill, I consider as a continuation of the same deception as to the motive, as that which operated in the passage of the original embargo law. If we pass it, I fear we shall again be instrumental in deceiving this people. The effect of this bill, whatever may be its avowed design, is calculated to soothe the people, impatient under the embargo, until the spring elections are passed, and until the first session of the State Legislatures are finished. By a new session of the next Congress, in May, the people are to be led to hope that next May will bring them relief. But let the embargo be kept on until May, and as the honorable gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MACON) told you, very ingenuously, it will then be found necessary to keep it on until September; and perhaps for another year. This is the keystone of the whole policy of this bill, as I apprehend. If it be your real intention to remove this embargo after May, why do you not adopt a provision similar to that proposed the other day, by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. STURGES) and annex it to this bill? Why not limit the continuance of the embargo law, until next June? And thereby leave the new Congress free, relative to this measure, from the power of the Executive. Give the people a pledge that the embargo shall be removed at a limited time. At least, put it into the power of your successors, by refusing to re-enact the law, to control the Executive's will. This pledge the people have a right to claim, if it be your real purpose to abandon the measure after May. If, however, this be not your policy, avow your intentions. Tell the people at once, that it is a power of coercion, in which you mean to persevere, until it has effected its object. Show them the reasons on which you rely that it will be successful. Perhaps they will consent to endure it. But with the present state of things they cannot, they ought not to be satisfied. At least get back, by limiting the present law, your commercial power, which you have absolutely surrendered to the President and twelve men. Permit your successors to be as independent of the Executive, in continuing this system, as you were when you consented to adopt it.

The only consistent advocates of the embargo system are such gentlemen as those from North and South Carolina, (Messrs. MACON and D. R. WILLIAMS;) and they are opposed to this bill. They tell you that this is an effectual weapon against Great Britain, and believing this, as they do, they say truly that a session in May will evidence timidity, and defeat the effect of the weapon. You ought to take one or the other ground decidedly. Either you still confide in its efficacy, or you begin to doubt of it. If the former, show your confidence to be rational, and leave the weapon to have its full operation, not unnerved by the hope of a May session. If the latter, either repeal it instantly, or give the people an assurance that it will be done in May. The course you are pursuing has no other tendency than to excite suspicions, to agitate and embarrass.

I ask gentlemen to consider what will be their situation in May. Will you be in a better condition to go to war then, than you are now? No. You will be in a worse. You will be more embarrassed—you will have less revenue. You will have more discontent. Your efficient force will not be materially greater. Will you have more encouragement then to strike at the Canadas than exists at present; and what other point of attack have you on Great Britain? Will you be a whit more inclined in May or June to remove the embargo than you are at this moment? No. It will be stepping back then just as it is now. That dreadful thought will be, I fear, sufficient to induce then as now adherence to the measure six months longer. And, after abundance of war speeches, Congress will rise and leave that measure bending down the people until next December.

Sir, these are the general reasons which I have to urge against the adoption of this bill. In what I have said my only view has been to exhibit to this House and nation the real motives which, as I apprehend, caused the original imposition of the embargo, and which still operate in support of this bill. I do not believe that it is the intention of a majority of this House, at present, to continue this system after May. But I do believe that it is the intention of Administration. My design has been to recall the recollection of gentlemen to the difference between the arguments now urged for its continuance; and the official reasons at first given for its adoption. And I would warn them that if they mean to gain credit with the people for the intention of repealing the embargo in May, they will not obtain it, if they leave the next Congress at the mercy of the Executive, by rising without affixing some limitation to it.

JANUARY, 1809.

Extra Session.

H. OF R.

Mr. EPPES said that he had no hope, at this late hour of the day, after the House had been so long amused with an eloquent oration, abounding with tropes, figures, and well turned periods, that he could offer anything calculated to interest or amuse them. I cannot, however, said he, suppress the sentiment I feel at hearing a gentleman, in the present situation of his country, attempt to place in a degraded point of view the resources of the nation, and level exclusively at the Administration of his own Government, that asperity which ought to be confined to the belligerent nations. To a man who knew nothing of the foreign relations of this country, it would appear, from the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that peace, prosperity, and every other blessing, would attend the removal of the embargo. No person, from his speech, could suppose that the sovereignty and independence of this nation was in danger from the atrocious and unprincipled conduct of foreign nations. The embargo is the cause of all our difficulties! Nothing but a removal of the embargo is necessary to re-establish the unrivalled prosperity of the nation! This measure is represented as having originated in political deception; as having been supported on grounds not only extraordinary but unprincipled. Even the present bill is represented as a new species of political deception, intended to deceive and mislead the people. The speech of the gentleman himself is nothing more than political delusion; an old story dressed up in a new garb, and ushered into the world at the present moment, for the purpose of meeting the present state of things in Massachusetts. It is intended to produce an effect on the Legislature of that State, and on the approaching elections. The speech is certainly not made on the bill before the House. It can have no object but to increase the irritation already produced in that portion of the Union by misrepresentations. The gentleman has said, I am sick to loathing, at hearing the constant cry of war, war, war. I, said Mr. E., am sick to loathing, at hearing the constant cry of embargo, embargo, embargo. I am sick to loathing, when I find a representative of this nation callous to the wrongs of his country; when I hear him holding out to foreign nations the idea that we cannot be driven into war; that we are incapable of making it. What has the gentleman told you? you cannot carry the nation into war; you have neither resources nor men; will this country resort to direct taxes or loans? Will the party that came into power by opposing direct taxes and loans, resort to them? They cannot; whenever they do they must go out. It was neither direct taxes or loans, which lost to the Federal party the confidence of the people. The prodigal expenditure of public money, which produced the necessity of taxes and loans, deprived them of the public confidence. The Republican party came in as the friends of a proper and a niggardly system of economy; on the ground of attachment to the rights of the nation individually and collectively; neither the people or the party will shrink from that species of expense which is necessary to maintain the independence and rights of the nation. That species of niggardly economy, which could put money in competition with the independence of the nation, I for one disclaim. It would be disclaimed by the whole of the Republican party. By a judicious management of our funds we have acquired credit, that is equal to our wants; we can command without difficulty and without taxes, whatever sum may be necessary to assert and maintain our rights; when the period of difficulty shall have passed, it can be discharged honestly, as our debts heretofore contracted have been, without new taxes or burdens on the people. We possess a credit superior to that of any other nation, and we deserve it. The gentleman, in speaking of his political opponents, has said, by their deeds shall you know them. Apply this principle to the ground taken by the gentleman. Will you, says he, with 170 gunboats fight Great Britain? Will you march into Canada and take possession of her territories? They have it in their power to punish your rashness; they will destroy your seaport towns. This is the language of an American Representative; when this nation is assailed by foreign danger; make war, and punishment awaits you; you have no army; no effective militia; no resources; you mean not to assert the rights of the nation; your object is political deception. These observations are not less extraordinary than the ground on which the gentleman attempts to convince the people, that we have no intention to maintain their rights by any course but the embargo. The army, he has told you, has been officered exclusively by persons of a particular political sentiment. This he considers as a proof that the army is not intended to fight foreign nations; he has understood from authority, which he cannot doubt, that no Federalist was to be appointed to the new army; that this was a correct principle, I have no doubt. The old army is almost exclusively officered by Federalists; the appointment of Republicans exclusively to the new one, will still leave to the Federalists more than their relative share of these appointments. Even if this was not the case, I should consider the principle correct. I have never on this subject disguised my sentiments; I ever have been, and I ever will be, opposed to the appointment of Federalists.

But, sir, the gentleman has told us you have not even spirit enough to fit out and send to sea your navy, reduced as it is. Does the gentleman mean to rest the rights of the nation on the frigates and public armed vessels? Does he expect that, with our naval force, our rights can be maintained on the ocean against Great Britain? I should despair, indeed, if, on this element alone, Great Britain was to be assailed, and with this force. Her commerce, in the event of war, must be assailed by employing our commercial capital in privateering. We are capable of assailing her in this way in every place where her canvass floats. It will afford an honorable and profitable occupation to our seamen; it will be a field to exercise their courage, enterprise, and patriotism. It is in our power, if war shall be resorted to, to assail with effect her possessions near us; to cut off this resource for the supply of her islands; to increase the distance between us, and destroy the pretext for her armed vessels hovering on our coasts; to prevent, in future, the disgrace of being insulted in our ports; of having her officers enjoying hospitality in our ports at night, and going out the next morning to rob and murder our citizens. We can take possession of her territories here, and, if future events shall justify that course, we can take possession of the Floridas also, and prevent the danger of future collision with foreign nations. The gentleman from Massachusetts has brought into this discussion what he calls the reasons for laying the embargo, and has attempted to show that the real grounds of the measure have not been avowed by the Administration. He draws this conclusion from the arguments used on this floor in support of the measure. 1. That it would preserve our commercial capital. 2. That it would prevent immediate war. 3. That it would coerce Great Britain. 4. That it would have a good effect on Mr. Rose's negotiation. 5. That Bonaparte was asserting the maritime rights of the world, and that it would go in aid of that assertion. That the embargo did preserve from ruin our commercial capital, and that it did prevent war, are facts admitted by all unprejudiced men; that it produced great sensibility and alarm on the part of the British Ministry, we know. The inducement held out to our citizens to violate the laws of their country proves it. When did the British Ministry lose this sensibility? When it was discovered that, by means of their agents and subjects here, the law could be evaded. As to the operation of the embargo on the negotiation of Mr. Rose, this is entirely new to me. It is the first time I have ever heard this assigned as one of the grounds on which it was supported. As to the mission of Mr. Rose, it was a mere political juggle on the part of the British Ministry. It was intended to palsy the feeling of the nation as to the outrage on the Chesapeake; it produced that effect. The fifth ground, as to Bonaparte, I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to have withdrawn. If the gentleman has withdrawn it, I will forbear to remark on it.

H. OF R.

Extra Session.

JANUARY, 1809.

Mr. QUINCY explained, and said he withdrew it.

Mr. EPPES continued.—I am really glad the gentleman has done so. I should, indeed, have been sorry that any gentleman, who has a reputation to support, should have urged in a new form a charge so often refuted.

Mr. QUINCY did not know that it had been refuted.

Mr. EPPES called him to order, and proceeded. From the grounds taken, as the gentleman from Massachusetts informs us, in debate on the embargo, he infers that the Administration, in recommending the embargo as a precautionary measure, practised political deception. That it was intended by the Administration, first as a measure of coercion exclusively on Great Britain, secondly to keep it on at all hazards, and thirdly, to do nothing else. The gentleman tells us this measure was represented to the British Government as a precautionary measure only; that if it had been presented as a measure of coercion, negotiation would have been at an end. How does it happen that negotiation has totally failed notwithstanding the measure was presented to the view of the British Government as a precautionary measure only? Did the British Ministry possess information in which they had more confidence, tending to prove that this representation of the measure was only political deception? As to the second and third points, that the Administration was to adhere to the embargo at all hazards, and to do nothing else, it is a mere naked assertion, totally unsupported by the course which has been adopted. For what purpose did we, during the last session, raise troops? Why have we doubled our seamen and marines? Why have we made large appropriations for fortifications? For what purpose are we about to raise more troops? The gentleman says, to enforce the embargo at the point of the bayonet. All this preparation is designed only for enforcing the embargo. Really, I have too much respect for the understanding of the gentleman to believe that this is seriously his opinion. The gentleman has told us that those who talk most about fighting are least disposed for war. What are we to think of those who, in the present situation of their country, can find no theme on which to exercise their eloquence but the embargo? I cannot believe such men very zealous to maintain the rights of their country. Why does not the gentleman come forward and give us an exposition of the decrees and orders? Let him do this and give the people an opportunity of deciding whether the decrees and orders, or political deception and the embargo, produced our present distress and difficulties. What is the practical operation of these decrees and orders? A planter in Virginia wishes to send tobacco to the continent of Europe; what must he do? Send it first to a British port, pay a tax, and obtain a permission from His Majesty to ship his own produce. Suppose an inhabitant of the State of Massachusetts wishes to send fish to Spain, or to any other part of the continent of Europe? Why he must first go to a British port ask permission of His Majesty and pay for the permission. Will any gentleman venture to deny that this is the practical operation of the Orders in Council? Will the gentleman from Massachusetts tell the people of this country they cannot, must not fight for this; that they have no resources? The gentleman from Massachusetts could not maintain this ground before the people in any portion of this country. The rankest Tory in our country would blush to take such ground. He would be scouted by honest men.

Mr. E. concluded with saying, that the general scope of the argument of the gentleman went to show that the embargo was to be a permanent measure. Conscious that such a view was entirely erroneous, calculated to deceive and mislead the people, he had obeyed the impulse of his feelings, and confined his observations to the speech of the gentleman instead of discussing the bill before the House.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON, after a few words in explanation to Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS on the subject of an extraordinary mission, said the gentleman had urged that such a measure (an extraordinary mission) would give a refutation to the calumny now circulating that the Administration was not ardently desirous of peace. Has it not been denied, said Mr. J., notwithstanding the official documents to the contrary, that no proposition to suspend the embargo has been officially made to Great Britain? When men have the hardihood to say these things, is it not in vain to attempt to induce them to believe anything? If one arose from the dead, they would not believe. A stronger illustration of this appears in the conduct of the member from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) and in passing from the gentleman from South Carolina, to whose patriotism and honorable sense of what is due to his country, I cannot but testify my respect, it is with extreme regret that I turn to another quarter, which, in every point of view, presents the direct reverse of his character. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) sat out by declaring that the object of Congress was to continue the embargo, and to induce the people to bear with it, under a belief that measures would be adopted which the House had not in contemplation. Are we to infer from the gentleman's speech, sir, that he feels great hostility to the adoption of any measure which shall diminish the public sensibility? If any inference can be drawn from his language, it is irresistible that he would be mortified if any measure should be adopted which would allay the fermentation which such speeches and such men have produced. The gentleman says a great crisis is about to take place, and by deceiving the people, by passing this bill, it is intended to prevent it. What does this crisis mean, sir? Hostility to the laws. Have we not heard from gentlemen (Mr. LLOYD it is supposed) living in the quarter from which the member comes, that the fermentations will be manifested there first by the public meetings, next by resolutions of the State Legislature, and lastly by taking some undefined course to resist the laws? And is averting such a crisis as this the effect which the gentleman so much deprecates? Is it because it has a tendency to avert such calamities, that he is against it?

Would he be delighted with all the horrors which disunion and civil war can produce? If we are to infer anything from the observations of the gentleman, it is that such a state of things would be most pleasing to him. He says this House has acted under a deception as to the motives with which the embargo was laid. This is, to say the least of it, not very courtly language; and if I animadvert on it in a style which may not be pleasing to the gentleman, he must charge it to himself. Does he mean to convey an idea that the members of this House are the dupes of Executive or any other influence? That they are to be gulled by misinterpretations of the Executive views? The imputation is unworthy of the gentleman. He may be the victim of the prejudices and views of his own party, though I should least suspect him of being duped by them, who appears to be one of their leaders. I trust that this House will always act according to its own sense of propriety; and I know it is without reason that the insinuation is made that we wish to deceive the people. It is the gentleman and his friends that deceive them. Has anything been concealed from the people? Have we not always explicitly declared what our views and intentions were? The whole tenor of the conduct of this Administration pronounces emphatically the character of falsehood on the assertion. This political deception, which the gentleman imagines we have acted under, only exists in the heated imagination of an infuriated partisan, disposed to sacrifice everything to attain his object.

The ostensible motives for laying the embargo were the real ones; there was never any inconsistency between the real and alleged motives. And I will here observe, that I make a wide distinction between the motives which lead to the adoption of a measure, and those which require its continuance. They were purely precautionary in the first instance. The reasons avowed by its friends for the passage of the embargo, originally, he asserts, were to preserve our seamen and vessels—to frighten Mr. Rose—to compel Great Britain to yield to the coal-leaked Powers—to join the coalition against England—to do something, not knowing what—whilst it seems that others, though but few, might have calculated upon its effect on France. And, upon this ground, the gentleman charges the Administration with duplicity. Look at the facts assumed by him, and see whether they exist in reality, or, if they do, whether they warrant the inferences drawn from them. One ground, he says, was to preserve our seamen and vessels. This is undoubtedly correct. Another ground, he asserts, was to frighten Mr. Rose. Was that a moving consideration? Certainly not, sir. I will not credit it, unless I hear it from a source more entitled to credit. Every man must know, that ever heard anything of British diplomacy, that their Ministers, when they leave home, come handcuffed, manacled, and tongue-tied with instructions, which they cannot shape conformably to posterior circumstances. In illustration of this, I recollect an anecdote of a British Minister at Paris, who, being asked to go to the theatre, declined the invitation, alleging the necessity of waiting until he could dispatch a courier to London to obtain leave from his Government. No one entertained so futile an idea, as that Mr. Rose would be frightened with the embargo. That ground, therefore, is incorrect.

Another motive assigned, the gentleman says, was, that it would compel Great Britain to yield. Some gentlemen have taken the ground, sir, (and I believe it to be correct,) that Great Britain will be materially operated on by withdrawing from her the supplies necessary for her subsistence, and the raw materials indispensable to her manufactories. But, because this calculation has entered into the arguments for the continuance of the embargo, is it to be asserted that it was a principal motive for the original imposition of that measure? The members who voted for the embargo saw that our property and resources were involved in irretrievable ruin, unless they were snatched from the danger. It is the course of wisdom to observe precaution; and, in doing so, it is not necessary to inquire into the latent consequences, but merely into the immediate effects, of the measure. And they were not to be deterred from it by an idea that it might affect the nations which had compelled us to adopt it.

Another object of this measure, he alleges, was to coalesce with France in resisting the British Orders in Council. How does this comport with the assertion that we did not know of the orders when the embargo was laid? The two assertions are at variance; they will not hold together; they are not consistent with each other, and neither of them is consistent with truth; because the existence of the orders was so well known that the substance of them was given in a paper in this city (the National Intelligencer) on the 18th of December, expounding the intention of them more effectually than any man could do from their context; for, as Mr. Baring said, on the floor of the House of Commons, "For a guinea, any English lawyer would give opposite opinions on its clauses, so capable were they of misconstruction." The imputation, as a motive for the embargo, of an intention to join the coalition against France, is a most dastardly attack on the majority, and on the Administration. They do not hold a language official, and a language confidential. This nation would not have so long been blind to it, had such a time-serving policy guided its actions. We have too much reliance on the good sense of the people to support ourselves on imposture—on a flagitious dereliction of principle. If we were to unite with France or any other nation, it would, I hope, be done in the face of the world. Were it to be attempted clandestinely, I should be the last to follow in the wake.

How have subsequent events justified this charge? Why, sir, a proposition was made to England to take sides with her against France, to repeal the embargo in relation to her, if she would repeal her Orders in Council, so far as they affected us. And what would be the direct result of such a measure if France persisted in her decrees? Hostilities against France and alliance with Great Britain—allowing the latter all the benefit of our trade, and cutting off all communication with her enemy. The idea does not comport with the fact; and no man who will give his judgment time to operate on his passions will dare to hazard such an assertion.

But there were others, the gentleman says, who wished to do something and did not know what, and therefore voted for the embargo. Is this amongst the charges brought forward to prove that a language official and a language confidential has been held by the Administration? This class of men cannot be aiding in the deception the gentleman speaks of; for men too ignorant to understand, must be too weak to be trusted with the designs of those who wish to use them. Is the Executive responsible for the motives of every man on this floor, who chanced to vote in conformity with his recommendation? The supposition is derogatory to the character of the people, and the expression of it is an intolerable insult. We act from our own impulse alone, sir; and there cannot be a stronger illustration of this fact than the vote the other day on the subject of the Navy, when the House is so equally divided; and the gentleman's political friends divided too on the question in the first instance; however, after they had permitted their passions to cool, in a day or two, they wheeled about and advocated the bill. I voted throughout on the same side, although I almost distrusted my judgment from finding myself in such bad company. The votes on this bill, I say, prove the futility of the idea that the Executive is responsible for the acts of the majority or their arguments.

I have now very cursorily noticed the gentleman's proofs in support of his charges. If fully examined, they would prove to be vox et preterea nihil.

He also says that it was determined by the Administration to keep on the embargo, and to do nothing else effectual. Sir, the acts of the Government prove that it was resolved to take grounds which would enable it to resist the attacks which might be made on us. A million of dollars was appropriated for fortifications at the last session, a much larger sum than was ever appropriated at any one time before; in addition to this, appropriations for gunboats, men, &c., were made. How is the assertion that the embargo was intended to be permanent, justified? If that had been the design of the Administration, would not the instructions given to our Ministers immediately after the adjournment of Congress have been of a very different nature? Four days only had elapsed after the adjournment, before the President manifested a prompt attention to the subject, and a determination to avail himself of the authority vested in him by law. Are we to be told after this, sir, that the embargo was intended to be a permanent measure? That it was to be continued as a means of coercion, and of coercion only? No, sir; for this proposition, the rejection of which stamps on the British Government the crime of insincerity, was made immediately after Congress rose. Need I read the instructions and the formal offer made in consequence of them? Every one has seen both. And I will again tell the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS) that he cannot expect to convince the misguided people of this country, who are worked upon by partisans, after an attempt has been made in the face of the documents to prove that it was an unofficial proposition made by our Minister in London, and which the British Government did not accept of, because it might implicate the Minister with his Government, for doing an act which he was not authorized to do.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON here giving way for the purpose, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 20.

EXTRA SESSION.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress: Whereupon, the motion made yesterday by Mr. DAVID R. WILLIAMS, to amend the bill by striking out the words "fourth Monday of May," which was depending at the time of adjournment, was renewed.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON resumed his observations. After discussing the circumstances urged by the gentleman as tending to prove that the Administration has been guilty of inconsistency, which I noticed yesterday, and which I trust it was unnecessary for me to have noticed, because the acts of the Executive stamp on the assertion its proper character, the gentleman from Massachusetts says that he collected his idea that the ostensible were not the real causes of the embargo, from the difference of the language held here and in Great Britain, where it was required that it should not be considered as a measure of hostility; that such a threat as we now utter would be laying a naked sword upon the table when making our proposition, and would have been rejected with disdain, had not duplicity characterized the conduct of the Government towards that nation. It never has been supported on this floor as a hostile measure, but as a precautionary and coercive one; and cannot the gentleman distinguish between hostility and coercion? Was the non-importation law considered as a hostile act? No, sir; yet it was enacted as a coercive or restrictive measure. But no man, except one whose imagination has misled his judgment, can conceive that the embargo was a hostile act. It was never supported as one, and on that ground, if on no other, the gentleman's premises are uprooted, and his whole superstructure overturned. Now the gentleman says the language is different. I have shown that the language is not different. But if it were, it would prove that there was no preconceived in the thing, and would falsify one of the gentleman's charges, viz: that there was a design to foist this measure upon the public, under auspices different from those avowed. The embargo may be continued for one cause, though it was not laid for that cause; and because some gentlemen say that it will have a coercive effect, does it follow that it was laid for that purpose alone? Certainly not; its adoption may be for one motive, and its continuance for another, and yet gentlemen advocating both be perfectly consistent. I think it would be monstrous to make the gentleman's party responsible for everything he says, and not more so to make him responsible for all that is said on his side of the question. It cannot be that the Executive is responsible for what I say to-day, or what I said yesterday, or for what any gentleman on the same side with myself may have said at any time whatever. Why, then, urge the language used on this floor as certain proofs? All the positive good which the embargo had in contemplation it is said has been attained, viz: the preserving our ships and seamen from capture. If removed without substituting any other measure, what would be the necessary consequence? All would be let loose to destruction. And is this the policy which ought to characterize the measures of this nation? If this act, against which all the arguments and artillery of gentlemen are pointed, was to be removed without a substitute, the inevitable effect would be, that we must either submit to trade as the edicts of the belligerents direct, or have our property captured.

But the gentleman says, that a "language official and a language confidential" have been held. This is not a new charge, sir. The gentleman has not even the credit of inventing it. It has been often made without a shadow of truth. The gentleman has not attempted to substantiate it. Let him show wherein it is true; he is defied to do so.

But it seems that it is intended to keep on this embargo system, until it is effectual, at all hazards. How does he support his assertion, sir? Not by the language of any gentleman here; for no gentleman, however enthusiastic in its favor, has ventured so to support it. If the language used on this floor be good for one purpose, it is good for another. If it be good to prove that the secret motives of the Executive in recommending the embargo were different from the avowed one, it must be good to prove the contrary of the gentleman's assertions. Does he mean to charge the members of the House with duplicity? I presume not. Well, sir, have not gentlemen of the majority on this floor admitted that the embargo cannot, and ought not to be persisted in, for any great length of time? It would heretofore have had its effect, but for the villany of the dishonest part of the community, as was properly observed by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MAOON,) who is one of its most strenuous advocates, and he limits its duration to September as the longest practicable time. The majority, however, generally say, that the embargo will have had its effect by May or June next. The gentleman says, if it were intended as a precautionary measure only—if it was not to be perpetual—it ought to have been limited in its operation to a given day; and that the House by negating a proposition to that effect, had declared that they would keep it on. If it were limited, it would afford a premium to our enemies to persevere until that time, and an opportunity to men like the gentleman from Massachusetts to defeat all our measures. The gentleman from Massachusetts has made half a dozen speeches at this session of the same tenor with that of yesterday, and the omission to notice them has been more from a desire to get on with the public business, than a wish to avoid the weight of his arguments, which he says we wince from. Yes, sir, its limitation would have been a premium to our enemy to hold on, and men like him, to prevent a substitute; and our commerce, when let loose, would have been swept from the ocean by the great "bulwark," which protects us from the gigantic power of France. But, says the gentleman, "By their deeds shall ye know them;" and in the same breath tells us, that the majority of the House could not be kicked into a war. Apply this maxim to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I feel reluctant to express my sentiments on this subject. If I did, I would say that the conduct of the gentleman induces a belief that he would be delighted to see the Constitution burned at the point of the bayonet, and the Union torn asunder by civil dissension. By their deeds shall ye know them; is it fair, then, to judge of gentlemen by their defamatory speeches and disorganizing sentiments? The House cannot be kicked into a war! Is this language fit for the Representative Chamber of this nation? He demands what was the motive for raising the Army of last session. If the gentleman will recur to the speeches on this subject, he will find an able elucidation of the causes for it, made by a gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HOWARD,) who is not often in the habit of delivering his sentiments on this floor. The causes for it were found in the situation of the Western country; in the great extent of our frontier, covered with savages, amongst whom British agents had been stirring up dissatisfaction, with the hope of inducing them to take up the tomahawk and sacrifice our brethren; they were found in the necessity of garrisoning our posts on the frontier, and a thousand other considerations. The motive then was good, and ample cause existed for raising this force. But we are told that if war abroad had been contemplated, the Army would not have been officered as it has been. Does the gentleman mean to reflect on the bravery of the men appointed to command, or to presume that they will not maintain the rights of this country, as bravely as his political friends? I cannot conceive for what other purpose the insinuation was made. I can answer the gentleman why I conceive that it ought to have been officered as it was. If, in this time of great peril, gentlemen will maintain an hostility against the Administration and laws of their country in the manner in which the gentleman from Massachusetts does, they deserve not the confidence of the Government. I would as soon desire his Britannic Majesty to send over some of his liege subjects to command our army.

H. OF R.

Extra Session.

JANUARY, 1809.

But the gentleman says that this House has not even spirit enough to fit out our little navy. The answer to this I leave to some one in the majority; for I was unfortunate enough to be in the minority. As to spirit, sir, there are many individuals in that majority who would make him shrink from the contest until pale fear divested him of the lion's skin with which he adorns himself. He says we have sacrificed our revenue. Let loose our ships to-morrow, and our vessels and seamen sail to certain ruin, to conflagration on the one hand, and confiscation on the other. It will be impossible then to avoid capture. And will this state of things fill the coffers of the country? We are told, however, that Great Britain holds a pledge in the defenceless state of our seaport towns for any damage we can do to her, if we go to war. Is it not a fair inference from the arguments of the gentleman that he would therefore recommend a base and dishonorable submission? Certainly it is, because it tends to this: that we cannot raise a force competent to cope with the gigantic power of Great Britain.

But, sir, we are told that we have a partisan army. And what kind of an army should we have? Would you have our lukewarm, indifferent, or deadly foes hoisted into office, looking for the downfall of those who appoint them? Are these the men to be employed? Surely not, sir. What kind of an army had we in the Revolution? Was not that a party army—a band of patriots? When we have war, sir, it ought to be carried on by such partisan soldiers. I have no idea of confiding the defence of this nation to men who merely hire themselves to be shot at. With such men I would not risk the destinies of the nation. But we are told by the gentleman that we have no effective militia. Is this true, or is it a libel? My life on it, if the times demand it, the gentleman will find the militia strong enough to put down that gentleman and his Essex Junto faction. If they dare to rebel, as they have worse than insinuated, the militia of his own State would be more than adequate to all the purposes of putting down so puny a faction.

But, says the gentleman, the only object of this bill is to quiet the Legislatures of the several States, and to influence the Spring elections, to prevent resistance. This is not the first time that I have heard language on this floor, which in former times would be deemed treasonable. It is treason, sir. There is no such motive. If this people think proper to pursue any course, they will do so, and will not be turned aside from it, because factious demagogues cannot be quieted with office; and I have shown the impropriety of giving it to them. I should have no kind of objection, if things were driven to that excess, to let them excite rebellion, and have them punished as traitors.

If there was no deception in this thing, the gentleman says that the embargo would have been limited. If a limitation were now to be affixed to the duration of the embargo, and the member from Massachusetts alone was not deprived of the gift of speech, no measure would be substituted for the maintenance of our rights. He would day and night eke out the time until it was too late to substitute any measure. The gentleman wants a pledge from this corrupted House and Executive, who avow one thing and mean another, who sell their country to the usurper of Europe! What pledges can be valuable from such a source? Sir, the pledges of the sincerity and pacific disposition of the Administration may be found in the public documents. If they are not sufficient to satisfy the gentleman, the voice of an angel from Heaven would be of no avail. The amount of the gentleman's whole attempt was to prove that we were so base and corrupted as to be unworthy of credit. And if the embargo were limited now, he would tell the people that we are still false to them; that we are affrighted by "the light rising in the East," which is so soon "to break forth into the most perfect day." The gentleman would ride down that hobby-horse as he has rode down the other.

A day or two ago the gentleman remarked that we were reduced to a situation similar to that of the turbaned Turk or cross-kneed Frenchman; that we have confided the power of regulating commerce to the Executive, and ten or twelve Senators. Why did not the gentleman urge this wondrous argument against the resolution that we could not submit to the orders and decrees? For if we have no power to resist, it would have been a good argument against declaring that we would not submit. But I feel convinced that when the great interests of the country require it, whilst we have such men in our councils they will act in concert, whether to resist foreign aggressors or domestic insurgents. What would a stranger say at hearing the debate which has taken place on this question, if he had not previously been apprized of the subject before you? He could not have supposed that the House were discussing a proposition to meet at an earlier day than that fixed by the Constitution, but a resolution to impeach the Executive or a majority of the House. He could not have supposed otherwise from the gentleman's speech or from my answer to it, for I have followed him step by step. He rises, he tells you, in behalf of this people. If he is the champion of the people; if he is to be the sentinel to sound the tocsin of alarm from the Constitutional watch-tower, God help this people. He was silent as to the letter published the other day by the British Government; this he might have said; in the spirit of this proposition, is evidence of the propriety of changing our measures. An appeal has been made by the British Government to the people of this country. Need I say, sir, that no persons had copies of this paper but our Government, the British Government, our Minister there, and their Minister here? Our Government has not caused the publication; theirs must have done it. And the gentleman might have said, inasmuch as it was an attempt to react the scenes of Genet, it was necessary that the Legislature should be in session to counteract it. Sir, what would have been his language if M. Champagny had published such a letter in such a way? Would he have been silent in that case? No, sir; my life on it, he would be among the first to maintain the rights and honor of the nation, which are thus insidiously assailed by the British Government. We ought to know how this letter became public; and if some gentleman whose age and experience would justify a proposition of that kind, were to rise in his place and ask that the Executive should be requested to ascertain in what manner it came into the public prints; and, if through the British Ministry, request that their Minister should be sent off, I should vote for it. The gentleman finds nothing to blame in the conduct of foreign nations, but, like a viper, turns and wounds the vitals of his own country, satisfied if he can only let loose the torrent of defamation, daily uttered in this House, contrary to every parliamentary rule, against an Executive, whose acts ought to have induced all his former enemies to say "he has disappointed our expectations, and proved himself the supporter of that Declaration of Independence which was given to the world from his pen." I pronounce it a cowardly abuse of the privileges of this House, of which I should never avail myself under any circumstances whatever, to cover with its shield attacks on the honor of the President in every way unjustifiable. If the President has been guilty of crimes let him be impeached, not accused, tried, and condemned by the same individual in the same breath. What would be said, and I beg the attention of the House to the similarity of the cases, if the Senate should be charged with such baseness by any member of the House. The Speaker would put him down. And what would be said if the President were to avail himself of the opportunity afforded by the press or his official messages to promulgate an attack on this House, accusing it of duplicity and subserviency to the views of a foreign Government? One universal display of indignation would manifest the feelings of the House; every member of it would rise at once to address you on the subject. And is the Executive on all occasions to be accused of the crime—a crime which would eternally disgrace any man—of being false to the people who have confided in him? This course is not less disgraceful or unparliamentary, than if we were to accuse the other House of similar conduct; and it is high time that a stop should be put to it.

But the gentleman said, sir, that he did not mean to charge the Executive with moral turpitude, but with political imposture. Is this the morality of the gentleman? Treason against the people is no crime! Such a doctrine, sir, is base and detestable. Does the gentleman act on this logic? Has he made it the basis on which the superstructure of his arguments is erected? Pardon me, sir, when I say that I fear he has. The highest crime in this nation is treason. The Constitution says it shall consist only in levying war, and adhering to our enemies. And even this is but a political crime. What was the crime of Aaron Burr? He did not put any one to death; he only attempted to turn the arms of his deluded followers against the Government of his country; his objects were political merely. And this we are told is not an immoral act. Are these the steady habits of New England? I hope not. But the gentleman says he should be false to the people if he did not hold up his voice. In what does falsehood to the people consist? Is it not in uttering false accusations and false charges? In the days of Rome, Catiline stood forth avowedly the champion of the people. He sometimes aped the virtues and morality of Cato, and then played Catiline; for in all ages an affected passion for the rights of the people has been the pretext for committing the most abominable crimes.

The President has been accused on this floor of falsehood, also. I do not recollect whether it was in the gentleman's catalogue of "political deception" of yesterday. In the message at the close of the late session the President says: "The papers which I lay before you embrace all the communications written and verbal from the French Government, respecting the general relations between the two countries, which have been transmitted through our Minister there, or through any other accredited channel since the last session of Congress." Notwithstanding this solemn asseveration that the papers then communicated contained all the information he had received, gentlemen say that the President has asserted a falsehood; that a letter of December the first had been received, and justify the charge on a supposition arising from dates merely. Why, sir, it is no secret that this letter was delivered by the Minister to Mr. Patterson, and by him to Mr. Rittenhouse, at Amsterdam, and that gentleman did not reach this country until May, so that its receipt was subsequent to the adjournment of Congress. But if Mr. Armstrong were to swear to this, and Mr. Rittenhouse, the Secretary of State, and his chief clerk to affirm it, gentlemen would say it was all falsehood still; after daring to dispute the solemn assertion of the President, they would say it was merely a tale conjured up to meet circumstances. This letter, notwithstanding all the noise, gives no new light, adds no new information.

But, sir, we have been told that the President and Government have acted with duplicity; that they have connived at the idea of joining France in opposition to England; and a paragraph in the letter of Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny, urging the rescinding of her edicts, is seized as proof, strong as holy writ, that the President has arranged a plan for uniting us with France. If the optics of the gentleman who made this assertion were as keen on one side as the other, if he were not as blind as the kittens alluded to by his friend from Massachusetts, he would find precisely the same language used in the communications to England. The same arguments were addressed to the understandings or interests of both.

Upon the whole, sir, I must conclude that the observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) were made for the purpose of alarming, distracting, and dividing this nation, of uprooting everything like social happiness. I will not suffer the mantle of charity longer to cover such men, the veil of deception should be pierced and torn off, that they may stand naked before this people covered only with disgrace—not shame. No, sir, I have no such hope. The African visage was never suffused with a blush. There can be no blushes on the cheeks of those who commit the unworthy act of uttering dishonorable, false charges, and protecting themselves under the privileges of this House. Neither is there hope of reformation. Nero never repented. The melody of music produced by the bow which he drew across the strings of his fine toned instrument, was not half so harmonious to his ears as the crackling fires of Rome, the crash of its falling towers, the cries of its women and children, and the universal ruin of his country. There have been more Neros than one. The example of Rome is not single. And while all good men are striving to heal the wounds of party, and unite this country at a time when the whole world is in hostility against it, in comparison with whom our population and resources are nothing, except as they depend on the virtue and spirit of the men yet surviving, and the sons of those who have departed, who aided in the achievement of the independence of this nation, while all their efforts are directed day and night to relieve their suffering country, the midnight lamp sheds its pale light on the black compositions of a few restless spirits, who strive to distract the Eastern people. Is this the patriotism which the gentleman professes? I presume, that, after the rage of party has subsided, the people will discover the imposture and chastise the impostors. This is the time to forget party feelings; and yet gentlemen resort to every petty circumstance, and because it authorized an inference in opposition to direct facts, endeavor to excite them—they would tumble the Executive from the height which he properly occupies into the dust, down to a level with themselves. It is time not only to forget party feelings, but to cease treasonable opposition. And as to those who pursue the course which I have described, whether out of this House or in it, I would say to the American people, in a voice which could be heard in every corner of the congregated assembly: Risk not your peace or safety for them—they are enemies of your peace—they have conspired against your safety—cast them from you—hostes humani generis—let the mark of infamy be stamped upon their foreheads, so that all who see them may execrate them.

The question was now taken on the motion of Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS to strike out the words "fourth Monday in May," and lost.

Mr. BACON said, that on a former day he had felt himself called upon to make some remarks in reply to his colleague, who addressed the House yesterday. The task was not then a pleasant one.

In his subsequent remarks a few days since, the gentleman took occasion to tell me, very courteously, that I had been barking at his heels, and that he would not pursue my course. Though these sort of personal collisions are extremely disagreeable, yet his observations will not deter me from following that course, which my duty may dictate. As Representatives from the same State, I have since endeavored to avoid all needless collisions, with a gentleman standing in such a relation with myself, and should not again have placed myself in opposition to him, but for the extraordinary remarks which fell from him yesterday, to which, sir, I consider it my duty, however painful, to address some observations to you in reply. It was the temper of his remarks, their tendency if not their design, the peculiar time, and the temper of the people in one section of the Union, that impressed my mind with peculiar regret at the ground which he thought proper to assume. As to the temper of his remarks, I need not exhibit it any further to the House, it has been sufficiently noticed; as to their tendency it cannot be mistaken; there is something, however, more particularly striking as to the time. What are the circumstances under which they were offered? What are the circumstances in which this House has found itself for some time past?

Sir, for some days we have had a general aspect of union in the House—a considerable harmony of parties. A number of questions have been taken that savored very little of party feelings, and the political atmosphere had subsided into a state of much apparent tranquillity, until agitated by the thunder of the gentleman. Was not this a desirable prospect? I confess, for one, sir, that I have seldom found an occasion on which I more congratulated myself; but, it would seem as though my colleague feared that this state of things might conduct us and the nation to some happy result. Did he, therefore, think it necessary that a firebrand should be thrown on this floor, to excite agitation in the House, and alarm, division, and discord, among the people? I hope the gentleman had no such intention; but that such was the tendency of his remarks, no one can differ with me in believing. As to the time and occasion which he chose, it is well known, as the gentleman observed, that the Legislatures of many of the States are about to assemble. Yes, sir, they are; and amongst others, that of the State which the gentleman and myself have the honor to represent, about the time that the speech of my honorable colleague will arrive there. The temper of that portion of the Union is already sufficiently excited. That they have already manifested strong symptoms of disaffection—that they have heretofore given intimations of violent measures—cannot be concealed. Did the gentleman fear that they would not be sufficiently agitated—that they would not at once be ripe for the most desperate measures? Did he fear, that, unless he added a little fuel to the flame, it would not burst out with sufficient fury to produce his favorite crisis? Did he fear that this portentous crisis, of which he spoke in an oracular tone, would not arrive with sufficient celerity? I call it his favorite crisis, because one of his arguments in opposition to the bill, was, that he feared it was calculated to allay the passions of the people, and defeat the arrival of this crisis. Am I, therefore, incorrect in supposing that he hails the prospect of it as a desirable event? Certainly I think that the conclusion cannot be mistaken. What was to be the precise nature of this crisis, my colleague did not exactly explain to us. I know not, distinctly, by what means it is to be produced, or what are its ultimate objects. For one, sir, I deprecate it: it will probably be a crisis of disunion. I dread it, and will use all means in my power to prevent it. I will do everything to satisfy those mistaken men who may be seduced to engage in it, that they are embarking in a cause of peril. Did I not do all in my power to avert it, I should not hold myself blameless; but, after doing this, I will do no more. Let it come when it will, or let consequences be what they may, I will not betray the trust reposed in me, as the Representative of a brave and independent people, by sacrificing the rights and interests of a great nation to the clamors of faction, or the fury of a misguided few. The gentleman told us, some days ago, that he was born a free man, and would die so, or perish in the attempt. Sir, I was born as free, though perhaps not so high, as that gentleman. I represent a people as free as the constituents of that gentleman, and who, though not perhaps “fed as well,” can endure not only “the Winter’s cold,” but can meet tempests, storms, and commotions, as undauntedly as they. This is a state of things which they will be the last to provoke; but, let it come when it may, they will not turn their backs to it. Let not the gentleman talk or think too lightly of it: whenever it comes, it will be no common crisis. Who will first be buried in the ruins of such a day, no man can predict. I again warn the gentleman, by the deep pledges which he holds in the integrity and peace of this Union, not wantonly to provoke its dissolution. He ought to consider that those who promote it may, in all probability, be the first to suffer in the general wreck of the times. He spoke to you of the men who, upon the ruins of a political convulsion, would not assume the reins of power; that it would not be the Federalists of the present day, nor would it be the present political majority, the transition in such cases being always from bad to worse; that the Condorcets and Brissots were always followed by the Dantons and Robespierres. No, sir, I agree with my colleague, that, upon the consummation of such a crisis, Federalism cannot expect to guide the destinies of this country. There is another illustrious example, in the bloody annals of the Revolution to which he alluded, from which he would do well to derive a lesson of warning and instruction. The celebrated, the notorious Philp d’Egalité, ci-devant Duke of Orleans, had, like the gentleman, a deep stake in the common interests of his country, and in its tranquillity. He was a man of noble extraction and commanding rank, but, envying the higher fortunes of the monarch, and wishing to be greater than the Throne, he became an accomplice with those who overturned the Throne itself, and was, with his fortunes, buried in its ruins! No, sir, upon the ruins of a disjointed Confederacy, a far different set of men than the common Federalists of this day will preside over the destinies of this nation. Whatever share Federalism may have had in producing this state of things, or however she may have contributed her aid to it, she will be remembered by her masters only to be disgraced and despised. The most that she can aspire to will be a hope that from her higher ranks may be selected the Viceroy to govern his country—in the name of a Viceroy over him on the other side of the Atlantic. She can, at best, aspire to nothing higher than becoming the tool and minion of a foreign despot. It is impossible it should be otherwise. It will be utterly out of the power of any domestic usurper, without foreign aid, to wield the sceptre which grows out of a state of civil discord and commotion, brought about through the agency of a foreign Power. It would be struck from his hands by the indignant arm of an incensed people faster than he could recover it. The gentleman's address had, to me, a meaning most solemn and portentous, taken in connexion with the times and circumstances under which it was delivered. But, what are the mighty means by which this crisis is to be produced, and what is the powerful lever by which these commotions are to be raised? The old, stale topic of a perpetual embargo! Like the gentleman from Virginia, I nauseate the subject. The idea of a permanent embargo is worn out, and I thought had by this time been discarded from the mind of every man, both in this House and in the nation. I am not about to enter upon a wire-drawn argument to show, either from the particular terms of the law or the general construction of language, whether it is so or not. These views have been long since exhausted. What, then, are the new arguments, never before produced, which are now offered by the gentleman, to prove that such must have been the original policy of the law? It is, that it was recommended by the Executive as a precautionary measure, while it was supported by some members on this floor as a coercive one.

On this point let me bring to the notice of the gentleman the temporary embargo of 1794, recommended, as I have always understood, by General Washington, and held out to foreign nations as a mere measure of precaution, to secure our vessels and our merchandise from belligerent aggressions and plunder. But how was it supported in this House? It was supported as the present law has also sometimes been, as a measure of coercive policy. We have but few of the debates which took place on the former occasion, to revert to, but I have in my hand the speech of a gentleman of distinguished talents, and a predecessor of mine, who then had a seat in this House, giving his views of that measure. [Mr. Bacon here read the following paragraph from the speech of Mr. Sedgwick, on his introducing a resolution empowering the President to lay an embargo on the 12th day of March, 1794:

"The reasons on which this idea of an embargo were founded, are that Great Britain cannot supply her West Indies, except from the United States. If this is in any degree true in peaceable times, how much more forcibly must it operate now! They have a considerable military force there to feed; in truth, without supplies from this country, they must inevitably abandon a project, with them a favorite one, the conquest of the French West Indies. In this situation of affairs he believed it would be found proper to put into the hands of the President a power to lay this embargo, and in a moment to prevent all supplies going to the West Indies."

The sentiments, continued Mr. B., here advanced, prove that the idea of an embargo in this country being considered as a measure of coercive policy in respect to foreign nations, to Great Britain in particular, is not a novel one—that it is no fanciful notion of the present day, but owes its origin to the politicians of the old school. I have introduced them, however, more particularly to show that the auspices under which this measure of embargo was introduced and recommended to the nation, and the views with which it was supported, were the same now as in 1794—that they were both precautionary and coercive; and will the gentleman say that President Washington or the Congress of 1794, were, as he asserts we are, instrumental in deceiving the nation? and yet his argument will equally apply to both cases.

But the gentleman affects to consider our neglect in providing general efficient means of hostility, as a certain indication that we have no idea of interposing any other measures of resistance to the violations of our rights than the embargo, and says that we have not even sufficient spirit to fit out our little navy. On this head I can answer only for one, and can say with truth, that I have been ready, at least to an equal extent with my colleague, to lend my support to every measure either of defence or offence which has been proposed to us. As to the navy, every one knows that it has not been anything like a party question, and that the two principal parties which usually appear in this House have been nearly equally divided upon it. The fact is, that the apparent tardiness of our proceeding on this point has been occasioned more by a difference of opinion as to what were the most appropriate means of national defence, than by any doubt whether the essential rights of the nation should be decided in that mode which should ultimately be thought to be upon the whole the most expedient and efficient. Another consideration has undoubtedly had its influence in deterring the Government from launching into those extensive measures of hostile preparation which have perhaps been too long delayed. There can be no question that the most ardent desire of the Government has been for the preservation of peace, if it could in any consistency with the national rights and honor be preserved; and in proportion as this desire has been ardent, no doubt we have flattered ourselves with the expectation that it might yet be preserved. Perhaps this reliance has already been cherished too long—and as the storm thickens around us, and the political horizon assumes a more threatening aspect, we are now progressing more rapidly in the preparations for a system different from that which has until this time been pursued, and in this work we may very properly call upon gentlemen of all political parties to unite their efforts, and contribute whatever they can to the defence of their country. It is said that the army which was provided for at our last session has been organized upon party principles, and officered generally from one political sect, and that such an army cannot be intended for defence against foreign aggressions, but must be solely for domestic purposes. As to the fact which the gentleman mentions, I know nothing about it. For myself, I can truly say, that on the subject of appointment to office generally in a Government like ours, my general opinions have heretofore been more liberal than would probably be esteemed orthodox by almost any political party in this country, certainly much more so than was practised upon by the political friends of my colleague when they presided in our public councils. As there are certainly a great number of men who differ from the present majority in their political sentiments, upon whom I could place the utmost reliance if called to defend their country, I would never consent that the single sin of Federalism should be deemed sufficient to exclude them from all participation in either civil or military offices. But if the gentleman in one part of his speech yesterday intended to give us a sample of those men in whose behalf he complained, on account of their exclusion from military commands, it is certainly no subject of my regret that such exclusion has been thought proper by the head of that department. Sir, was it a patriotic effort on the part of the gentleman to endeavor in that public manner to chill the spirit of the nation, and to discourage them from the assertion of their just rights, by disparaging our resources, undervaluing our means of annoyance to our enemies, and proclaiming, in the face of the world, our vulnerable points and most defenceless positions; and at the same time magnifying the power of a foreign nation, and declaring that she held against us those pledges for our good behaviour which we could not put at risk without the most imminent hazard and destruction to ourselves? Sir, when I heard the gentleman avowing to the world sentiments of this sort, my heart sunk within me, especially when I saw full in his eye a protégé of the Minister of his Britannic Majesty, rioting no doubt upon the charms of his eloquence, and receiving it with those kind of sensations so natural to the human heart, when the pride of the country to whose fortunes we are attached is the subject of eulogy. I trust that these are not the national feelings or sentiments of the great body of those with whom the gentleman is generally associated in his political conduct. If they are, they could indeed hardly be relied upon to lead our armies to the field of battle—and those would be but poor defenders of their country who declared at the outset that it was utterly incapable of defence.

We are pressed by the gentleman to answer, why, if we have any intention of defending our rights by any other means than the embargo, we do not now give a pledge to the nation of our intention to abandon it at some limited period, and resort to some other system if justice is not previously done us. This is perhaps a reasonable question, and I feel for my part no hesitation in answering it. It is probably recollected that I had some time since declared to the House an opinion that in the present circumstances of the country it was the duty of the Government to fix upon a definite period, beyond which an adherence to our present position should not be maintained, and with that view I moved at that time that the resolution for repealing the embargo laws, which had been moved in the early part of the session by a gentleman from Vermont, should be referred to the Committee of the Whole, who had under consideration the subject of a non-intercourse with Great Britain and France, with a view that it might be considered in connexion with that or some other measure as a substitute upon its removal. In that motion, however, I met with but little encouragement on any side of the House. It would perhaps be desirable that the proposition for limiting the continuance of our present system should come from some other quarter—but if it should not, I shall feel no hesitation in offering it at an early day, and placing the time of it at no very distant period. If there were no other considerations in favor of such a measure, it is perhaps due to the feelings of that portion of our citizens who by such addresses to their passions and their prejudices as we yesterday heard from my colleague have been induced to believe that this was a system of perpetual exclusion from the ocean, and a permanent abandonment of commercial enterprise; and who, acting under that palpable delusion, may, by the artifices of desperate partisans and designing leaders, be led into acts of insubordination, involved in crimes, which, under the influence of correct information, they would deprecate and shudder at. Though it is more especially the province of my colleague to consider seriously upon whose head the blood of such of our fellow-citizens may in a good measure rest, yet I feel it a duty to do what lies in my power to undeceive them. In the furtherance of this desirable object, I have reason to believe that a large majority of the House will unite, and having done this I will consent to do no more. Let the crisis talked of by the gentleman come when it will, it is our duty to meet it; let its consequences rest upon those by whose misrepresentations and instigations it has been promoted and encouraged.

MR. QUINCY.—Mr. Speaker, I feel myself necessitated to make a very few remarks, in consequence of the observations which have fallen from various gentlemen. Certainly, sir, I did expect that the course of my former argument would expose me to some animadversion. In great and critical periods of society, such as is the present, nothing else can be anticipated. In performing the duty which my station, in my apprehension, made incumbent, my first concern was to satisfy myself that the ground I was about to occupy was solid. Whether it would provoke asperity in reply was a secondary consideration in comparison with the inquiry, whether it would bear the scrutinizing eye of the mass of my fellow-citizens, particularly of men of reflection, judgment, and information; of that class of men which always, in a country like this, will sooner or later take the guidance of public opinion. Having satisfied myself that the principal ground of my argument was solid, my next care was to mark it out so distinctly that it could not be mistaken. Yet those who have undertaken to reply to me, my colleague (Mr. BACON) perhaps excepted, have scarcely noticed the general bearing of my argument, and have contented themselves with inveighing against what, as they suggest, are my motives, or in refuting remarks merely incidental, and illustrative of my leading propositions. Thus the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) has undertaken to deny that all the motives which I recapitulated were operative in passing the embargo, and, as an evidence of this, to assert that some of them were never urged at the time of passing that law, as reasons for its adoption. Sir, I took occasion, in the course of my first argument, expressly to declare, that in the enumeration of motives I was making, it was not my purpose to call those motives in question, nor yet to confine myself to those which were expressly urged in debate, but to group all, which there was any reason to believe did exist, together, so as to make the conclusion more striking and satisfactory, that they did not include those which, I undertook to show, were the causes of the recommendation of that measure by Administration. The bearing of my argument, to which this recapitulation of motives was only subsidiary, was to show that embargo, with intention to coerce Great Britain, to adhere to it until it attained its purpose, and to do nothing else effectual, were not the motives of this House. This was the first branch of my argument. My second, and principal, was to show that those were the motives of Administration. In executing this last part of my task, I stated that it was my perfect conviction, that such motives did prevail with the Administration. But I did not rest satisfied with mere assertion. I stated the grounds of my conviction. I drew my conclusions concerning the motives of public men from the undeniable course of their public acts. Whether the arguments then urged were sufficient to justify such a conviction, is a question referred to the decision of my fellow-citizens. From that tribunal I shall not shrink, and before it I am not afraid to meet any or all my political opponents. To these arguments, certainly neither personal, nor in any respect unparliamentary, what has been the reply? Why, sir, "false"—"malicious"—"defamatory"—"cowardly, base detraction"—"dastardly act"—"old tory"—"friend to Great Britain"—"Nero"—"Essex Junto," and such like. Really,

Mr. Speaker, I have no means of reply to such arguments as these. Absolutely, through defect of my education, I can make no answer to them. I never studied in the school of the scavenger; I never took out degrees at the oyster bench; I never sat down at the feet of fish-women, as though they were so many she-Gamaliels, for the purpose of teaching my gill to flow through the channels of their boisterous Billingsgate. The gentlemen who resort to such weapons have all the advantage of me. If they think that their cause or their argument gain anything by the use of such opprobrious expressions, they have perfect liberty to adopt them. I have one consolation, that, so far as respects this House, what I urged, and what they replied, have both been in its presence, and I fear not to stand a comparison with them, as it respects either matter or manner, in the judgment even of their friends. I have another consolation, that my argument and their answers will each be presented, I trust fairly, to the scrutiny of our fellow-citizens. Before them we shall all be appreciated, sooner or later, for what intellectually and morally we are worth. For myself, I wish never to be appreciated above my true estimate, and I fear not, that I shall, for any great length of time, stand below it. With respect to the Administration, sir, I intimated no motive without stating the facts out of which my conclusions grew. Beyond the limit of these facts, and the extent of those conclusions, I pressed none of my observations. As far as this, I had not only a right, but it was my duty to advance. If gentlemen expect to prevent investigations of public men and public measures, conducted on such principles, by personal invectives, the nature and tendency of which are too obvious to be misunderstood, so far as respects myself individually, they have mistaken their weapons and their antagonist. It is a choice satisfaction of my mind, that it is not in the power of any individual, however malignant, (should such a character ever appear on this floor,) long to injure the reputation of any one whose private or public life does not co-operate with their malevolent intentions: and I assure the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. JACKSON,) and every gentleman who has spoken, that I shall never be a half-worker with them, probably in anything, but certainly not in the attempt to injure my own character. The sting of satire is in the truth of remark. The keenness of asperity is in the justness of the application. Where these fail, the sped arrow cuts the air harmless.

It is not my intention long to detain the House in the remarks I have to offer. Towards those who have attempted to treat me with personal severity, I feel no passion. If their cause need such auxiliaries, I can only pity them, and rejoice that such a cause is not mine. My honorable colleague, (Mr. BACON,) in commenting upon my remarks concerning the disposition of this House to go to war, was pleased to represent me as disparaging the resources of my country, and as speaking as if we could not maintain a contest with France or Great Britain; or, if occasion called, with both of them together. Certainly,

Extra Session.

H. OF R.

such was neither my intention nor the tendency of my remarks. I was speaking of the disposition of the majority of this House, as evidenced by their language and preparations, and not at all concerning the resources of this country when efficiently called into action. It appeared to me, from all the observations I could make, and so appearing, I thought it was my duty to state it to the people, that all the clamor about war, so ostentatiously made upon this floor, was nothing else than a mean used to induce the mass of our fellow-citizens, through dread of the horrors of war, to endure still longer the embargo; that a continuance of this measure was the unalterable determination of Administration, and that all the application of our resources, and all the apparent preparation was directed either to cover that determination, or to fortify that measure. This was the leading position which I took, and attempted to maintain. When I hear men talk about going to war with three millions of dollars in the Treasury—[Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said there were sixteen millions in the Treasury.] Yes, sir, there are sixteen millions in the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury tells you, that thirteen millions out of these sixteen, are already pledged, for the expenses of the year, for the appropriations already made, and for the usual annual estimates. Now, if a man, at the beginning of a year, has sixteen millions in his pocket, and has already undertaken to pay, in the course of it, thirteen millions, I do humbly conceive that he has but three millions upon which he can rely to meet any extraordinary expenditure. Indeed this is the express declaration of the Secretary of the Treasury, who tells us in so many words, that there is "a surplus only of three millions of dollars for defraying all the expenses incident to a state of actual war, or of preparations for war." Now, when I see only these three millions effective, in your Treasury, all your revenue from commerce gone, no preparations for loans, no plan devised, or pretended to be in train, to obtain new sources of revenue, how is it possible that I can believe that it is in the contemplation of this House to plunge into war? I cannot believe it, nor refrain from stating this impression to the people, that all this clamor about war is a pretence, under which, and under the fears which war naturally excites, to rivet this destructive embargo upon the country. How is it possible to read the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury and not inevitably reach that conclusion? In his annual report that officer tells us expressly, that "if, however, the embargo and non-intercourse are to have equal continuance with the belligerent edicts, indefinite as that is; if it be determined to rely exclusively on that measure, and, at all events, not to risk a war on account of those aggressions, preparations for war will become useless, and the extraordinary expenses need not be incurred. In that case, the expenditure for the year 1809 ought not to exceed the sum of thirteen millions of dollars, which, as has been stated, is requisite for the support of the present establishment." And again: "It is certainly only with a view to war, either immediate or contemplated, that it will become necessary to resort, at least to any considerable extent, to extraordinary sources of supply." Now, sir, when a most influential officer of this Government, no less than the head of the Treasury, expressly tells us as he does, that "in case of war, new resources, to an amount yet unascertained, must be resorted to;" when he also tells us, that "if non-intercourse and embargo are to have an indefinite continuance, it will not become necessary to resort, at least to any considerable extent, to extraordinary sources of supply; such resort being only necessary in case of war, immediate, or contemplated;" and when this House do not provide any new resources, either of loans or revenues; when it leaves the Treasury in that state in which the Secretary tells us it may be left, in case indefinite non-intercourse and embargo are resolved upon, and precisely in that state in which the same Secretary tells us it must not be left, in case war be the determination; how is it possible that any other conclusion can be imagined than this, that war is not, but that an indefinite embargo is, contemplated? Sir, these are conclusions concerning intentions from public documents compared with public conduct. If gentlemen choose to fly into a passion on every such exposition, all I can say is, that I shall not follow their example, nor be deterred by their exhibition of wounded feelings, from performing an official duty. An attempt has been made to pervert an observation of mine so as to imply a doubt of the courage of the officers appointed to the new Army. Nothing could be more unfounded than such an attempt. Concerning few of those appointments do I know anything; and of those few officers with whom I have personal acquaintance, there are some in the propriety of whose appointment I certainly concur. The only tendency of my argument was to show that a party army, whose officers were exclusively taken from a prevailing sect, was not likely to produce that union to which gentlemen so anxiously invited. If a foreign war was seriously contemplated, the necessity of an union among all parties, would induce naturally, as I thought, a different course of conduct. Such a course as, by practically removing party distinctions, would unite all in that common confidence which is the only assurance of strength and vigor in hostile operations. When I found the principle of party exclusion adopted as the rule of appointments, the conclusion I drew from the fact was, that the Army was destined only to effect party purposes, and not at all to meet a common enemy—for, with all the prejudices which exist against Federal men, as they are called, there is no need of argument to convince even the majority of this House that they are, in general, men, who, when their country is in danger, will be found and will be trusted, in the front ranks of our armies.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) asked if I intended to represent this House as the dupe of the Executive. Certainly I drew no conclusion of that kind. But, sir, with respect to this House, I confess I know not how to express my opinion. To my mind, it is a political nondescript. It acts, and reasons, and votes, and performs all the operations of an animated being, and yet, judging from my own perceptions, I cannot refrain from concluding that all great political questions are settled somewhere else other than on this floor. [The SPEAKER remarked, that it was wholly improper to make reflections on the House.] If the Speaker means that I have not a right to state facts, and leave the people to make reflections upon them, I must appeal from his decision. [The SPEAKER said that it was not within the rules of Parliamentary proceeding to permit a gentleman on the floor to accuse the House of improper motives.] I am saying nothing about motives. In reply to a gentleman, who asks how I intended to represent the House, I am only about to describe what I know concerning it, and to show how I arrived at the conclusion, that great political questions were settled somewhere else, other than on this floor. The fact to which I allude happened on the day when the enforcing embargo law passed. On that day, before the House was called into a Committee of the Whole upon the bill, I was informed that it had been resolved somewhere, I know not where, nor by whom, that the House should be called into Committee of the Whole immediately upon that bill—that it was to be passed in one day through all the remaining stages—that the bill was then actually engrossed, or engrossing, and that after it was so passed, a bill was to be proposed and passed for calling an extraordinary session of Congress in May next. This was stated to me, previous to the going into Committee of the Whole on the enforcing embargo bill, as the course settled. Well—what happened? Why, agreeably to the information I had received, we were immediately called into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill. We did pass it, through all the remaining stages at one session, notwithstanding the multitude of its provisions, the greatness of the principle and consequences it involved. So far my previous information proved correct. It will also be recollected, that in the course of the nocturnal session on that bill, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMITH) did state it as his intention to bring forward a bill for a meeting of Congress in May, and accordingly, the next day he introduced the motion, which was the foundation of the present bill. Thus again my previous information was proved by the event accurate. The minuteness of this prophecy, and the precision of its fulfillment, satisfies my mind of the correctness of the opinion before stated, that although we debate great questions on this floor, that they are sometimes, at least, settled somewhere else. A circumstance strongly corroborative of this opinion is a fact, which happened in the debate on motion for the committee of inquiry, which preceded this bill. The idea of a session in May, was strongly opposed by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS). In reply to whom, my colleague (Mr. BACON) expressed his surprise at his opposition, and said expressly, "that he had given some votes, in the understanding that there was to be an extra session in May; that, if there was not, all he could say, for one, was, 'that he was taken in.'" [Mr. BACON said, that he meant only to be understood as having given such votes, from his own impression that there would be an extra session, and not intending to express any previous agreement.] If such were the intention of my colleague, I do not wish to avail myself of the peculiarity of the expression. At the time of his uttering it, I did consider it as a strong corroborative circumstance of the fact, that all the proceedings concerning the enforcing embargo law and the new session had been arranged somewhere else, previous to their being brought into debate on this floor. Indeed, how is it possible for any man to believe otherwise, when he considers, and not only the previous information received, which could hardly have been so minutely fulfilled, unless such previous agreement subsisted, and also, when he considers the rapid and unexampled manner, in which it was pressed through all its stages, notwithstanding all the violence of the opposition, and the solid arguments urged against its principles?

While on this topic, I cannot refrain from observing on a remark made by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS.) He said the minority had no right to complain of the manner in which the enforcing embargo law was passed, inasmuch as that they had suffered it to go through the Committee of the Whole without a single observation. In reply, I must declare that I do complain that our privileges were violated. I maintain that it is a right which belongs to every member of this House to have a fair and suitable opportunity of debating every question of great national importance; that, unless he has previous notice, that it is the intention of the majority to deviate from the usual course of business, he has a right to choose that stage of the bill in which he conceives his objections to it can be most forcibly urged. Upon the question of engrossment, or upon that of the final passage, he has a right to have a fair opportunity to be heard; for, at these stages, the great principles of the bill can be the most advantageously discussed. Now, we had not such an opportunity upon either the engrossment or final passage of the enforcing embargo law. In this instance I do not hesitate to say, that the rights of the members of this House, and, through them, the rights of this people, were grossly violated. Who could have possibly imagined that a bill of the length and importance of the enforcing embargo law, considering also the state of feeling manifested in some parts of the country in relation to that subject, could have been permitted to go from a Committee of the Whole, through its final passage, at one sitting? Upon that law I was extremely anxious to have expressed my sentiments. I had taken occasion, when the resolution for the raising of fifty thousand volunteers was under debate, to state a Constitutional objection to the previous supplement-any embargo laws, to which I could find, in my mind, no answer. I had hoped some gentleman would have condescended to reply to that objection, but no notice had been taken, except by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) who only asserted that similar powers to those to which I had objected, had been exercised under preceding Administrations.

Mr. EPPES inquired whether Mr. QUINCY was in order to discuss a bill which was already passed, under a question like that now before the House.

The SPEAKER decided that he was.

Mr. EPPES appealed from his decision.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS wished that the gentleman from Massachusetts might be permitted to go on; and said he, if there be not talent enough in the House to refute his arguments, in the name of God, let us stand convicted.

Mr. EPPES withdrew his appeal.

Mr. GARDENIER asked whether it was consistent with the rules of the House that, when the Speaker had decided a question of order, and an appeal had been made from his decision on the application of any gentleman, the member appealing had a right to withdraw his appeal?

The SPEAKER said that, according to usual parliamentary proceedings, it was correct.

Mr. QUINCY continued.—I did not intend to argue the unconstitutionality of the enforcing embargo law. I was only illustrating my sense of the violation of the rights of the members on that occasion, by showing that I had been precluded from urging the objections I was prepared to offer against it through the lateness of the hour and the utter incompetency of all, after the fatigue of eighteen hours uninterrupted session, either to hear or to speak upon any subject. The Constitutional objections to that bill were great, and, as I believe, unanswerable. The haste with which it was passed, and the little opportunity given for discussion of its principles, were little adapted to satisfy the public that the bill would bear a thorough examination. The connexion of these observations with the bill under debate, is intimate and palpable. The reasons I urge against this bill are, that by providing for a meeting of Congress in May, without providing a limitation of the embargo law, you, in fact, leave the next Congress in the same bonds to the Executive power, in which this House at present stands; that, if it be your real intention to raise the embargo after May, as this extra session seems intended to intimate to the people, you ought at once to limit it, otherwise the people ought not to be satisfied; but to examine into the Constitutional objections to those laws: if these appear to the people and to the State Legislatures as they do to my mind, it is their duty—to do what? To rise in insurrection? No, sir. To break the bonds of union? No, sir; but to take the Constitution, that great charter of their liberties, into their consideration, and to strengthen and support its principles by vindicating them from violation. Do gentlemen really think it "treason" to invite intelligent men, the natural guardians of their own and of the people's rights, to take your laws and bring them to the touchstone of the Constitution? We have gained little by our independence, if this liberty belong not to us. Sir, we perform a high and imperious duty, when those who believe that the Constitution is violated, say to the people that such is their opinion, and call them to an examination of your laws with that reference. All we say to them is, put not off this inquiry until June, under the apprehension the embargo will then be removed. Look to your rights; if they are violated, remonstrate. Maintain the only bond of your union, the Constitution; let it not be broken for the purpose of making of its commercial power an instrument of hostility; for such a purpose the commercial power was never granted. Gentlemen strive to represent those who use this language as hostile to the Union: nothing can be less founded in truth. Hostility it may be to the principles of an Administration which, for the sake of maintaining a favorite system, seem to value as nothing all those Constitutional principles which the wisdom of our fathers erected as barriers round our liberties. Suppose the present or any future Congress to pass any law, not only manifestly unconstitutional, but so oppressive upon the mass of the people that it is impossible to wait upon the slow processes of the Judiciary. The case may certainly be supposed. I ask, what is the remedy? Can there be any other than Constitutional remonstrance? And how can this be effected but by calling the people to examine their rights, and the alleged invasion of them? With respect to the feelings and sentiments relative to these laws in the part of the country which I represent, I do not believe that this House realizes the nature and extent of them. The doubt concerning their constitutionality is not confined to men of one particular party. I have reason to believe that a very great number of the intelligent men who are supposed to differ from me in political sentiments, do agree in questioning their validity. I feel, as strongly as my colleague, (Mr. BACON,) the hazardous nature of the present crisis. A course of events is advancing upon us, which, I fear no human power can control; and in what it will terminate certainly no human foresight can tell. But this crisis is not to be evaded by tampering with it, nor by obstinate adherence to the system which is the origin of this excitement. Let this scheme of coercion be abdicated—if it be necessary, go to war—let Government designate the nation with whom we are to fight, show the justice and policy of hostilities, and bring the resources of the nation into operation.

But I conjure gentlemen not to sport with the present state of things. I know there does exist in the majority of this House, an honest mistake concerning the sentiments of the people in the Eastern States. It is thought that discontent with the embargo arises solely from party opposition. Let me assure gentlemen the case is far otherwise. On this account have I spoken; gentlemen think that the hope of a session in May will give content to that people. Be assured it will not; they have too deep and universal an interest in this subject to be deluded into a postponement of the consideration of their Constitutional rights. If Congress rise without limiting the embargo, they will not have reason to expect its repeal in May, nor will they act on that expectation. When the session in May arrives, there will be nothing to choose between but the old alternatives, embargo or war; and an attempt will be made to continue the present system six months longer. Now, I do not believe it is within the physical power of New England to endure it for that period.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said he rose to make a few observations in relation to his individual conduct on the subject of the supplementary embargo law, as the gentleman had said that his rights, and through him the rights of the people, had been violated. The gentlemen seemed to charge the majority of the House, (said Mr. W.,) and me as one of that majority, as having had an understanding out of doors that we would pass the bill through at one session. [Mr. QUINCY said that he had not considered the gentleman as one of the majority.] I am very glad that the gentleman exempts me; but in justice to the majority with whom I acted, I feel myself compelled to make a few remarks. That gentleman ought to be the last man in this House to make the accusation which he has made. The gentleman himself has commenced the custom of introducing private conversations before you, Mr. Speaker, and therefore I may be permitted to refer to them. The gentleman did a few days ago, at the fire-side, advocate the English parliamentary mode of proceeding; and declared that we must adopt the plan of fixing a day for taking the question, and sitting it out. Now, sir, when the gentleman advocates that practice, how can he say that his rights are injured? So far as I know anything about that question, I do believe that there was no understanding. If you will cast your mind back to the day previous to the day's session referred to, a celebrated motion of a gentleman from Vermont (Mr. CHITTENDEN) to repeal the embargo laws was moved for, and it was agreed to take it up. When we got into a Committee of the Whole, sir, we could not do anything; we were compelled to dissolve the Committee; we could not keep a quorum to do the thing which we had taken the yeas and nays seven different times to get at. What next, sir? Did not gentlemen on the opposite side come here the next day with a perfect willingness to sit out the question. I never heard a whisper of sitting out the question till that kind of conduct was adopted which was calculated to teach the majority how to act. Gentlemen in the minority all went to dinner, leaving one gentleman behind them to call for the yeas and nays and make motions till they came back. They really forced us to it, sir. They made their preparations; and accordingly they had everything here necessary to support them through this fiery trial. They had all the good things of this life brought here for their suppers. When that course of proceeding was adopted, there was a kind of instantaneous determination of the majority of the House to take the question. The first man who suggested the idea to me was a gentleman who was disposed not to sit it out. And what is this mighty charge which the gentleman has made? That the bill was passed through the House at one session. I deny it, sir. The bill had been before you many days. It was discussed one entire day in Committee of the Whole, and recommitted. The amendments reported by the select committee lay on the table at least three days; and the question would not then have been taken but for the determination of the opponents of the bill that the question should not be taken. I speak what every gentleman must be sensible is true. And yet, sir, the nation is to be told that its dearest rights were violated by passing through a bill at one session. You know, Mr. Speaker, that such is not the fact; that the bill had been under discussion several days, and the subject of it for many weeks. It is still more strange that these sort of objections should come from a quarter of the House which believes that the interest of the nation would be promoted by the adoption of the parliamentary practice. No gentleman opened his lips to discuss the provisions of the bill where they ought to have been discussed, in Committee of the Whole. The passage of it in one session is made such a monstrous bugbear, when not one syllable was said against it in Committee of the Whole! There was a propriety—I may say an imperious necessity that the bill should be passed as expeditiously as possible, resulting from the circumstance that in none of the preceding supplementary acts was there a provision requiring certain vessels sailing coastwise to give bond. The omission, though glaring, was not perceived when the last supplementary bill passed. If you will call upon the Secretary of the Treasury, he will inform you that we were losing from twenty to thirty vessels a week in consequence of this single loophole. This was an imperious reason why the House should act on the subject immediately; and when the House met that morning there was no disposition to force a question on it had not gentlemen in the opposition prepared themselves for a long session. Why, sir, the night before, when the Committee of the Whole on the celebrated resolution of a gentleman from Vermont was broken up for want of a quorum, as I was going home, I met some of the gentlemen in the minority coming back—"What, (said one), have you adjourned? we have been home, and bracing up; we have had plenty of good wine, and were going back to sit you out." And now, forsooth, the gentlemen accuse us of precipitation!

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said he rose to notice some of the observations made by the gentleman from Massachusetts to-day, which were calculated to do away the highly reprehensible remarks he made on yesterday. Yet notwithstanding the avowed object, he had indulged himself in further animadversions, and added to that feeling which had been so unjustifiably excited. The gentleman commenced by asking whether the ground which he occupied was solid; whether it would bear the scrutinizing eye of reflection. And what was his ground, sir? It was this: that the House had acted under a deception, touching the motives of the Administration in recommending the embargo. Sir, I answer, that the ground is not solid; it is a quagmire, in which every plunge he makes sinks him still deeper, until he is swallowed up with ignominy, exciting no compassion for his fate; and yet he complains of the severity of the style with which his remarks were treated. Sir, it was proper that so infamous a charge, coming from a quarter like that, where submission to everything, and resistance to nothing is characteristic, should be repelled in the way it was; it was too gross a censure, too flagitious a libel to pass with impunity, notwithstanding it was uttered in this sanctuary, whose security the gentleman has carefully availed himself of, and which he interposes as a shield to his dastardly attacks. We were imposed upon, he alleges, touching the motives of Administration, and were instrumental in deceiving the people; and yet, tools and sycophants that we are, he will not rest until he drags us before the nation, and exposes us to its vengeance. When to all this abuse it is added, that we are caught in the toils of a narrow policy which we persist in from mere shame—that we wanted to frighten Mr. Rose—cast ourselves into the arms of Bonaparte—join the coalition against England. When such accusations are made here, and gentlemen feel wounded at the unjust imputations, I ask, sir, ought they not to inflict a little wholesome chastisement on the author by casting the foul charges back in the teeth of him who made them? If any gentleman thinks it no insult to be accused of political imposture, avowing ostensible motives inconsistent with the real ones, I am proud to differ from him. I have this morning endeavored to show that the charges were false, and whether I have succeeded or not I am willing to leave to others; I heartily join in the appeal to their decision. But the gentleman says, the “bearing” of his argument was not noticed by any one except his colleague. The answer of his honorable colleague was confined exclusively to the tendency of such revolutionizing, heart-burning appeals to the people, having for their object hostile opposition to the laws enacted by this Government. Thus, sir, by this confession his motives are exposed to the world, for that was the “bearing” which the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) so eloquently noticed. The gentleman talked of “Billingsgate,” and pray, sir, if it does not consist in abusing the President of the United States under the privileges of this House, accusing him of duplicity, political perfidy, and falsehood, in what does it consist? The gentleman himself indulged in an “ale-house slang,” derogatory to the dignity of this House; for the Executive of this nation, as such, is entitled to respect, and it is scandalous here, covered by the canopy of the Constitution, to assail his reputation, accuse, try, condemn, and execute it in one breath. But the gentleman says he shrinks not from comparison with any one. Sir, most certainly he can lose nothing on comparison with any man; notwithstanding he would gain much by comparing him with a gentleman. He has made attacks on the Executive and this House which I have endeavored to prove were unfounded. A formal deliberate preconcerted speech of two hours length was made by the member, predicated solely on the basis that this House had been deceived themselves, and had deceived the people, and were attempting still further to practise deception. Can the reputation of a man who does these things in times like this, in times of great and accumulating peril, be injured by anything that can be added to what himself has said? I think not. The member says the sting of his remark is truth. It is that that wounds, and, because of it, he feels pity for us. Sir, I do not even feel pity for him. I feel contempt, sheer contempt, and nothing more. His remarks have no sting, sir; they cannot wound. The shafts of his malice are blunt; they will not penetrate; they fall harmless at the feet of those against whom they are pointed; they are steeped in falsehood; they have no sting; there is no truth in them. We have been accused of raising a cry of war—talking about going to war—and, that all is imposture; and the liberty of replying to such charges is denied us. Sir, we are bound to support the Constitution; and are told that, regardless of our oaths, we violate it by raising an army to provide places for our partisans, or to put down our opponents by intimidation; and, in the next breath, we are entreated to avoid passion. And is this no cause of anger? A great complaint is made by him at the passing of the last embargo law at one sitting. And for this, the people are to be excited. We are now in the third month of the session, and on every question except motions to adjourn, that admit not of debate, the embargo system has been thrust into discussion. “Embargo” has been bandied from one side of the House to the other, to and fro, until every gentleman was tired of the game; and because we did not eke out a few weeks more in talking, another cry is raised. Sir, I heard the member from Massachusetts, a few days before the law passed, observe in private conversation—for it seems to be in order now to refer to it—that we could not get on with business unless we adopted the rule in the British Parliament, of discussing subjects on the day fixed for them, and deciding them that night; and, from other remarks then made by him, I did, indeed, believe he was an American in heart and sentiment. But I was much mistaken, sir. When I see Members sounding false alarms of danger, for the purpose of promoting seditious oppositions, inflammatory resolutions, legislative excitements, and open rebellion, and while driving in this wicked career, covering themselves with the mantle of the fair fame of our beloved WASHINGTON—prostituting all his patriotism, and his virtues to the vile purposes of their aggrandizement, I am struck with wonder and astonishment. When I mark their course, and remember the salutary advice of his excellent valedictory—from which I will read some extracts—the enormity of their crime, and their barefaced effrontery, become more conspicuous. I wish I dared trespass upon the patience of the House by reading the whole, for it is peculiarly applicable to the times:

Extra Session.

“The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is, also, now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad; of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But, as it is easy to foresee that from different causes, and from different quarters, much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively, though often covertly and insidiously directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as the Palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whoever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.”

I can almost imagine that I see the shade of this hero, indignantly frowning on that attempt which is so much deprecated by him.

“The name of American, which belongs to you, in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have in a common cause fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint councils, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes.

“But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here every portion of country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

“The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common Government, finds, in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefitting by the agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in a like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications, by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort: And what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength, or from an apostate and unnatural connexion with any foreign Power, must be intrinsically precarious.

“In this sense it is, that your Union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.”

The Union is threatened with a separation. The handbills struck off and circulated throughout New England are calculated for that purpose. Indeed so daring have the faction become, that in New York, or Philadelphia, a handbill was posted up advising—“The Potomac the boundary—the Negro States by themselves!”

“These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common Government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case, were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organisation of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue of the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who in any quarter may endeavor to weaken its bands.

“In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—Northern and Southern—Atlantic and Western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence, within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart-burnings which spring from these misrepresentations—they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection.”

Have you not seen an attempt made by a Senator of the United States, (Mr. PICKENS,) in a public letter addressed to the Legislature of his State, to impress the idea that the Southern people are inimical to commerce?

“To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a Government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts, can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances in all times have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a Constitution and Government better calculated than your former for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This Government—the offspring of our own choice;

Extra Session.

uninfluenced and unawed; adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation; completely free, in its principles; in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy; and containing, within itself, a provision for its own amendment—has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political system is, the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But, the Constitution which at any time exists, till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government, presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government."

The majority must govern, sir, or there is an end of Republican Government in this country; and despotism, under the garb of monarchy, or whatever other name it may assume, will occupy its stead.

"All obstructions to the execution of the laws"—let the member and his Massachusetts Legislature take this to themselves—"all obstructions to the execution of the laws; all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction; to give it an artificial and extraordinary force; to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of a party—often a small, but artful and enterprising minority of the community—and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public Administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans, digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

"However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely in the course of time and things to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government—destroying, afterwards, the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

"Towards the preservation of your Government, and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext.

"I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the State, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you, in the most solemn manner, against the baneful effects of the spirit of party, generally. It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public Administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foment, occasionally, riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which find a facilitated access to the Government itself, through the channels of party passions. Thus, the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another."

The door is opened in Boston, sir, otherwise the appeal of a foreign Power would not have found its way there. Why was it sent there? Because it is the focus of faction, and from thence the firebrands of discord will be scattered into every quarter of the country. The speeches of the member will hold the match to the combustible materials which have been heaped up there, and the heart-felt satisfaction will be his, that he put the torch to the pile which is to consume the Constitution of this Union.

The whole of this excellent letter of the venerated WASHINGTON comes directly in contact with the course now pursued. Unfounded jealousies are excited, false insinuations are made against the Government, and yet, the men pursuing this holy vocation profess to be treading in the footsteps of WASHINGTON! Repeat the embargo, they cry, and trade. As to national honor, it is but a name—an empty sound. The love of country does not warm their bosoms. Liberty—and at the sound of liberty the blood beats high in the veins of every virtuous American—has no charms for them. Gold is the god they worship, and they would wallow in the mire of debasement to extract one grain from its filthy sands. The remarks of such men as the member from Massachusetts deserve that all the thunders of this nation's wrath should burst upon their heads. They should be riven by the lightnings of public indignation, and be blasted forever.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said that it was with some embarrassment he rose to address the House on this occasion; as the duty he owed to himself and to his country would impel him to notice some remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) calculated to excite sensations which ought not to be indulged in this House, and to extort replies that may encroach on that decorum which ought to be observed on this floor, ought not to be violated even in the presence of this respectable audience;—remarks, said he, which are not founded on facts, or supported by any sound argument, which must be the effusion of a disordered brain, or malignant heart, which admit of no serious investigation, and do not merit and cannot receive any other reply than a direct and positive denial, accompanied with that contempt which such misrepresentations justly deserve. The gentleman told you, when he had found some explanation of what he had said necessary, that he had not alluded to particular facts, but meant to bring together a group of motives, by which he conceived the Administration and the majority of this House, as I understood him, to be governed. This group of motives must be the gentleman's own impressions, and not being derived from facts, as he admits, must be considered as the offspring either of ignorance, or what is more probable, of a deliberate and malicious preconceived plan to usher forth those misrepresentations, knowing them to be without foundation, at this critical moment, for the express purpose of deluding the public mind. Take the gentleman on his own ground and this must be the conclusion. He did not allude to facts, and yet he pretends to give the motives by which Government and the majority are actuated. He says the majority have acted under a deception—the Administration had other motives than those avowed. He advances no proof to support these assertions. The result must, therefore, be such as has been stated—a deliberate scheme to mislead the public opinion on those subjects—to make an impression abroad that the majority of this House have been guided in their proceedings like automaton—that they are not governed by their own judgments, and do not act from the convictions of their own minds, but are directed by some invisible hand, some unseen influence, which, though alluded to, he dare not name. These are in substance the infamous and unfounded insinuations made by that gentleman. I care not how he may attempt to envelop them in dubious language, or attempt to fritter them away by explanations. The turpitude of heart that produced them, remains the same. If the gentleman had come forward openly, and told this House that the members composing the majority had no sentiments of their own; that possibly they do not mean to destroy their country (as he has been pleased to admit) but are made to do so by the direction of some other controlling power, I should then think he might have some claim to candor, that possibly he believed what he said, and was ready to hazard not only his reputation, but also his feelings (if indeed he has any, of which I now entertain some doubt) and even his person in what he had asserted. [Mr. QUINCY wished to explain.] I wish no explanation from the gentleman, said Mr. C., after what he has already said, and the frequent samples of explanations he has heretofore given. There is no other member in the House, sir, to whom I would not concede the floor for the purpose of explanation; but there is a point beyond which, so long as I have a seat in this House, I will not suffer my feelings to be injured, nor my motives to be impeached with impunity.

I did, sir, not hear all the remarks made by the gentleman on yesterday, and I shall only notice such of those as I did hear, as he seemed to consider of most importance, in order to add my evidence to what has already been said by others on this subject, to show that they are destitute of the slightest foundation in fact. It would not be difficult to prove, from circumstances, that they are a fabrication of misrepresentations, prepared at this moment for the express purpose of influencing certain elections which are to take place during the ensuing spring, in the quarter from which that gentleman comes. Hence he thinks, in order to cover his own views, he will be the first to cry out “the object of the majority is to influence these elections.” But the gentleman’s veil is too thin, it cannot conceal his designs; they are distinctly seen through it. The object is, at the hazard of everything, to deceive and mislead the honest part of society in that quarter, to promote the views of a certain faction or party there, who are evidently sworn enemies to the Government of this country—who are connected directly or indirectly with a foreign Power, that of Great Britain, and who use every means in their power to support her interest and increase her influence in this country, at the hazard and expense of the dearest rights and best interests of this nation. That such a party exists cannot now be doubted (and the gentleman from Massachusetts resides in the midst of it) who consider their fate intimately connected with that of Great Britain—who seem to have congenial sympathies with her—feel her success as their glory, and would consider her fall as their destruction—who use all the means in their power to excite her to a perseverance in her destructive measures against this country, and prevent her, if possible, from yielding or accommodating existing differences with your Government—who become desperate in proportion as the prospect of accommodation seems to approach, and represent to her in the strongest colors, their dangers in such an event—that if she settles her differences with you at at this time, without making you first yield to her terms, they, as her party in this country, sink into obscurity and contempt forever. Hence their desperate exertions to convince Great Britain that this country cannot long persevere in her present measures. Proofs could be adduced to support this statement, that must produce conviction in every discerning mind. I shall instance one fact, which of itself is conclusive on this point. The late publication of the famous letter from Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney. This insidious production, which has been substantially contradicted by Mr. Pinkney’s answer, was ushered into the public prints by that faction, for the purpose of making false impressions on the minds of the American people, favorable to the views of Great Britain. And yet, sir, we are told by the gentleman, that the members of this House were blustering and scolding about the letter of a British Minister. [Mr. QUINCY said he did not refer to that letter.] I am certainly willing, said Mr. C., that the gentleman should deny what he said, though I wish for no explanation from him. I certainly understood him as referring to this letter. [Mr. QUINCY said he alluded to another letter.] I will, said Mr. C., state the gentleman’s words, and the House will judge whether this was not the very letter he alluded to, however he may choose now to change the reference. He said “that this House was scolding and blustering about a letter of the British Minister.” The letter now in question had a few days ago been laid before this House, and some spirited animadversions were made upon it by several members; no other letter of a British Minister had been noticed in the House, to my knowledge, for some time; to my mind, therefore, the inference was inevitable, that this was the letter alluded to. And how the gentleman could introduce or mean any other is to me incomprehensible. However, the fact of the letter having been published is the same, whether he alluded to it or not, and will equally answer my purpose. It was an official letter, and must have been obtained either from the British Minister or from your own Government. It is known to every one it was not obtained from the latter; it must, therefore, have been furnished by the former. It was first published in Boston, accompanied by comments calculated to inflame the minds of the American people against their own Government, at a time when our public affairs were in the most critical situation. This single fact is sufficient to prove the existence of this party, and their connexion with, and anxious desire to support the views of the British Cabinet. It may be proper, sir, that I should state here, that in speaking of this faction or party, who are a disgrace to the American character, I do not mean to include all those called Federalists. No, sir, there are many of them for whom I have the highest respect, believing them real friends to their country. There are many members in this House for whose character I entertain the highest esteem, from a conviction that they act from pure motives; but there are some who do not come within this description.

But, sir, to return for a moment to the gentleman's remarks. He told you this House passed the embargo law under a deception, as to the motives that induced the measure to be recommended to the Executive. This old and hackneyed charge, already refuted and contradicted time after time, I did not expect would again be brought before the House. But it is now renewed, though destitute of the slightest foundation, for the express purpose of giving a new impulse to misrepresentations, in the quarter from which that gentleman comes. There is no man can with truth deny, that when the embargo law was passed, this House had all the information on the subject the Government possessed, and could not, therefore, act under a deception. The motives alleged for its passage were the real motives, and there is not a single fact can be adduced to show that there was any other object in view than those avowed. It was adopted first as a measure of precaution to save our property and seamen. It was relied on also as a coercive measure, in regard to the belligerents, so far as depriving them of our supplies would operate in that way, and was so stated by many members on this floor during the passage of the law, but was not considered as a hostile measure: and the belligerents had no right to view it in that light, as we have an undoubted right to regulate our own commerce or abandon it altogether, without giving just cause of war to any nation. How the gentleman, therefore, without the shadow of proof, could bring forward such serious charges, is more than extraordinary; and indeed it does appear to argue a degree of arrogance little becoming the character of an honorable member of the National Legislature, to assert, as has been done, that a large majority of Congress have acted under a deception, have been led as it were blindfold, to give their assent to the measures that have been adopted for more than a year; as if no one had penetration enough to perceive the real motives that guided our councils but this gentleman alone. This opinion he will probably be permitted to enjoy, without a single rival on earth.

You are next told by the same gentleman, that the object of the majority in laying the embargo by a law unlimited in its duration, was to vest the whole power of regulating commerce in the hands of the President; and he says, if it was intended to coerce, to reach the vitals of Great Britain, it was proper to do so. On this latter point indeed, the gentleman seems to feel very sensibly; to be tremblingly alive to the slightest pressure that may be made on his innocent and unoffending friend, Great Britain; as if, when you coerced her, you pressed on his interest in the tenderest point; and when you "reached her vitals" you touched his heart's blood. It was, therefore, wrong, in his opinion, to adopt any measure that would bear hard on her interest. This doctrine may suit the people that gentleman represents, those called the Essex Junto, but it will not be relished by the great body of the American people. No, sir, they will hear it with that indignation it so justly merits. A very slight attention to facts will show the majority had no such object in view in laying the embargo, as that so untruly ascribed to them by the gentleman, of placing the whole power in the hands of the Executive. The first proposition made by the majority was to lay the embargo, by a joint resolution, as had formerly been done, which would, it is presumed, have left the power in the two Houses to rescind it at pleasure. This mode was opposed by the gentlemen on the other side of the House, by that gentleman and his political friends; and to accommodate those opposed to this mode, a law was substituted in its place. This proves that the majority had no disposition whatever to vest the power in the hands of the President, and that this charge, like many others, is without the slightest foundation in truth.

But the gentleman says that he formerly urged an argument against the constitutionality of the embargo laws, viz: "that you cannot repeal them without the consent of the President, if there be twelve members of the Senate against such repeal—that is, that the President and twelve members of the Senate may prevent their repeal"—which argument, he says, has not been answered. I believe, sir, it has not been even noticed, much less answered, and it would still remain unnoticed by me, if the gentleman did not seem to attach so much importance to it, that possibly some might conclude that there was some weight in the objection. I did not, sir, indeed suppose that any gentleman, however conceited he might feel, could seriously think that the members of this House were obliged to answer, and enter into a logical discussion of every quibble, however silly, he might choose to start. The argument deemed so important by the gentleman has not been urged, or even mentioned, so far as I recollect, by any other of his own party. It has not been thought worthy of notice by the newspapers of the same party. It has, therefore, justly been considered by the majority as not meriting an answer, and passed in silence, as many other unmeaning quibbles from the same quarter, dubbed with the name of arguments, have been.

Every man of ordinary understanding, and possessed of any information, must know, that the embargo law is on the same footing in regard to its repeal, with every other law. You cannot repeal or pass any law without the assent of the President, unless two-thirds of both Houses concur. The same objection, therefore, made to the embargo law being unlimited in its duration, would equally apply to every other law that it might be thought any event would ever render expedient to repeal. According to the gentleman's doctrine, all your laws ought to be limited in their duration, lest the President, or two-thirds of the Senate, would not agree to repeal them. This absurdity, to which the gentleman's argument would lead, was seen by every one who examined the subject, and an answer was therefore considered totally superfluous. But, sir, what foundation is there for all this jealousy with regard to the President's giving his assent to an act repealing the embargo laws? Is there any part of his conduct hitherto calculated to induce a belief that he would refuse his approbation to an act passed by both Houses of Congress? Is it candid or liberal at this time to argue, because he has the power to refuse his assent, that he would, on such occasion, exercise that power, when he never has, during the whole course of his Administration, now near a close, in any one instance, done so? Does it not prove the weakness of the cause which gentlemen advocate; the wretched shifts to which they are put for what they call arguments; and the futility, and even absurdity, of the objections they make? It certainly does; and further, tends strongly to prove, that there is some object at the bottom of all this different from those avowed; it seems to cry aloud, "there is something rotten in the state of Denmark."

Another charge is brought forward, sir, which would be a very serious one if true, that when the army of six thousand men was authorized to be raised, your Administration did not design them to fight foreign nations, but your own citizens, that they were intended only to enforce the embargo, though the contrary was avowed. There is something in this charge so insidious, and I might add, so base and malignant, that it must be considered as springing from the same disorganizing and malicious disposition which actuates that party, or rather faction, to which I have already alluded; and stimulates them to issue forth one false statement after another in continued succession, in order to keep up the public delusion in that quarter, and effect, at the expense of truth and every principle of justice, their electioneering purposes. These attempts hitherto, there is reason to believe, were likely to fail. The publication of official documents and State papers, from time to time, refuted their misrepresentations, and were likely to confound all their exertions to mislead the people, who began to see clearly that their Government was not affected by any foreign influence; that they acted solely with a single view to the interests of their own country. Opposed by truths too powerful to resist, the party resort to this as the forlorn hope, as the last desperate effort, to support their nefarious schemes. When the national councils were making preparations to resist foreign aggressions of every kind, from whatever nation they might proceed, there were no means left them to carry on their system of delusion, but to tell the people, (in the very face of the clearest proofs to the contrary,) those preparations are not made against your enemies, but against yourselves. This charge must be too absurd to gain credit with any man whose mind has not been already poisoned against the truth. There is scarcely a child in the nation, who can read, possessed of so little sense and information as to believe it. There is no doubt the Government would use all the proper means in their power to preserve peace with foreign nations, if it could be done consistent with the interest and honor of this country. They can have no wish for war. But, at the present crisis, it is certainly necessary to be prepared for it, in case it should become inevitable. For this purpose, those troops were authorized to be raised to resist foreign aggression, not to enforce the embargo. The idea of using them to enforce the embargo laws—though it would have been a proper object—could not, at the time, have been entertained by any one. It was not then supposed there was any portion of the American people so corrupt, so totally lost to all sense of the duty they owe the nation, as to evade, much less openly oppose, the execution of the laws of the Union. It could not, therefore, have been thought necessary to provide for such a case. The assertion is indeed so destitute of the slightest foundation, that it would be surprising, if anything from that quarter could now surprise us, that it should be uttered on this floor.

But what reason does the gentleman assign for entertaining this opinion—one as extraordinary as it is futile. He says no Federalists are appointed to offices in this new army, and therefore he concludes, that their only object is to enforce the embargo. Though the statement as to appointments is not true in fact to the extent asserted, yet, if it were, how could it prove the gentleman's position? Did he mean to insinuate that all the Federalists would oppose the execution of the embargo laws during the time they remained in force, and on that account are not to be trusted as officers? I trust he did not; and I presume such is not the fact. I have reason to believe that there are many Federalists, who, though opposed to these laws, would aid in carrying them into complete execution so long as they continue to be the laws of the Union. Or, did the gentleman wish to be understood as saying that there were none but Federalists who could be intrusted to fight foreign nations? Hardy as that gentleman appears to be, and vain of his own importance, he could scarcely, I presume, utter such a sentiment without blushing. But, sir, could he suppose the Government would appoint the apologists of British outrage and aggression to defend their country against her armies? Certainly he could not, and the nation would not sanction such conduct. But the gentleman intimates that this House might have acted under honest motives, but the Administration did not mean to make war with foreign nations. Need he be told that the Executive cannot make war; that Congress alone is competent to declare it? Surely, I presume, he need not. And with what pretext, therefore, can he bring this charge against the President? The only object must be to cover himself from the imputation of charging the several members of this House, directly, with acting from improper motives, which charge, in fact, he does make indirectly. Many on this floor have declared, if the belligerents would not do us justice, they were determined to meet war with all its calamities, and that, in a very short time, rather than submit to their unjust edicts. The gentleman asserts that the majority are determined not to go to war. This is charging them with duplicity, with being actuated by motives different from those they avow. Such charge is unfounded and illiberal, and so far as it was intended to apply to me, is totally untrue, and one which, out of the sanctuary of these walls, neither that gentleman nor any other should make with impunity.

But it is further said, you have not spirit enough to fit out your small navy. Here we have a proof of what that gentleman means by spirit. He estimates it in proportion to the amount of money you appropriate. This it seems with him is the only test of true spirit. With regard to what most other men would call spirit, I presume, the gentleman may satisfy himself on a proper occasion, that almost any one of the minority possesses a sufficient degree of it to meet any demand he may make—though they will not contend with him on the score of that kind of spirit, which consists alone in appropriating money for unnecessary and useless purposes. [Mr. LYON wished to interrupt Mr. CAMPBELL, apparently for the purpose of calling him to order.] Sir, said Mr. CAMPBELL, there are certain persons who are entirely too low to be noticed, and are therefore secure. The remark in regard to not fitting out the whole Navy, when properly understood, has no weight or tendency whatever to prove the charge, that the majority have no intention to go to war, should the interest of their country require it. Those of the majority who opposed fitting out the whole Navy, did so because they were of opinion it would not constitute any substantial or efficient means of defending the country or annoying an enemy. They did not think a navy ought to be relied on for protection or offence. They therefore considered the large appropriation of money necessary for fitting out the whole Navy as a useless waste of our resources, which would add little or nothing to our security, or means of actual resistance, and which resources ought to be applied to other objects better calculated to prepare the nation, for both defensive and offensive measures, should the occasion require them. It was not therefore in any point of view an evidence of their indisposition to meet war, or make it if necessary, but related solely to the means by which they conceived it could most effectually be carried on.

Another ground is equally futile and destitute of foundation. He asks, when you have reduced your resources, and destroyed your revenue, will you go to war? He must have forgotten, that in the very breath before he had complained, because you did not expend millions on the Navy; now he says you have exhausted your resources. This is proof of the gentleman's consistency. But I might call on him to show a single instance in which, during the present Administration, the resources of the nation have been unnecessarily laid out—he could point out none—on the contrary, they have been husbanded by them most carefully, and, in consequence of their economical management, there is at this time more money in your Treasury, than ever there has been at any preceding period. On the first of this month there was in the Treasury sixteen million of dollars, which is amply sufficient to meet all expenditures authorized for the present year, and still leave a considerable balance in the Treasury to meet those of the ensuing year, together with the amount of revenue that shall during that period be received. Hence it is manifest, this allegation of your having exhausted your resources, is destitute of the slightest foundation in fact.

There was another remark made by that gentleman, which is only noticed because it shows a degree of assumed self-importance, and even insolence, which would hardly be expected from any gentleman, even though he affected to be the hero of the Essex Junto: With a kind of pantomimical exhibition, which is often performed on this floor, (I presume for our amusement,) he observed, "I cannot suffer any longer, the cry of war to go abroad." How, sir, did he suppose he could prevent it? Could he imagine even for a moment, in the midst of all his apparent mental delirium, that he had any control over the members composing the majority of this House? Such remarks can only expose the extreme weakness, or arrogance of those who make them, and will be treated by all who hear them with that indignant contempt which they so justly merit. Pursuing the same course of misrepresentation, it is further said, that this bill is a continuation of the system of deception of the Administration, intended to operate on the elections in the Spring. I must conclude, (which I regret very much to be under the necessity of doing,) there is more corruption and turpitude in the part of the country from which that gentleman comes, than in any with which I have ever been acquainted. He must in this instance judge of others by himself; for, as he adduces no facts to support his assertion, he must speak from a knowledge of what would, in similar circumstances, be his own views, and those of his political friends. There is no other ground upon which to account for this assertion—unless indeed you ascribe it to motives still more base, if possible. He produces no proofs to support his allegation; he must therefore, draw his inferences from analogy. He determines what objects he and his friends would have in view, and what course they would pursue in a similar case; and very sagaciously concludes, the majority of this House are actuated by like motives, and would act accordingly. In this conclusion he has been egregiously mistaken. There is not, I trust, among the majority, a single individual actuated by such unworthy motives; they have no other objects in view but those they avow—the charge is a base and unfounded slander, for which its author, if rules of decorum were duly regarded, would justly merit and receive the decided and public censure of this House. This course must and soon will be resorted to, and can alone prevent the necessity of replying to remarks, which are disgusting in the highest degree to every one who hears them—it alone will prevent introducing on this floor the language of Billingsgate, or the courtly style of the oyster bench, as has been done by the same gentleman. He observed the language used by some gentlemen who answered him, resembled that of Billingsgate, and that he never sat down with fishermen, or took degrees at an oyster bench. If he has not yet, sir, taken his degrees, I have no doubt, he soon will receive that honor, with universal consent—for he certainly has been a very apt scholar, and must have made great proficiency in the acquisition of their sentiments, as well as their language. He has given proofs of it on this floor, exceeding anything of the kind ever before produced in a respectable deliberative body. He said you could not kick the majority of this House into war! This language is too disgraceful to merit notice—in the manner it was applied, it is below the style of a common alehouse, and will fix a stain on the character of its author, which all the evasions and hypocritical explanations to which he may resort cannot remove for years to come.

But, sir, we cannot help inquiring what has at this time produced all these unfounded charges? And we are impelled to conclude, they are the result of a preconcerted plan, as has been already noticed, to continue the delusion in the public opinion to the Eastward, so as to influence the ensuing elections in that quarter. On their success in this effort rest all the hopes of the party. In the late elections, with the aid of intrigue and misrepresentations, they succeeded beyond the general expectations, and far beyond their own. Since that time a number of the false statements which supported their cause have been completely refuted by the publication of official documents—they seem to consider their cause as likely to be desperate—they can no longer persuade the people, that the embargo was intended as a war measure—that your councils are guided by French influence—that you are willing to submit to all foreign aggressions, and that the embargo was to be permanent. All these absurd tales have had their round, and are now no longer believed by any man of sense. The last struggle, the forlorn hope now, is to persuade the people you are not serious, you are not in earnest in your preparations to defend their rights and avenge their wrongs. They hope by impressing on their minds this barefaced falsehood, to be able still to lead them in the paths of error—they tremble for the fate of their party—they perceive clearly that Great Britain is pressed severely by the embargo, and is likely to discover her error in giving credit to the false statements she received from them respecting the people of this country, and in all probability is on the very point of accommodating her differences with your Government. In this they see a death blow to the existence of the party in this country, and they use every means in their power to prevent such event. Hence their unremitting exertions to excite domestic disturbances, insurrections, and rebellion in the Eastern States, with the hope thereby to commit the people decisively on their side of the question, and particularly to persuade Great Britain she has a strong party here on her side, and thereby induce her to persevere in her aggressions, and prevent her from doing justice to this country. With her they are willing to rise or fall, and they know should our differences with foreign nations be adjusted without disgracing our country, they vanish forever as a party. Such means pursued to effect such objects, will draw down on their authors the just indignation of the American people; charges so serious, and at the same time so groundless, made against the Representatives of the nation at this important crisis, ought to be exposed and repelled by every member of the majority on this floor—and as one, I deem it my duty to pronounce them, in the face of this nation and of the world, so far as they were intended to apply to me, to be slanderous and malicious falsehoods.

Mr. GARDENIER said he would not have again spoken in support of the bill; but, he said, the freedom of debate had been violated in the House. A gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) had exercised a Constitutional privilege in expressing his sentiments; and he had been answered in a manner calculated to wound his feelings as much as language could do it. He considered the purport of such language to be either, that a man must submit to disgrace, or an appeal to cold iron. [He was twice called to order by Mr. FISK; the SPEAKER decided each time that it was improper to refer to personal combat.] Mr. G. expressed his horror of the use of abusive language. He said that, although the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) came from a country where the term cowardice was not known, yet it was equally disgraceful to resort to a certain mode of resenting injuries practised in other States. He hoped irritating language would, in future, be dropped.

Mr. QUINCY said he should not have again risen in this debate, did not the observations of the gentleman from New York (Mr. GARDENIER) in a manner compel some explanation. The interest he has been pleased to express on account of the language which has been addressed to me, said Mr. Q., is very natural to a gentleman in his situation, and entitles him to my gratitude. But the course of my education has inculcated other sentiments, and instilled different feelings. I have been taught that the just pride of life is only attained by acquiring real honor among honorable men; and that this can only be effected by an undeviating course of public and private conduct, directed by sound principle, and terminating, when its marks and limits are fully understood, in a fulfillment of duty. Such a course I have attempted to pursue in this debate, though it has been my lot to be mistaken or misrepresented by almost every gentleman who has undertaken to reply to me. Towards neither of those who have seen fit to resort to such opprobrious language can I feel any resentment; they are welcome to all the advantages they can derive from it.

It is my fortune—perhaps in the opinion of some it is my misfortune, to represent, not only a great, a wise, a powerful, an intelligent, but what, in that country, is valued more than all, a religious people. Gentlemen very well understand, when they use terms in debate to which the customs of this part of the country admit of but one species of reply, that such a resort is altogether prohibited by the sentiment of that part to which I belong. They know that, so far from being honor, it is a disgrace, in my country, to avenge wrongs of words in the way which is here, in a manner necessary; and that a successful issue, in such a mode of vengeance, would there terminate the hopes, as well of political as of private honor of any man who, at my period of life, should adopt it. And I shall not, in order to gain the temporary applause of men whom I cannot respect, forfeit the esteem of those whose good opinion is, in this life, the most precious reward. This is my situation; I am sent here by such constituents to support their interests and maintain their rights, according to my apprehension of them. My duty in these respects I shall fulfil; nor shall I be deterred from performing it, by the asperities or the violence of any friends of the present, or any future Executive, of any, or all the royal cousins.

My argument, such as it was, will be laid, I trust, fairly before the people; whether I have passed the boundary of parliamentary duty or decorum I cheerfully refer to their judgment. The observations made in reply have been one tissue of mistakes. I ought to have interrupted each gentleman at least twenty times; but if gentlemen cannot, or will not, understand the bearing of an argument, it does not become me to be perpetually correcting them. If they insist upon dressing up, in their own way, their rag-babies, and will shake and beat them about for their own amusement, it is not for me to interfere. Certainly, I do believe with the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GARDENIER,) that the privileges of this House have been violated. The ground which I took was perfectly parliamentary—I openly disclaimed, in the outset, all personalities; I canvassed only public men, and attempted to reason concerning their intentions from their public conduct alone. With respect to the motives of this House in passing the embargo, what I said upon that point was expressly stated as being, not intended to criminate, or even directly to attribute, but only as a mere recapitulation of all the motives which had ever been suggested as existing; and this was done solely to support my main argument, that none of these did include those motives which, as I undertook to show, did operate with the Executive. Whenever what I then urged shall be before the public, the correctness of this statement will be apparent. This is not “explaining away,” sir. Gentlemen will not take the trouble to understand the bearing of an argument; they sit and note down some independent sentence which strikes their ear; they seize upon scraps which are, perhaps, only subsidiary or illustrative to the general scope of the reasoning; on these they fix, and these they read, as though they had in their grasp the substance of what was urged.

However, it was not my intention to enter even thus far into additional elucidations of this kind. Knowing the solid ground on which I stand, I have little solicitude concerning the effect of the observations of these gentlemen; the force of their weapon, if it have any, will only be felt in its recoil on themselves; for I have this great consolation, in the certainty, that, where I am known, nothing those gentlemen can say will injure me; and also in the further belief, that the effect will not be greater where they are known.

No other amendment being offered to the bill, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The bill being brought in engrossed, a motion was made that the same be read the third time to-morrow: and the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. SMITH, that the bill be now read the third time: and the question being taken thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The said bill was, accordingly, read the third time: Whereupon, Mr. SPEAKER stated the question from the Chair, that the same do pass? And, the question being taken, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 26, as follows:

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, January 23.

Mr. MACON, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend a conference with the Senate on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines," reported that they had met the managers on the part of the Senate, and conferred freely on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses; but come to no agreement thereupon.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill respecting executions for small debts in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Isaac Briggs; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. FISK, from the committee appointed the fifteenth of November last, presented a bill for altering the times and places for holding the Circuit Court of the United States within the District of Vermont; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a petition, in the French language, from sundry inhabitants of Soussignes, in the Territory of Michigan, praying that such measures may be adopted, as Congress in their wisdom may deem proper, for causing a number of copies of the laws of the United States, particularly such of the said laws as relate to the Michigan Territory, to be printed in the French language, for the convenience and benefit of the petitioners, and other inhabitants of that Territory.—Referred to Mr. WHARTON, Mr. MUMFORD, and Mr. KEY; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill concerning claims to lands in the Mississippi Territory, granted by the British Government of West Florida; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the increase of the Military Establishment. The bill contemplates the raising of 50,000 volunteers.

On the motion of Mr. NELSON, the first blank was so filled as to limit the term of service to two years.

The Committee rose and reported the bill with the amendments.

The House immediately took up the report, and after some observations in opposition to the bill, from Mr. MILNOR, the question on engrossing the bill for a third reading, was taken by yeas and nays and carried—yeas 72, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jun., Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, John Blake, jun., Thomas Blount, Adam Boyd, John Boyle, Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, John Clopton, Orchard Cook, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, Josiah Deane, Joseph Desha, Daniel M. Durell, John W. NAYS—Joseph Barker, William Blackledge, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, Matthew Clay, John Culpeper, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, jun., Jas. Elliot, William Ely, James M. Garnett, Charles Goldsborough, Edwin Gray, John Harris, John Heister, William Hoge, Daniel Hiseley, Richard Jackson, Robert Jenkins, Joseph Lewis, jun., Matthew Lyon, Nathaniel Macon, William Milnor, Daniel Montgomery, jun., Jonathan O. Sturges, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, John Thompson, Jabez Upham, Nicholas Van Dyke, Kilian K. Van Rensselaer, Jesse Wharton, Robert Whitehill, and David R. Williams.

On the motion that the bill be ordered for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS wished that it might be postponed until the course which was to be pursued should be determined. He alluded to a declaration that was made some days since by Mr. BACON, that he would bring forward a motion for the repeal of the embargo, at a certain period. Mr. W. wished to have the question settled before this additional force should be voted.

Mr. NELSON could not consent to a postponement. He thought the country ought to be put into an immediate state of defence, and it would be unwise to repeal the embargo until that was done. He apprehended no danger to the liberties of the people from the increased force of the United States. From what he had seen of the militia, he did not believe them sufficiently disciplined to be so immediately effective.

Mr. TALLMADGE thought the bill of more importance in respect to the interest of the people than the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NELSON) seemed to imagine. He therefore moved that it should be ordered to a third reading on this day week, that gentlemen might have time to consider the bill in all its bearings.

Mr. BACON wished for an intermediate period. He said he should not shrink from the duty which he had assigned himself, in bringing forward a resolution for the repeal of the embargo at no distant period.

Mr. DESHA moved that the bill be read a third time on Thursday next.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS thought if war measures were resolved upon, the nation should know it. If war was the object of the present bill it was deceiving the people.

Mr. NELSON made some remarks in support of the bill, and of a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. LYON wished the longest period named might prevail. He wanted even to look over a book of speeches, in which he found certain principles in direct hostility to the present bill maintained by the gentleman who now fills the Chair and the celebrated personage who is at present at the head of the Treasury.—He wanted to show the Republicans what they themselves had said upon the subject. He called these men time servers, whose principles altered to suit the times.

Mr. NICHOLAS supported the bill, not on the ground of its contemplating the raising of more militia or volunteers, but as an army of defence.

Mr. GARDENIER moved that the third reading of the bill should be postponed until the 22d of February next. Mr. G. took a wide view, in a speech of about an hour, of the affairs of the country, and of the present system of measures, and hoped that gentlemen, if they would not consent to go back, would at least consent to make a short pause, and allow time to have a complete knowledge of the state of the nation before they should pass the present bill.

Mr. MACON replied at length to Mr. GARDENIER, defending the embargo and the other measures of the Government.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON also spoke at length in reply to Mr. GARDENIER.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on the motion of Mr. GARDENIER, and lost—yeas 16, nays 65, as follows:

YEAS—Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, Barent Gardenier, William Hoge, Richard Jackson, Robert Jenkins, Matthew Lyon, William Minor, Jonathan O. Mosely, John Russell, James Sloan, William Stedman, Lewis B. Sturges, Benjamin Tallmadge, Jabez Upham, and Archibald Van Horn.

Smith, John Smith, Samuel Smith, Henry Southard, Clement Storer, John Taylor, James I. Van Alen, Isaac Wilbour, David R. Williams, and Alexander Wilson.

A motion was made by Mr. TALLMADGE, that the said bill be read the time on Monday next: and the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. NELSON, that the said bill be read the third time on Wednesday next: and the question being taken thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

And on motion, the House adjourned until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, January 24.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, accompanied with a report of the Commissioners of the Navy Pension Fund, and sundry statements marked A, B, C, D, and E, prepared in pursuance of the "Act for the better government of the Navy of the United States; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SAY presented a petition of the President and Managers of the Susquehanna and Tioga Turnpike Road Company, praying that the Secretary of the Treasury, for and on behalf of the United States, may be authorized to subscribe for such a number of shares of the stock of the said company, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.—Referred to the committee appointed, the eleventh of November last, on so much of the Message of the President of the United States at the commencement of the present session, as relates to the disposition of the surpluses of our revenue in the improvement of roads, canals, rivers, and education; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act establishing Circuit Courts and abridging the jurisdiction of the District Courts of the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio:'" also, a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations to complete the fortification, commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening and extending to the river Mississippi the canal of Carondelet;" to which bills, respectively, they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate adhere to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines," to their disagreement to which this House hath insisted.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening and extending to the river Mississippi the canal of Carondelet.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to fill the blank for the sum with $450,000, and read the following estimate of the sums necessary for completing the fortifications in each State for the ensuing year:

For the several works at and near N. Orleans	$36,000
For do. in the State of Georgia	60,000
For do. in the State of South Carolina	30,000
For do. in the State of North Carolina	16,000
For do. in the State of Virginia	28,000
For do. in the State of Maryland	15,000
For do. in the State of Delaware	18,000
For do. in the State of Pennsylvania	5,000
For do. in the State of New Jersey	14,000
For do. in the State of New York	165,000
For do. in the State of Connecticut	24,000
For do. in the State of Rhode Island	8,000
For do. in the State of Massach'ts and Maine	25,000
For do. in the State of New Hampshire	4,000

Total - - - - - $448,000

The motion was agreed to, without a division.

Mr. VAN DYKE moved to insert, at the end of the section which provides for completing the works already commenced, the words, "and for erecting such other fortifications as may be deemed necessary."—Agreed to, without a division.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved to strike out of the bill the words, "exclusive of the contemplated line of blocks and chains across the harbor of New York," and insert a proviso that no part of the money appropriated by this bill should be employed in that mode of defence, and that the materials provided for it should be sold, and the proceeds of the sale be appropriated to other fortifications. This motion was opposed by Messrs. BURWELL and BLOUNT, and afterwards withdrawn.

A motion was made by Mr. MACON, to strike out the second section of the bill, (respecting the canal of Carondelet.) This motion was superseded by a motion of Mr. DANA for the Committee to rise, in order to recommit the bill; on which motion, a debate took place of two or three hours in length, turning principally on the question of the propriety of that mode of defending New Orleans. Motion to rise lost—47 to 40. Motion to strike out the second section lost—55 to 40.

The blank in the second section was filled with $25,000.

Mr. NEWTON moved a new section, to authorize the President of the United States to cause a survey of the land lying between the head of the Eastern branch of Elizabeth and Lynnhaven rivers, to ascertain the practicability of cutting a canal across.—Negatived, ayes 10.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill as amended, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PREPARATION FOR WAR.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, that there never was a period in any country which more required the union and exertion of all its citizens to extricate it from its difficulties, than the situation of this country required at the present time. The two most powerful nations of the world, said he, are in a state of war against this country. Their aggressions against us have been continued for twelve months, whilst we have used every honorable means in our power to avoid war. I have repeatedly declared my determination never to submit to the wrongs received; that when the embargo failed, we must resort to the valor and patriotism of our citizens. Sir, we have too much reason to believe that the moment is at hand when nothing else can extricate us from our difficulties. My attention has been particularly called to the necessity of measures of the sort I am about to propose, from the opposition made to the preparation for war by gentlemen who rely mostly upon the embargo as a coercive measure, and declare, that as long as it continues, no preparation should be made with a view to a state of war. If the country remains in a situation unprepared to meet war, until the period when every man would be satisfied that the embargo ought to be raised, we shall be compelled to continue it six, eight, or ten months longer, till we can prepare for actual war. But, sir, in our preparations, mere defence should not be the sole object. We are the injured party in the contest. This state of things imposes upon us the necessity of being prepared to prosecute the war; because, if we seek redress for injury, the mere defence of the country will not answer the purpose; and therefore there is the greater necessity for extensive preparation. After these observations, Mr. N. offered the following resolution, which he moved to refer to a Committee of the Whole:

Resolved, As the opinion of this House, that the United States ought not to delay beyond the — day of — to repeal the embargo laws, and to resume, maintain, and defend the navigation of the high seas against any nation or nations having in force edicts, orders, or decrees, violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States.

After a few observations from Mr. DANA, expressive of a wish to see a whole system, and the object of the preparation for war precisely defined, expressing at the same time a desire to give the subject an early consideration, the resolution was made the order of the day for Monday next, in preference to to-day—53 to 45.

WEDNESDAY, January 25.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying certain papers exhibiting the instructions which have been transmitted by him to the Collectors of the Revenue and other officers of the United States, in relation to the act laying an embargo upon all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto; also, the names and places of residence of certain persons who have been detected in violating the embargo laws, prepared in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the fourteenth of November last.

The said letter was read, and, together with the papers transmitted therewith, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURWELL presented a memorial of the President, Managers, and Company, of the Philadelphia, Brandywine, and New London Turnpike Road, praying the aid and patronage of Congress, to enable the said company to open and complete a road from the city of Philadelphia, by Chadd's Ford, on Brandywine, and New London Cross-Roads, to the line of the State of Pennsylvania, in a direction towards the city of Baltimore.—Referred to the committee appointed the eleventh of November last, on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session, as relates to the disposition of the surplusses of our revenue in the improvement of roads, canals, rivers, and education.

On motion of Mr. CLORRON, that a petition of sundry British merchants, and others, subjects of His Britannic Majesty, presented on the twenty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and four, and praying "that the power and authority granted by law to the Federal Circuit Courts, may be extended to the trial and determination of 'all causes arising under treaties,' or to causes where an alien is a party, in which the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, is under the sum of five hundred dollars; or that such other tribunal may be established for the trial and determination of the said causes as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet," be referred to the consideration of a select committee.

Mr. C. stated that, in making this motion, he was far from having any desire that the prayer of the petition should be granted; on the contrary, he was very much opposed to it, but that he made the motion solely to comply with the solicitation of an agent of the petitioners, residing in the district he represented, who had earnestly requested him to call the subject into view, and endeavor to obtain a final decision by the House. Motion for reference lost—ayes 33. The petition was laid on the table.

COLLECTORSHIP OF BOSTON.

Mr. QUINCY.—Mr. Speaker, I rise to perform a great duty; but one impudently demanded, as I apprehend, by my station, and by the knowledge of facts which I have in possession. By the second section of the first article of the Constitution, this House have "the sole power of impeachment."

This duty, always painful, it must perform, if occasion calls for it. And every member who has reason to believe that a high crime or misdemeanor has been committed, is bound to state that opinion to the House, and to move such an inquiry as the nature of the supposed offence demands.

Of all the duties of the Executive Magistrate of this nation, that in relation to the filling of important public offices is the most critical, the most likely to be abused, and the one which this House ought most scrupulously to watch; because these appointments are the avenues of corrupt influence; and, of all species, perhaps, that is the most dangerous which keeps men, then acting in high official stations, subject to such an influence by not only the actual perception of the profit of the places which they hold, but by the assurance of further lucrative advancement, in case of continued fidelity to him who holds the distribution of offices. Under this aspect, sir, I do not hesitate to declare my opinion, that a high misdemeanor has been committed against this nation, concerning which it is the bounden duty of this House to inquire, and either to remove the ground of suspicion, or establish the fact before the world. This is the charge which I expect to substantiate: That the collectorship of the port of Boston and Charlestown, being a place of great trust and importance, and also of ample emolument, has been now for more than two years, kept, in a manner, vacant, and ever since left in the condition of a sinecure, in the hands of the then incumbent, after the Executive had full information of the fact, for the purpose of keeping the said office in reserve for Henry Dearborn, long a member of the present Administration, then and now Secretary of War.

The facts I expect and am prepared to prove are:

First. That, in November, 1806, Benjamin Lincoln, Esq., collector of that port, did write to the President of the United States, stating his infirmities and advanced years, and asking leave to resign at the end of that year.

Second. That he did receive an answer from the President, in December following, expressing a high sense of his Revolutionary services, and requesting him to give him a little longer time to look out for a suitable character to fill the said office, and limiting the time to the last of March then following, viz: March, 1807, "beyond which he assured him he should not be detained." That General Lincoln, in reply, consented to continue until the last of the said March.

Third. That no appointment in March was made, and that General Lincoln did, on the 30th of September, 1807, write to the President stating his infirmities, and total inability to perform the duties of his office, and again requested to be relieved from his office, at farthest, by the end of that year; that to this he never received any answer.

Fourth. That he has been continued through another year, without any reason assigned for such continuance, in a situation totally unable to perform any of its duties; so much so, that he has not been in the town of Boston since June last.

So far the facts are to be proved, as I have reason to believe, in a court of law. The next fact, I have no doubt, will be made out perfectly to the satisfaction of the House and nation.

Fifth. That this office has been thus kept, in effect vacant, for more than two years, for the purpose of gratifying a favorite of the Executive, Henry Dearborn, Secretary of War, by that appointment, and that for him it has been, in this manner, reserved.

I need not use any arguments to show that these facts, if they be proved, constitute, to say the least, a high misdemeanor, into which this House ought to inquire, and to take such course thereupon as to its wisdom shall seem expedient, under the high duties imposed upon it by the Constitution.

I am instantly impelled to this duty by a paragraph in a paper, the National Intelligencer, of this day, which I now hold in my hand. In this paper, Major General Benjamin Lincoln, one of the chief glories of our Revolution—a hero, the halting victim of war—his body all seamed and scarred with wounds gotten in the cause of his country, now on the brink of the grave, his laurels never yet tarnished; and though the aged root is descending into the tomb, yet their leaves upturn to the eye of a youthful green, and shed all around a celestial fragrance—This hero, the companion, the beloved friend of WASHINGTON, is stigmatized as “a Federalist, whom the forbearance of the Administration has long retained in office, in opposition to the wishes of a respectable class of the community.” I have not language to express my indignation. And I am quickened to a duty which I had before made some preparation to perform. I therefore move the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House all correspondences touching the offers to resign and the resignation of his office, by Benjamin Lincoln, Esq., late collector of the port of Boston and Charlestown.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the causes which prevented the acceptance of the resignation of Benjamin Lincoln, late collector of the port of Boston and Charlestown, in the years 1806 and 1807, and into the reasons which have occasioned a postponement of the appointment of a successor, and that they report the result of such inquiry to the House.

The House agreed to consider the resolutions—yeas 93, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, junior, Ezekiel Bacon, William W. Bibb, William Blackledge, John Blake, jun., Thomas Blount, John Boyle, Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, Joseph Calhoun, John Campbell, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, Matthew Chay, John Clopton, John Culpeper, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, jun., John Dawson, Josiah Deane, Joseph Deha, Daniel M. NAYS—Lemuel J. Alston, David Bard, Joseph Barker, Burwell Bassett, Adam Boyd, William Butler, Meshack Franklin, William Helms, John G. Jackson, Daniel Isley, Richard M. Johnson, Thomas Kanan, William Kirkpatrick, John Lambert, Nicholas R. Moore, Roger Nelson, John Pugh, John Rhea of Tennessee, Lemuel Sawyer, Samuel Shaw, Dennis Smelt, Jedediah K. Smith, Alexander Wilson, and Richard Winn.

Mr. QUINCY moved that they should lie on the table until to-morrow, and be printed.

Mr. GHOLSON said, he hoped that they would neither lie on the table nor be printed. He acknowledged that the present attempt had excited his astonishment more than anything which had occurred during the session. He could scarcely credit his hearing, when a member rose and moved to institute an inquiry with a view to impeachment on a subject like this. What was the charge? Was it a charge of mal-administration? Was it any charge which would authorize the course pursued? Was it alleged that the duties of collector had not been faithfully performed? Nothing of this had been urged. But the President had not appointed a person to fill the office of collector. Mr. G. said that the late collector had only resigned within a day or two, and there had been, therefore, no vacancy to be filled. The former collector had an undoubted right to resign whenever he thought fit, and had not resigned. Why, then, this ridiculous proposition? If the collector had resigned, the President would have been compelled to fill the office, but this was not the fact. He hoped, therefore, the resolutions would receive an immediate rejection.

Mr. BURWELL said he partook of the surprise of his colleague at the resolutions just submitted. He knew of but one parallel to it, in the history of impeachments, and that would be found in Gulliver's Travels. The recollection of gentlemen would save him the trouble of specifying the particulars of that case. The gentleman wanted an inquiry into the reason why the President did not wish to accept the resignation of Mr. Lincoln. How would a committee of this House proceed in this inquiry? They must either go to the President and ask him the motives of his conduct, or they must have some other mode of penetrating his motives. After the handsome panegyric of the gentleman on the late collector, Mr. B. asked how he could come forward and impeach the President for keeping in office a man whose merits transcended all description? It appeared to him, from the speech of the gentleman, that he had been long in possession of these facts. The paper of this morning certainly could not have gone to Boston and returned since its publication. The gentleman must, therefore, have been previously possessed of this information; and why, if it was so very important, had it not been previously brought forward? As to the subject of this appointment being destined for any particular person, Mr. B. observed, that the President, if he had any such intention, certainly had not communicated it to the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman's statement, in this respect, must therefore be mere inference and conjecture; and however the gentleman's passions had been influenced by a paragraph in a newspaper, his ideas thus excited could not have an influence on the judgment of those who were not under the same irritation. If the gentleman from Massachusetts wished to conduct an inquiry to any result, he ought to show that the misconduct of the officer in question had produced effects which ought to have compelled the President to remove him. If the gentleman would show that the revenue had been defrauded, or the laws evaded through negligence, or by his connivance, and that the President, having knowledge of such facts, had refused to remove him, there might be some ground for the resolution.

Collectorship of Boston.

Mr. Love asked of the gentleman from Massachusetts when the late collector actually resigned, and whether the gentleman knew of any misconduct of the officer alluded to? If so, whether this had been within the knowledge of the President of the United States?

Mr. QUINCY said, whether it was or was not an offence to keep in an office, the salary of which is five thousand dollars a year, a man who had declared his inability to execute it, was for the House to determine. The charge which he made was simply this: that an officer had been compensated for doing no services, and kept in a situation the duties of which he was unable to perform. It was an offence that so great an office as the collector of Boston should be kept in this position; the United States paying to an individual 5,000 dollars a year for inadequate services, contrary to the express wish of the gentleman himself, who, ever since June, had not been in the town of Boston; and, of consequence, the execution of the duties of the office had been totally dependent on one individual, the deputy collector. You send a law on, said Mr. Q., to be executed, and by one individual. The deputy says he will not act; the collector is unable to act, and the consequence is, that the law is not executed. In answer to the question whether the country has suffered, I will state a fact; the deputy collector of that port had a right to resign his office to the collector; and, if the collector had been an efficient man, there would have been no difficulty; but, because he was not efficient, the law is not in a state of execution. I take this position, because the facts which I have stated can be proved. Whether the House will or will not agree to these resolutions, is no concern of mine; nor, if gentlemen choose to utter any abuse, do I regard it; I stand before this nation, and fear not to do my duty.

Messrs. JOHNSON, W. ALSTON, D. R. WILLIAMS, JOHN G. JACKSON, DANA, MCCREERY, RHEA, MACON, BIBB, SOUTHARD, MASTERS, FISK, SLOAN, ROWAN, and KEY, followed Mr. QUINCY in debate, all of whom differed with Mr. QUINCY as to the propriety of adopting the resolutions. The reasons assigned by gentlemen were various, but generally to this effect: that it would be indecorous, if not beyond the power of this House, to call upon the President of the United States for his private correspondence with any individual, without doing which it would appear that none of the facts could be established; that were the facts established, and the charges maintained, they constituted no crime or misdemeanor, and it was said by some gentlemen, no ground for reprehension; that, in constituting no crime or misdemeanor, it was not a matter coming within the cognizance of the House, or on which an impeachment could be grounded; and being a matter on which the House had no Constitutional power to act, it was also a matter into which it was not their province to inquire.

Mr. BACON said, that whatever might be his feelings on the subject-matter of these resolutions at the moment when they were first propounded to the House in so menacing a style by the honorable mover, yet, from the course of reflection which had since taken place in his mind, as well as from a view of the reception which the resolutions had since met with on all sides of the House, the feelings which their extraordinary nature were at first calculated to excite, had in his bosom totally changed. He really thought that the gentleman, by the indiscreet course which he had taken on the occasion, had reduced himself to a condition in which he was an object of sensations very different from those of resentment. For himself, he now harbored no other passions in relation to him than those of sympathy. It was now very evident that his ill advised zeal had led him into a labyrinth, where his own political friends could not consent to follow him. From the first moment when the proposition was submitted, he had not entertained a doubt that such must be the result; he had too high an opinion of the honorable sentiment and correct principles which he must presume would ever govern a large portion of the minority of that House, to suppose that they would conduct otherwise. It was now clear that the mover of these resolutions having been for some time past plunging on from one degree of extravagance to another, had at last brought himself to a point where he must either stop, or travel by himself.

What is really the sum and substance of this mighty accusation which is brought up as a solemn ground of impeachment against the Chief Magistrate of our country, even according to the gentleman's own showing? It is not even that he refused to receive the resignation of a public officer, because it is not until within a few days that it has been specifically tendered; this is a thing which is always within the power of that officer to do, and whatever might be the inclination of the President, he could not refuse it. It is only, then, that the President had persuaded the Collector of Boston to delay the period of his actual resignation, and to continue in the occupation of his office for a longer time than he was desirous of doing, in order that it might afterwards be conferred upon another person to whom it was not then convenient to receive it, or whose services were then needed in another capacity. Well, sir, allow all these facts, of which, however, as a public man I can know nothing, to be true in their full extent, what is there reprehensible in it? and who has been injured by the procedure? Not General Lincoln certainly, for he had it in his power at any moment to retire by an actual resignation. It is not alleged that during the two years for which the office is said to have been thus held, the public service has suffered, either by unfaithful or negligent performance of duties attached to it; this is not even pretended. But when pressed on this point, which the gentleman appeared to feel fully the force of, he brings forward the circumstance of the present state of inexecution in which our laws are placed by General Lincoln's resignation, and that of his deputy, to prove that the public service has in this way suffered, and adds that this state of things might have been prevented had General Lincoln's place been early supplied. Now the same gentleman had long since told the House, that it was utterly out of the power of the Government to carry our laws into execution by any human means whatever, and to-day we are told that this inexecution in the port of Boston is attributable to the want of an earlier appointment of a collector; it is for the gentleman to get along with these paradoxes, no one else can. But there is something in the circumstances of these sudden resignations, given in at a critical moment, which bespeak a preconcerted and systematic design to defeat the operation of our laws, embarrass the Government, and prostrate the national honor at the feet of faction and anarchy. Another instance of the same character has just been mentioned by a gentleman from South Carolina, and is perhaps to be followed up by all your revenue officers of the same description of politics with the late Collector of Boston; and thus in a moment is the authority of our laws trodden down, and their obligations sported with, by men who have long been standing evidences of the toleration and moderation of the Government, and who have lived upon its particular bounties; to me, sir, conduct of this sort speaks a language which it is impossible to mistake, and excites emotions which it is perhaps better to repress.

Sir, the name of General Lincoln would not by me have been wantonly dragged into this debate, nor should I have presumed to sport with any animadversion upon the conduct of a man venerable for his years, and respectable for his Revolutionary services and achievements, had he not have suffered himself, as is manifest from his own connivance at least, to have been ushered into this House, through the indiscreet zeal of his own unlucky friends, as the weapon by which they would annoy the Chief Magistrate of our country. Far be it from me to indulge in regard to such a character any reproachful epithets, or any language which the disparity of our age and standing would render indecorous and improper. But there are some circumstances growing out of the disclosure which has to-day been laid before the House by my colleague, which it is impossible to overlook, or to contemplate with entire apathy.

What are the facts as stated by the gentleman himself? That General Lincoln, though well known to have been utterly opposed to the present Chief Magistrate in his political sentiments and conduct, has through the liberality of the Government—perhaps no more than its justice—been permitted for these eight years past to continue in the possession of a most honorable and responsible office, and in the reception of its great emoluments to the tune of five thousand dollars a year, and that in opposition to the wishes of the political friends of the Executive; and what according to the gentleman's statement is a still greater stretch of indulgence, that for nearly two years he has even been suffered to retain it as a sinecure, without the performance of its ordinary duties; and for all this liberality and all this indulgence, what is the requital which that officer and his friends return to the Government? The one furnishes to the other that sort of evidence by which it is vainly hoped that this very indulgence may be turned as a weapon against his benefactor, and be made the ground of a public accusation. As to this fact it is not possible I should be mistaken; for though it is not stated by my colleague that the evidence which he has adduced has been put into his hands by General Lincoln, yet it must be evident that the letters which passed on this subject between himself and the Executive, and which the gentleman states are in his hands, could only have been furnished, either directly or indirectly, by General Lincoln himself. What a picture does this statement present! A man who for a long period of years has lived upon the liberality of the Government; who, by the favors that he has been permitted to enjoy from the bounty of the nation, has amassed a liberal fortune, deserts its service and abandons his post at a most critical and important moment, and then to avert from himself the public censure and indignation, turns and endeavors to wound the hand that has fed him, and raised him from penury and want to affluence and ease! Throwing for a moment out of view the utter futility of the charges as they are attempted to be laid, there is something in the means by which they have been got up, that is too utterly revolting to every honorable sentiment of the heart to allow one to think of it with composure. The public feelings cannot with impunity be thus wantonly sported with, nor can the public indignation by any stratagems of this sort be diverted from its proper object. It will fasten upon those, and those alone, who, by a precipitate and probably preconcerted abandonment of duty at a critical moment, have suffered the Government of their country to be set at defiance, and the authority of the nation defeated and trampled upon.

In reply to the observation of various gentlemen against his proposition—

Mr. QUINCY observed that neither the asperity of his political opponents, nor the disagreement of his political friends, would change his mind on a subject which he had well considered. If he was in error concerning the charge, or rather allegation, which he had made, he was willing to stand before the nation alone in support of it. It gave him no sort of pain or anxiety. Mr. Q. replied to several incidental observations made by gentlemen in the course of the debate, but which are not noticed in the course of the preceding sketch. In relation to the execution of the late embargo law, he said that the deputy collector had not dared to execute the law, not from any insurrection or disobedience to the laws, but from a determination in the community to bring the laws of the United States, where he hoped the people of this country always would bring the laws, to the decision of the judiciary. In particular cases, said Mr. Q., gentlemen whose vessels were loaded with property to the amount of perhaps eighty or ninety thousand dollars, were called upon by your laws either to give bond in six times the amount of the cargo, or to unload their vessels. They refused to unload; the collector breaks open the hatches and takes possession of the property; and as soon as that is done, he must give bond in the State courts to the amount of $180,000, or double the amount of the property seized. This is a civil right of the citizen. The instant your officer begins to execute that law, before one day is at an end, he will have been obliged to give bond in a million of dollars, or to have gone to jail. The deputy collector, therefore, could not put at hazard the whole hopes of himself and his family by executing a law which brought him into such obvious danger. Gentleman say that I admitted that this law might have been executed. That was not the bearing of my expression. It was, that if the law could have been executed, the head of the office, if an efficient man, would have been competent to execute it; but not when that head is an individual who is absolutely from infirmity confined to his house, and almost to his bed. The misfortune is that there is not now a responsible officer to execute your laws; and it is this which has led to the present motion. Mr. Q. said that, convinced that it was proper that an inquiry should be made, notwithstanding gentlemen near him had asked him to withdraw his resolution, although alone he should wish a question to be taken on it. He denied that General Lincoln had been kept in office as a reward for his Revolutionary services; and, if it were so, the Executive had no right to gratify any man by a sinecure at the expense of the public interest. The facts which he had stated, if the House would go into a committee of inquiry, he could prove. He said he had not, as suggested by his colleague; received his information from General Lincoln, and this was all that he would state on that point. Mr. Q. said his observations had been attributed to a design to excite New England. He said New England was in a state of excitement under the operation of the embargo laws—laws which some of the wisest men and best patriots in the country deemed unconstitutional, and so much so that they could not submit to them. This was the general sentiment. Suppose it to be the case that this House should ever pass an unconstitutional law, what must be the course of the people? They could pursue no other mode than a Constitutional remonstrance; and if that failed, he said they had no other resource than a Constitutional resistance. He hoped that course would not be taken, because he hoped the Government would see the evil of its ways, and the incorrectness of the principle on which it acted. He maintained the correctness of the ground that, when a law is passed by which in the opinion of the people their interests are entirely destroyed, the law could not be enforced. His motives being as he had stated them, he had wished to lay the subject before the nation. This House, he said, was the guardian of the rights of the citizens, and had a right to inquire into the manner in which offices were filled. And though he might be alone in this opinion, deeming it his duty to make the inquiry, he said he should not withdraw the motion.

The question on the passage of the resolution (Mr. QUINCY having withdrawn his motion that it lie on the table) was taken by yeas and nays—yeas 1, nays 117, as follows:

And so the said proposed resolutions were rejected.

THURSDAY, January 26.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, that the House do come to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a Land Office for the sale of the lands of the United States east of the Red river, and west of the Mississippi, in the Territory of Orleans; and that they have leave to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting the right of pre-emption, in certain cases, to actual settlers in the Territory of Orleans; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

And the said proposed resolutions being read, a motion was made by Mr. RANDOLPH that the same do lie on the table. And the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH,

Ordered, That the committee appointed, the eleventh of November last, on so much of the Message from the President of the United States as relates to the disposition of the surplusses of our revenue in the improvement of roads, canals, rivers, and education, be discharged from the consideration of the petition and memorial of the President and Managers of the Susquehanna and Tioga Turnpike Road Company, and of the President, Managers, and Company, of the Philadelphia, Brandywine, and New London Turnpike Road, presented to this House on the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth instant, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said petition and memorial be referred to Mr. SAY, Mr. MARION, Mr. DANA, Mr. HOWARD, and Mr. JEDEDIAH K. SMITH; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill respecting the Circuit and District Courts of the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. GEORGE W. CAMPBELL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of Government, during the year one thousand eight hundred and nine; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House proceeded to reconsider the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines," together with the amendments adhered to by the Senate to the said bill: Whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. MACON that the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table. And the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

CATAWBA AND WATEREE RIVERS.

Mr. MARION, from the committee to whom was referred, on the fourteenth of November last, a petition of the company for opening the navigation of the Catawba and Wateree rivers, signed by J. F. Grimke, their President, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The report is as follows:

"That the President of said company, in behalf of himself and the rest of the proprietors, states, that the present stockholders, convinced of the great advantages that would result from removing the obstructions in the Wateree and Catawba rivers, did, several years ago, become proprietors of the original shares; that they have already expended considerable sums on the said rivers, and are annually expending more in the prosecution of the work; but, from the extent of the river, the number of obstructions, and the small association of persons at present engaged in the undertaking, there is little prospect that they would be able, with their own resources, to remove the obstructions to navigation for many years to come. To aid them in the completion of their work, he prays that Congress would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase, for the use of the United States, all the vacant shares of the company, (which are about a moiety of the whole number,) or such part of them as Congress may deem expedient.

"Although the committee are fully convinced that the improvement of the navigation of the said river would be of vast importance and utility to the inhabitants of a considerable portion of the States of North and South Carolina and Tennessee, who would thereby be enabled to transport the productions of their farms, by inland navigation, to Charleston; and that the armory and arsenal of the United States, established at Rocky Mount, on the Catawba river, would also be considerably benefitted by the opening of that river; yet, from the present state of our finances, and the critical situation of our country in relation to foreign Governments, they are of opinion that it would be unadvisable to apply any public money, at this time, to internal improvements of this kind. Under these impressions the committee recommend the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant, at present, the prayer of the memorialists."

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, authorizing the President to man, arm, and equip for immediate service, all the public ships of war, vessels, and gunboats belonging to the United States.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON, the first section was so amended as to authorize the President to fit out only four of the frigates, the United States, the Essex, the John Adams, and the President, and to order them to stations upon the coast.

Some other amendments were proposed and agreed to; one of these limits the additional number of officers to eight hundred, and another authorizes the employment of three thousand able bodied seamen, marines, and boys.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill with the amendments; which were agreed to by the House.

On the motion of Mr. BASSETT, the title of the bill was altered, so as to read, "A bill authorizing the employment of an additional naval force."

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS moved to amend the bill by adding the following clause: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to authorize the President to employ any greater number of vessels than in his opinion the public service shall at any time demand.

Mr. W.'s object in moving this amendment was to leave it discretionary with the President to employ any of the vessels as long as the public service required them, and to avoid the probability of incurring an useless expense. It had been fashionable, during the session, to legislate upon probabilities; some provision ought therefore to be made to discharge these vessels, should circumstances occur to render their services unnecessary.

Messrs. GHOLSON and LYON spoke against the amendment.

Mr. COOK was surprised that motions should be brought forward at this time to fatigue and tire the House out of the adoption of the bill, and made some remarks in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS observed that, with all due deference to the honorable member from Massachusetts, he would move as many amendments as he pleased, and at what time he pleased. He believed that the bill involved a question material to the vital interests of the nation. His colleague (Mr. TAYLOR) had said that this was not a time to be obstinate or particular; but he thought of all periods this was one when every man ought to be particular as far as regarded expenditures of money. Mr. W. hoped these were not intended to enforce the embargo. If they were, he was entirely off. From what had occurred, he believed that this law could not now be effectually maintained, and he was one of those who would be willing to repeal it at this time. He never could consent to thrust the law down the throats of the people of Massachusetts at the point of the bayonet; and as to the purposes of war, the English had one hundred vessels which could singly beat the whole of the frigates, or certainly any two of them. The reasons which he understood the managers on the part of the Senate had assigned for wishing the passage of this bill were three. The first of them was, that they wanted a pledge from this House that it was willing to come forward to defend the nation. Another was, that these were necessary to aid the gunboats in their operations; and a third, that men could not be got to enlist for the service of the gunboats, and that to remedy this evil, they might be enlisted to man the frigates, and afterwards transferred. He objected to these reasons in toto. As to the first of them, he expressed his astonishment that a pledge should be required of the House by the other branch of the Legislature, that it was willing to contribute towards the defence of the nation. In relation to the second reason, he considered it futile. He knew, indeed, that Commodore Preble had said that gunboats could not fight to advantage without the aid of a battery; but he conceived the land batteries were sufficient. To have batteries on land and frigates too, he believed every naval gentleman would consider as ridiculous. When we first had frigates, it was said they were 74's in disguise; that they would be a match for an hostile 74, or at any rate, a ship of 64 guns; now it appears that a ship of the largest description could beat two, probably four, of them. After this was ascertained, gunboats were built to act in co-operation with batteries on land; they were to do everything; to be much better than frigates; now it seems the gunboats are fit for nothing, unless they can be aided by these frigates; and after a while we shall be called upon to vote for 74's to help them! Mr. W. could see nothing but endless waste in this system, if it was to be pursued. He had two objections to the third reason, "that men could not be enlisted for the gunboats, and that they might be obtained for enlistments for the frigates, and then be transferred." The first objection was, that he did not believe the fact as represented; the second, that if it were true, he could not consent to the artifice of entrapping a free people in the way proposed. Mr. W. made some other observations in support of his amendment, and in opposition to the bill in its original form.

Mr. NELSON did not, like his friend from South Carolina, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) think this a time when men should be particular as to expenditures of money. He was not for vesting this discretionary power in the hands of the President; not that he doubted the duty being faithfully discharged, but he thought it their duty not to throw the responsibility of the House upon the President. Much too as he might respect the judgment of any President, he was not at all times willing for the House to give up their opinion to that officer. He asked of what use the frigates were in their present situation? they were lying in the Potomac, a mere sinking fund. They had better be done without, if they were never to be called into actual service. He acknowledged that he believed it would be the better course, at the present time, to remove the embargo, and of consequence war must be substituted, for he hoped there was not a creeping thing on the face of the earth that would think of submission. In the event of war, letters of marque would be issued, and the frigates would be useful, not only as rallying points for our privateers, but in many other respects.

Mr. TAYLOR made a few remarks in support of the amendment of his colleague, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS.)

H. or R.

JANUARY, 1809.

Mr. W. ALSTON spoke some minutes in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. COOK again advocated the passage of the bill as it stood; and expressed his astonishment at the contradictory doctrines held forth by the supporters of the amendment.

Mr. EPPES stated that he conceived this bill to be the compromise offered by the Senate on the subject which had been in agitation between the two Houses, and he hoped the House would consent to take this middle ground. He did not believe that the vessels were intended to enforce the embargo laws; nor did he fear that the New England States would rise in opposition to the laws. He would not, however, if the good of the country required it, shrink from the discharge of his duty in enforcing the laws, and he was sorry to hear his friend from South Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) declare that he was ready to give up the embargo, because a few factious individuals and editors of Federal newspapers represented it as impossible to be enforced.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS was sorry that he had fallen under the censure of a gentleman standing so high as the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. COOK) did; and occupying so conspicuous a station as he did for his talents, learning, and eloquence! No other member would have stooped to such humble game. One remark he would just make for his use, which was, that "to the jaundiced eye all things seem yellow."

Mr. COOK supposed that the gentleman from South Carolina must have a great opinion of his transcendent abilities, or he would not so often entertain the House with his speeches. The gentleman had resorted to personalities, which had not been provoked. The remarks which Mr. C. had formerly made having been confined to principles, and as the member from South Carolina must meet with the disapprobation of all who heard him, he would leave him to their censure.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS replied, that if anything he had said had wounded the gentleman's feelings, he would retract it all, and allow that he had neither talents, learning, nor eloquence!

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment, and lost—yeas 39, nays 78, as follows:

On the question to engross the bill with the amendments for a third reading, Mr. MACON rose and spoke about half an hour against the bill, opposing it on the ground that he considered it as the foundation of a navy; and stating, that if war should ensue, he would be willing to lend the frigates to any set of men to privateer with.

After some remarks from Mr. LYON in support of the bill, it was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

The House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 27.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing the copy of a letter to him from the Register of the Treasury, correcting an error to the amount of fifty-four thousand eight hundred and twenty dollars and eighteen cents, in the statement of receipts into the Treasury of the United States, for the year 1807, transmitted in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the twentieth of December last; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening and extending to the river Mississippi the canal of Carondelet, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FINDLEY presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Westmoreland county, in the State of Pennsylvania, stating certain inconveniences and hardships to which the petitioners and others have been, and are now subjected, in consequence of the operations of the several laws laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and praying that the same may be repealed whenever, in the judgment of Congress, it may be expedient to adopt that measure.

The said petition was received, and ordered to lie on the table.

Defensive Maritime War.

H. OF R.

DEFENSIVE MARITIME WAR.

Mr. BACON said that he was particularly induced, by a consideration of the sentiments contained in the memorial which had just been read, to offer to the House a resolution touching the subject of our maritime rights, and the mode in which it behooved the nation to vindicate their exercise against belligerent aggressions. He had been much gratified that a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NICHOLAS) had already laid upon the table a resolution pointing to a speedy termination of the embargo laws, coupled with a general declaration of our determination to resume, maintain, and vindicate our rights to the free navigation of the ocean. That resolution was, however, altogether general and unspecific as to the manner in which this right should be vindicated, or the means by which it should be maintained. It was probably purposely, and undoubtedly very properly, propounded in that general shape, with a view of inducing the offer of such specific propositions as might suggest themselves to gentlemen having in view the same general object. He apprehended, however, that when they came to go into Committee on that resolution, it would be found difficult to make it the object of distinct and intelligible discussion, since it pointed to no definite means by which our rights were to be maintained, or our navigation defended from violence. He had hoped that some other gentleman would, before this, have presented some distinct proposition of this sort to the House, and had waited some days with such an expectation. Having, however, been disappointed in this, he could no longer refrain from the exercise of a duty, which he rose with great diffidence to discharge. The resolution which he was about to submit was by no means in discordance with that of the gentleman from Virginia. It was merely a specification of some, at least, of the means by which the general object of that gentleman might perhaps be attained. And, in offering it, he wished not to be understood as definitively pledged to the particular course which the resolution points to. So far from being pertinaciously wedded to it, he was ready to give his unbiassed attention to any other project which other gentlemen may see fit to propose. That there are great difficulties to be encountered in every view which can be taken of our present situation, is sufficiently obvious, and it is therefore with more than ordinary diffidence that I venture to lay before the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, from and after the — day of — next, for authorizing the commanders and crews of merchant vessels of the United States, owned wholly by a citizen or citizens thereof, to oppose and defend against any search, restraint, or seizure, which shall be attempted upon such vessel, or upon any other vessel owned as aforesaid; by the commander or crew of any armed vessel sailing under French or British colors, or acting, or pretending to act, by or under the authority of the French or British Governments; and to repel by force any assault or hostility which shall be made or committed on the part of such French or British vessel pursuing such attempt, and to subdue and capture the same, and to retake any vessel owned as aforesaid, which may have been captured by any vessel sailing under French or British colors, or acting, or pretending to act, by or under authority from the French or British Governments.

In addition to the general observations made before he offered the resolution, Mr. B. said that he would barely remark that, as to the general principle which it contained, he presumed that it would by no one be mistaken for submission to the belligerent claims which had been levelled against our maritime rights; it authorized resistance against their aggressions in the most direct and unqualified terms. He might be asked if it was war. He felt no hesitation in saying that it was defensive war, and strictly and wholly defensive as it respected ourselves and our neutral rights. As to foreign nations, they were at liberty to take it as they pleased, and might make their election in respect to the manner in which they would meet that state of things which might grow out of it. We claimed nothing of them but the fair exercise of our rights, and if they still chose to interrupt us in it, on them be the consequences—what those consequences should be, it might be for this nation hereafter to say.

To the general principle of the resolution, Mr. B. said that there could be, as he apprehended, but one objection any way plausible. It was, that it authorized resistance to all search whatever, by the cruisers of the two great belligerents. It was, to be sure, an acknowledged principle of the general law of nations that neutral vessels were bound to submit to search by the cruisers of belligerents for certain specified purposes—for instance, to examine whether the neutral had on board articles contraband of war, to prevent her entering a port actually invested, &c. And so long as belligerents acted upon this principle, and limited their principles and practices of visitation and search within the acknowledged rules, neutrals were unquestionably bound to submit to it. But when the former claimed to extend this right to an almost unlimited extent, and through it to enforce claims utterly unknown to the law of nations, and inconsistent with the sovereignty of neutral States, it might be very questionable whether the limited right itself was not forfeited; and whether it could be at all consistent with the safety of the neutral to suffer it. That such is the actual state of things in relation to American rights on the ocean is obvious. Neither Great Britain or France even pretend that their extensive searches and seizures of our vessels are justified by the law of nations; it is avowed to be a mere system of vindictive retaliation upon each other, through us. And shall they pretend to hold us to a punctilious observance of all the ceremonial rites of that law, which they both habitually disregard, and avowedly set at defiance as respects us? From such a state of things we might say, as France did to us some years since, and we may say it with much more justice, "that we can find only a real disadvantage." And we might almost be justified in assuming towards both those Powers the ground which one of them assumed towards the other, and to tell them plainly that, against nations which thus set at defiance all principles of national rights, and forget all the maxims of public law, "what can be done but to forget them for an instant one-self." Mr. B. said he did not feel himself exclusively pledged to this particular course; but as he thought it was time for some system to be progressing, he wished this resolution to be considered by the House, and put in possession of the Committee of the Whole, who had under consideration the resolution for repealing the embargo and resuming the navigation of the ocean.

Mr. DANA said he acknowledged that this resolution did not look like submission. He rejoiced that the gentleman from Massachusetts had brought forward a resolution which looked something like advancing like men of business. He did not know that he should vote precisely for this proposition, but it was one which would not terminate in words or in "retirement." When they came to examine this subject, it would be found, perhaps, that they approached a question of peculiar character; that it might be difficult to draw a line of distinction between a state of positive war, in which we encounter the enemy at all points, and defensive war—a state in which we seek security for the future, without endeavoring to compel indemnity for the past. Perhaps, said he, when we approach the subject more closely, it may be proper to make a discrimination on this subject, which has very generally been kept out of sight in the course of our discussions, viz: between a war in which the employment of force is strictly defensive, and a war in which it is vindictive. I will not at this time express an opinion on the subject of the resolution; but I rose to express my satisfaction, and make my acknowledgment to the gentleman for the proposition, which seems to contemplate beginning a course of doing something.

The resolution was referred to the same Committee of the Whole, to whom was referred Mr. NICHOLAS's resolution.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for arming, manning, and fitting out for immediate service, all the public ships of war, vessels, and gunboats, of the United States," together with the amendments agreed to yesterday, was read the third time: and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 23, as follows:

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

An engrossed bill providing an additional military force was read the third time, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. TALLMADGE moved the postponement of the bill indefinitely.

Mr. TALLMADGE said it was a very unpleasant circumstance to rise and address a deliberative assembly, when the subject was an unpleasant one; but, after the observations which had fallen from some gentlemen in the majority, charging the minority with a systematic determination to oppose and retard all the measures of the Administration, it required some effort of the mind to undertake the task. Nothing but an imperious sense of duty, and regard for the rights of his constituents and his country, which he could not sacrifice, induced him to trouble the House with his objections to the bill now under consideration. Sir, said Mr. T., in the discharge of this duty, while I confine myself within the rules of decorum in debate, I hold myself responsible only to my country, to my conscience, and to my God.

In relation to the subject now under consideration, I hope this honorable House will do me the justice to acknowledge that, on every question which has been brought forward since I have been honored with a seat on this floor, the object of which was to protect and defend our common country, my vote and exertions have been in favor of such measures. One solitary instance do I except from the general rule, which relates to gunboats; and of these I have long entertained such a contemptible opinion, that I have felt constrained to withhold my vote from giving to them such liberal support. This frank declaration, I hope, will shield me from the reproach of wishing to thwart the measures of the Administration, or to throw any obstacles in the way of its operations.

When I addressed this House on a former occasion, and moved a postponement of the consideration of this bill for one week, I did it, not because I wished time to consider its provisions, for I did then believe that I had pretty thoroughly examined it, and understood what would be its general bearings and effects; but I requested a postponement, that its final passage might be delayed until certain propositions should be made, which a gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) informed the House he expected to offer to their consideration, and until the policy which this country was to pursue, should be more distinctly marked out by the Government. If the present system of measures is still to be persisted in, and the embargo to be continued as the grand restorative specific, I then thought, and still hope, the House will not consider the army now proposed to be raised as at all necessary, and, of course, that we shall unite in rejecting the bill. In the observations which I then made, I thought I was explicit, but, from the remarks which have been made by gentlemen in reply, I find I was misunderstood.

When we examine this bill, as predicated upon the recommendation of the Secretary of War, we must be at a loss to conjecture how it should assume its present shape. In the report of that officer, which was printed and laid upon our tables, it will be found that he recommends the plan of engaging fifty thousand volunteers; but this bill proposes raising an army of fifty thousand men. Yes, sir, I repeat it; if you pass this bill, you sanction the enlistment, organization, and equipment, of an army of fifty thousand men, all the officers of which are to be appointed and commissioned by the President of the United States. Being a member of the committee who reported this bill, it may be inquired why I did not object to its provisions before it came to this House. Sir, I never saw the bill before it was printed and laid on our tables. In saying this, I impute no blame to the chairman of our committee, (Mr. NELSON,) who very possibly may have directed notice to be given me, and, for aught I know, I may have been engaged with some other committee. I mention this that I may not be suspected of taking any undue advantage to attack and defeat the bill, when I could have suggested provisions to its framers, which would have rendered it less liable to exception.

However defective this bill may be in some of its important provisions, I know full well that it cannot be amended in its present stage, and on the motion which I have had the honor to make. We must therefore discuss it as it is presented to us, purporting to be a bill authorizing the President of the United States to appoint five major generals, ten brigadier generals, arming and equipping forty-four regiments of infantry, three regiments of riflemen, and three regiments of light artillery, of ten companies each, with the field, staff, and commissioned officers, necessary completely to organize this corps. In thus spreading before the House the principles and provisions of this bill, I call on gentlemen to pause and reflect before they adopt them. Are gentlemen aware of the immense expense which will be incurred by raising this body of troops? It may be objected, that this monstrous military force is to be under pay only while it is kept in actual service. But it ought to be remembered that, as soon as the officers are appointed and the troops are enlisted, it becomes a positive army, liable to do duty twelve months out of two years, wherever the President of the United States shall direct. Give me leave once more to call the attention of the House to the report of the Secretary of War, which, for some reason or other, he did not think proper to assign, but which I know he presented to the committee. In this report, the head of the War Department estimates the expense of fifty thousand volunteers, to be encamped only thirty days in the year, at two millions one hundred thousand dollars. I have made a calculation on this subject, and am convinced that, to provide for this army only one year, we must pay fifteen millions of dollars. Sir, the history of our Revolutionary war exhibits no example of this sort. We have at this moment, probably, about ten thousand troops in the field. To these may be added one hundred thousand militia lately put in requisition by the President of the United States, and now we are called upon to add fifty thousand regularly enlisted troops to the number.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I think it behooves us to consider well what we are about, before we proceed one step further. I know very well, and I trust, I shall always venerate the sentiment, that money is nothing when put in competition with national honor, liberty, and independence; but every one will allow that this subject is worthy of peculiar consideration at this time, more especially when, by means of the embargo, the streams of national wealth are dried up. This principle, sir, becomes all important to us, the Representatives of a free Republican Government, who ought not to lay heavy and oppressive burdens on our constituents without the most urgent necessity.

Having taken this general view of the structure, provision, and expense arising out of this bill, I will now ask the indulgence of the House, while I endeavor to lay before them the causes which induce, and the probable result and consequences which will ensue from calling such a body of troops, as this bill contemplates, into the field. That I may be the more distinctly understood I, will arrange the remarks which I propose further to make on this interesting subject, under four general heads, and I beg the attention of this honorable House while I endeavor to elucidate the follow inquiries.

1st. At whose request is this army to be engaged?

2d. What is its use and destination?

3d. What objects are to be obtained by it?

4th. What are our means to accomplish these ends?

These are questions which I deem of importance to be fully settled, before we proceed to adopt the bill now under consideration; and I hope gentlemen will give them a patient and candid examination. Perhaps the honorable Chairman who reported this bill, or some other gentleman, will be able to answer them to the satisfaction of the House. It will be fortunate if this should be the case, that we may cheerfully unite in the necessary measures of defence, and proceed with a zeal becoming a good cause, which will insure a successful termination.

I make the first inquiry. At whose request is this army to be raised? I presume every gentleman will allow that the President of the United States is the Constitutional organ by whom communications are to be made to Congress. Indeed it becomes a part of his bounden duty under the Constitution "to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." Has he made any communication to Congress intimating that such a force as this bill contemplates, would be necessary? Will gentlemen turn to the President's Message, delivered at the opening of the session, and see whether anything of this sort is there communicated? I have examined that document with critical attention, and can find nothing in it which will even justify this measure. I venture to say there is not a sentence in that communication on which this bill could be predicated. I know that this Message was dissected in due form, by some able political operator, and that several committees were raised on different portions of it; and although I had the honor to belong to that committee appointed on so much of the President's Message as relates to our Military and Naval Establishments, I have searched in vain for that part of it upon which the appointment of any such committee could be founded; excepting indeed a paragraph respecting the one hundred thousand militia which were voted at the last session, and which the President had not called into service. Now, sir, if there has nothing occurred of so alarming a nature as to justify the embodying of this detachment of militia, I cannot perceive whence the necessity arises for calling into actual service so strong a detachment of military force, or what can justify this House in adopting a measure so strong and at the same time so alarming.

Again, since the President has made no request for this immense force in time of peace, there seems to be a sort of indelicacy in the attempt thus to palm upon him, as Commander-in-Chief, an army of this magnitude without intimating its destination or use. Will any gentleman in his place inform this House (since the President, who is the only responsible character to give us the information, has not done it) that these troops are really wanted? I have before remarked that the Secretary at War has laid before us a plan to raise fifty thousand volunteers, but nothing appears in it to justify the raising of the corps proposed by this bill. Whenever volunteers have been called for by the Government, they have turned out with alacrity and zeal, officered and accoutred for service; nor can it be supposed that there is less patriotism reigning in the bosoms of our citizens at the present day than heretofore.

If the Government has any serious intention to bring a band of volunteer yeomanry into the field, of purely American character, the provisions of this bill cannot fail to defeat such intention. Depriving the troops of the accustomed privilege to serve under their own officers, will not only retard the business of engaging the men, but will have a strong tendency to make the service suspicious.

I come now to the second inquiry. What is the use and destination of this army? Inasmuch as we have no information on this head from the Executive department, I inquire, with deep solicitude, of the majority of this House, (inasmuch as they hold the destinies of our country at this portentous day,) where is this force to be directed? Against what enemy, visible or invisible, is this army of freemen to be prepared to act? Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this duty becomes so imperious upon this House, and so important to our constituents, that, without some definite information on this point, I know not how we can proceed. Since the present session commenced, we have been passing laws and adopting measures of the most serious and important consequence to this country, and, I am constrained to say, with less consideration, I fear, than the solemnity and importance of their nature seemed to demand. We are now called upon to pass a bill, placing in the hands of the Executive one of the most tremendous weapons which Government can yield. For my own part, I can discover but two objects which can be in view, in framing this present bill. This force, when raised, must be directed against an enemy, or it must be pointed against ourselves. In other words, it must be calculated to repel foreign aggression, or to enforce obedience to our laws. If it is to be employed against an enemy, it will surely become important to know specifically who that enemy is. And it is a fact somewhat singular, that, to this day, with all the noise and bluster about war, we have never been distinctly told the enemy whom we have to encounter. It is true, indeed, our Committee on Foreign Relations told us, as one alternative, that we must have a war with Great Britain and France at the same time. This affords no definite object, but it directs the attention at least towards two powerful and warlike nations, engaged in the most deadly hostility against each other. Could that committee have been in earnest, or can this House support the sentiment, when they decided the point that war must be waged with two nations contending at the same time with each other? The mode of such a warfare, (provided the three Powers should come into conflict at the same time, either by land or sea,) I humbly conceive would baffle the united wisdom of that sagacious committee, and is too ridiculous to be discussed in this House. Let us, then, inquire what are our chances for war with either of these nations, separately. Do gentlemen contemplate crossing the Atlantic to attack France, and thereby oblige Bonaparte to revoke his decrees? I presume not. Can any one say that he expects an invasion from that quarter? His want of a navy gives you the answer to this question. As to an invasion of Great Britain, or any of her West India possessions, her superior naval force fully protects her; and the experience which she derived in the late Revolutionary war will teach her not to waste her armies in so fruitless an experiment, as again to send troops to our shores. I will reserve for the next head of inquiry what may relate to conquest in our own vicinity, and remark, that, inasmuch as foreign conquest and domestic invasion must be alike improbable, I can see no use for which these troops can be wanted, but to enforce obedience to our laws. And can it be possible, Mr. Speaker, that we have come to this solemn and awful condition, that a large army must be engaged to command obedience from our citizens, at the point of the bayonet! Forbid it, Heaven! I hope and trust the state of things does not at present require it. Rather would I hope that our fears and our apprehensions greatly exceed the fact.

I know that the Committee on Foreign Relations have very gravely submitted to us three alternatives—submission, embargo, or war. By a solemn vote of this House, you have decided on the first; and, therefore, submission is out of the question. The next alternative was, the continuance of the embargo, and to this the Legislature have determined to adhere. It will not be amiss, here, to inquire what have been some of the most prominent effects resulting from our late law, "more effectually to enforce the embargo." It has been customary to drag this measure into every debate, but I trust the House will do me the justice to acknowledge that I have but rarely rung that unpleasant charge in their ears. But, in the consideration of our general policy, it is almost impossible to keep so important a measure out of view, and especially when apprehensions are entertained that the provisions of this bill have an important bearing on that question. After all the predictions which were made on the wonderful efficacy of the embargo, it has been found that it has not answered the expectations of its friends. From its frequent violations and evasions, it has been deemed necessary more rigidly to enforce it, and the late law which has passed for this purpose has excited the most serious alarm. When that law was before this House, those of us who honestly believed some of its provisions were unconstitutional, and most of its requisitions and penalties very severe, did not fail to state them to the House. They did not omit to caution gentlemen against adopting such oppressive measures, and to intimate their own apprehensions as to the effects which might be produced on the nation. Apprehensions were even entertained that in certain portions of the Union the laws relating to the embargo would not be executed, inasmuch as the habits and pursuits of the people were against the measure, and their sufferings had become intolerable. The total inefficacy of that measure, as coercive upon our enemies, was discovered, and the people perceiving no good to result from it, and nothing but positive ruin before them, it was feared that they would no longer submit to its pressure. These declarations were not then credited by a majority of this House, and now, what is the fact? Your law, in many places, has become a mere dead letter. Am I stating the case too strongly when I make this declaration? I trust not. I am apprehensive that some gentlemen who hear me are so unacquainted with the character, habits, and manners, of our Northern and Eastern inhabitants, that they may suppose I exhibit the picture in too strong and lively colors. Having resided in New England from my youth, I think I cannot mistake the character of that people; and I believe I hazard nothing when I assert, that, as to the great body of that people, your embargo laws have had all the effects which can be expected from them. The same sentiment is progressing to the South, and nothing but a hope that the hour of their relief is near keeps them from acts of opposition. In making these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I do not intimate that rebellion or direct repugnance to lawful authority will be countenanced in New England. I have too high an opinion of their intelligence, love of order, and regard for the Constitution and laws of the land, to believe anything like this will take place. But, knowing their rights, they will guard them with the most scrupulous jealousy. No people are more obedient to the law, and none more ready to seek redress for injuries under the guardian protection of the law and the Constitution. Should the General Government at any time oppress them, they will not fly in the face of the law, and excite insurrection and revolt, but they will seek redress and protection under the government of the States, solemnly guarantied by the General Government. Those State prerogatives, which they never have surrendered, are the strong barriers against the powers and usurpations of the General Government, and on these the duration of this Government must in a great measure depend.

Here Mr. NICHOLAS called Mr. TALLMADGE to order, as having understood him to say there was no disposition in the General Government to save the people from oppression, and that the State Legislatures ought to protect their citizens against the authority of the General Government.

Mr. TALLMADGE explained. He maintained that he had advanced no such sentiments as had been imputed to him. He was only stating a possible case, and thence inferring the right of the citizen.

Mr. NICHOLAS withdrew his call, and the SPEAKER requested Mr. TALLMADGE to proceed.

Mr. TALLMADGE continued. I was about to state, when I was interrupted, that, if the General Government should pass unconstitutional and oppressive laws, (which, Heaven forbid!) depriving the citizen of his rights, by resorting to the Constitution and laws of the State, he would find redress; and on this I consider our safety materially to depend. In fact, sir, the existence of the one is so deeply interwoven with the prosperity of the other, that without the continuance of your State governments, in full energy and power, the General Government must inevitably fall. To obtain and secure this fair inheritance, I have passed through a long and bloody Revolution. To enjoy the blessings of a good Government, under a Federal Constitution, I put everything at my command at hazard; and all my services have been employed to defend and establish the liberties of my country. I humbly trust it will not now be supposed that I should rejoice to see the Constitution prostrated, which was the consummation of our independence, and the order and harmony of the Union subverted by anarchy and rebellion. After this declaration, I hope the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NICHOLAS) will have no doubts respecting my political creed.

Mr. Speaker, I have been insensibly led off from the course which I marked out for myself by this unexpected interruption, but will now resume my original design.

Every gentleman within the sound of my voice will delight to cherish that commendable jealousy which freemen exhibit when troops are raised and quartered among them in time of peace. Can I not impress a belief on this House that many portions of our country are seriously alarmed, on receiving information that this bill was about to be brought forward? Is it not enough that the late enforcing embargo law should have excited so much sensibility, that another, not less alarming, should be brought to its final passage in this House? I deem it my duty to spread before the Representatives of the people their apprehensions as well as their sufferings. When we see those primary assemblies begin to give the watchword, be assured that they consider danger to be near. In some town and country meetings we find resolutions have been adopted, and as if grieved and disheartened by neglect, they forbear to ask redress at your hands, and determine to look to their State Governments for relief. Nay, further, where your late embargo law has been put in execution, the interference of legal State process has been resorted to, to save the citizens from ruin. The necessary tendency of this course is to bring the General and State Governments into collision, the fatal consequences of which need not be pointed out. If, however, such a monstrous military force shall at any time become necessary to force the obedience to any law, this argument alone should satisfy our rulers that all is not right, and that it is high time to pause if not to repeal.

Having attempted to demonstrate to this House that the army contemplated by this bill, cannot be wanted for foreign aggression, or to repel domestic invasion—and ardently hoping that it is not intended to enforce the embargo laws, I cannot believe that there exists any sufficient cause for passing the bill now before the House. I know full well that we have been shamefully treated and our rights have been grossly violated by both the belligerent nations across the Atlantic; nor will I attempt in any measure to justify or palliate those wrongs. Having expressed my sentiments on this subject on a former occasion, I will not detain the House to repeat them again. The important question arising out of this condition, is, how shall we obtain the most effectual redress? This brings me to the third head of my inquiries.

What objects are to be obtained by this armament?

If war is the real object, I would observe that its principles should be well defined: its ends must be probable of accomplishment; it must be manifestly just; and above all, it must be approved by the people. I have before said that in foreign conquest we have nothing to gain. Let us briefly imagine what can be done nearer home. Canada is the first object worthy of attack, if we should commence a war with Great Britain. Some gentlemen who have advocated this sentiment in this House, appear to me to speak of it as if it would be a piece of amusement, a mere pastime; or at any rate an achievement which could be easily effected. But, sir, a project of this sort should be examined with great coolness and deliberation. Gentlemen should look at it with a scrutinizing military eye. Have you any documents to show the regular military force in the province of Canada, and the present state of their fortifications? Can any gentleman tell me the provisions there deposited in case of a siege? You well remember, Mr. Speaker, the failure of an expedition into Canada during the Revolutionary war, and the unfortunate issue of an attack upon the city of Quebec. Every gentleman on this floor must be acquainted with the history of those events; and if at that period our enterprise proved so unsuccessful, it should not be rashly undertaken now, when every preparation for defence is doubled, and perhaps to fourfold. If I know anything of that province, the regular troops for its defence may be estimated at about 10,000 men, and the city of Quebec at this time is completely fortified. I am not about to say that the capture of those parts and the reduction of that province could not be effected by the United States; but I do say that it would not be found so easy of accomplishment as some gentlemen seem to imagine; and when effected would but poorly repay us for all our expense of blood and treasure. A possibility, however, that we might not succeed, should make us cautious how we provoke a war in which no durable good can be promised, and which may terminate in disgrace.

But admit, for argument sake, that we should be successful, and the Province of Canada should change masters, is it an acquisition worth the price which we should probably pay for it? What advantages would result from such an event to the United States? Most assuredly we have no occasion for any increase of territory, and from such a heterogeneous mass of population, I very much question whether our Republican Government would be much strengthened. In addition to this, we must take into the account that this province, having long been held by a military Government, could never be preserved by us but by a large standing army. This engine of despotism should never be introduced into a free, Republican Government, except on the most urgent occasion, and as speedily as possible should return to the walks of civil life. If, therefore, the acquisition of this province cannot be justified in a political view, surely the prospect of plunder, or the gratifying of the passion of revenge, will never induce a magnanimous people to make war. All the reasons which can be urged in favor of such an expedition are at variance with the fundamental principles of our Republican institutions, and of course ought to be discounted when it is not engaged in from the most urgent necessity, in defence of our country's rights. The same remarks which have been submitted against an expedition into Canada for the purpose of conquest; will apply with double force respecting Halifax. In the former case, troops might be taken to the scene of action without much naval force; in the latter, the attempt would be futile without a superior fleet. In every light, therefore, in which the subject has been presented to my mind, I cannot perceive that the substantial interests of our country would be promoted by commencing war for such a purpose. Nations, more than individuals, ought to take counsel of reason, and not from passion; the latter of which, from some inflammatory speeches delivered on this floor, some might conclude we were about to pursue.

Again, one prominent object to be obtained by a dispute with Great Britain, is the freedom of the seas, and that free ships shall make free goods. Is there a man within these walls who believes that we can oblige Great Britain to concede this point? Whether it be right or wrong is not the question, but whether the United States have power to coerce and establish that principle.

Sir, if the whole force contemplated by this bill should be raised, and Canada with all its dependencies should be taken, do gentlemen seriously believe that our maritime rights would thereby be secured, and Great Britain obliged to yield what we may consider her unjust usurpations? If I know anything of the policy which governs that nation, I think it would not. Although I never would submit by acknowledging that to be just which militates against national honor and moral right, yet sound policy may sometimes dictate an endurance of smaller evils for a time, rather than expose a nation to the calamities of war, a fortunate issue to which cannot insure the blessings for which you contend. Suppose that, after a contest of six, eight, or ten years, a peace could be obtained, and by treaty all should be yielded that we contend for. Experience has fully demonstrated that when the most solemn treaties interfere with the ambitious views of a potent nation, they are considered as having no binding force. During the present contest between Great Britain and France, the most solemn stipulations by treaties, and the long settled principles acknowledged by the law of nations, have been violated without any apology, and treated with contempt. From this view of the subject, therefore, I think it clearly follows that a war cannot be justified, and of course the troops proposed to be raised by this bill are unnecessary. If gentlemen are correct in their opinions respecting the policy of this Government, then indeed, whenever a treaty is infringed, or any foreign regulation is adopted by which our commerce shall be restricted, we must be doomed to pass over the same ground again. Non-importation, embargo, and non-intercourse laws must be passed; and in attempting to starve our enemy, we shall go far towards ruining ourselves. Although it may be foreign to the present question to go into an examination of our foreign commerce, yet I cannot forbear to remark, in opposition to many statements which have been made on this floor, that the amount of all British manufactures imported into this country, for our own consumption, does not exceed $25,000,000, which is about one-tenth of all the exports of goods manufactured in Great Britain. Having found out other resources from whence the raw materials for her manufactures can be obtained, and sufficient demands for all her goods, she must look on with a sort of laughing indifference at our new invented mode of national suicide.

The next point in my division of this subject is to inquire what are our means to accomplish this object? In a Government like ours, professing to have no secrets, the resources which we can command and our general policy are almost as well known to foreign nations as to ourselves. I trust I shall, therefore, not be accused of exposing the secrets of the Government when I state my full conviction that we have not the means necessary to carry on a bold and efficient war. As I have before stated, so I am fully convinced that the people would make astonishing exertions, and all reasonable sacrifices, when great emergencies occur; and especially when called upon in defence of their dearest rights. But when they shall be invited to support measures so expensive as the one now under consideration, it becomes necessary for the Representatives of the people to reflect whether it is such an one as they will cheerfully support. By examining the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be seen that we have but about three millions of unappropriated revenue; and one important lesson is taught by that report, of which this House will do well to take notice, that a rigid perseverance in the system of embargo will dry up the principal streams by which the national Treasury was supplied. Sir, the destruction of our commerce is necessarily followed, under our present system of finance, by national poverty and distress. For more than thirteen months we have been in the full tide of experiment on a system which not only discourages the laudable enterprise of our most industrious citizens, but strikes at the very root of our fiscal arrangements. What a solemn spectacle, Mr. Speaker, do we exhibit to the world at this day! A great commercial people, and second to but one nation on the globe, retiring from the ocean, by the pursuits of which our wealth and importance was increasing with every passing gale; coercing this abandonment, by the most severe laws, and maintaining them at an enormous expense; and when this novel experiment has failed to produce the benefits and blessings which its advocates and friends predicted, we are called upon to prepare for war. Yes, sir, when the very siwews of war have been thus broken or destroyed, and poverty and disgrace stare us in the face, we are presented with a Military Establishment which might make an opulent nation groan. To what sources can you resort to support this heavy expense? Loans and taxes are the dernier resort: and are the gentlemen now in power ready to adopt this system, for the purpose of carrying on a war—a system, too, which, in better days, they scouted as ruinous to this country? They surely cannot have forgotten the complaints which were then made against such a system, inasmuch as to these may be attributed their present elevation to power. If taxes should be resorted to, being deprived of the benefits of commerce, the merchant and the farmer have nothing to pay. Loans may answer a temporary call, but without any means to discharge them, these must necessarily fail. During the late Revolutionary war, these were carried to their utmost extent, and to this day we feel their effects. However willing our constituents may be to discharge that debt, which was the price of our independence, it behooves us well to consider how we increase their burdens. I have not the smallest doubt but the people of America would support almost any burdens which the Legislature might impose, to maintain the legitimate principles of our Constitution and Government; but the means and the end must be satisfactorily exhibited to their view. The question is not whether you will borrow money, but whether the object for which it is wanted is of such primary importance as to justify the measure. Let the safety, the honor, and the liberties of our country be at stake, and every honest man in the community will support you in their defence, and with one heart bid you God speed.

Sir, in making these remarks upon the bill now under consideration, I wish not to be understood as considering war the greatest calamity that possibly can befall us. National dishonor and disgrace—mean and abject submission, bring with them a train of evils more injurious to the community, than war with all its horrors. If I understand gentlemen on the subject of submission, I cannot fully accord in the doctrines which they advance. To oppose such a system as this, would argue neither wisdom nor courage. The duties imposed on neutral commerce by the British Orders in Council, may be highly injurious and oppressive; but will a war against that nation, with all our means of annoyance, induce her to change her course, during the present contest, or secure to us the rights which we claim? Much has been said respecting the duty which she lays on our exports to the European continent, as even more oppressive than a tax collected in our own ports. To this I cannot subscribe, although I detest the principle, and deprecate the evils which result from it.

Suppose the Dey of Algiers had the unlimited control of the Straits of Gibraltar, and demanded a toll of every ship or vessel that passed into the Mediterranean sea, as Denmark has long done at the Sound. Although this is a duty or toll, yet the merchant calculates the profits of his voyage into the Baltic or Mediterranean seas, with the encumbrance of this duty, and pursues or omits it, as his views of advantage shall dictate. But gentlemen say, our vessels are forced into British ports by their armed cruisers, contrary to their inclinations. This, probably, arises out of the state of her contest with France; for, while each is bent on the destruction of the other, both are determined that our commerce shall not be carried on but for their individual benefit, to the ruin of the enemy. While Great Britain imposes a duty, France burns or confiscates the whole. In this situation, are we to submit? I answer, no. A question of policy is here to be settled, whether a commerce thus fettered and thus obstructed, is worthy of our pursuit? And, although it may be restricted as to some particular place or country, still the wants and privations of one port will be supplied by the surplus productions of another. I have made these remarks, Mr. Speaker, to prove the impolicy of a favorite measure of the Government, which, in its operation, severely bears upon the honest exertions of our citizens, and utterly disqualifies our country from carrying on a war.

Some gentlemen seem to imagine that this Government is almost omnipotent. A republican Government is undoubtedly the most potent, for all the purposes of protection and defence, of any Government on earth. But, to answer this end, it must rest on public opinion, and be approved by the citizens at large, whose love of order and the Constitution will induce them to support its measures. When the public sentiment can thus be insensibly borne along with the operations of the Government, the impression is irresistible. Let the most despotic Power on earth, the French Emperor, for instance, attempt to enforce a particular measure; he takes with him his legions, and obedience for a time is complete. But, when his myrmidons are removed, the former state of things is restored, and his authority is disregarded. But the laws of a free, republican Government, are enforced by the cheerful acquiescence of all its citizens.

In addition to the four principal objections which I have stated to this bill, I have another which relates to our militia establishments, and which its provisions, I think, will very materially affect. No explicit provision is made with respect to the mode of obtaining recruits—whether when so engaged they are to be excused from militia duty or not—whether the officers of the militia would be received if they should tender their services with their men, and by what tenure the troops will be held to perform service. I know that a certain bounty is to be paid, and clothing to be furnished, and public arms to be supplied;

but when this expense is incurred, how are these straggling recruits to be collected from the various parts of this extensive country, to attend on days for exercise, and appointed periods for encampment? If martial law is to be enforced against every delinquent, I fear a gallows would be erected in every county through the Union. According to this bill, encampments are to be made in every State and Territory, the evil effects of which I am convinced will be felt, not only by those who may enter upon this new military career, but also by all the adjacent country.

When I contemplate the military preparations which have already been sanctioned by this Government, consisting of regular troops, and the militia put in requisition by the President of the United States, while the country is in a state of profound peace, I am led very seriously to pause and look about me. If this bill should pass, (and from the strong support it has hitherto received we have but too much reason to fear it,) you will have placed under the immediate control of the Executive about one hundred and sixty thousand men. Truly, Mr. Speaker, this sounds almost too high for a Republican Government, and not being accustomed to such a display of military force, I am free to declare my apprehensions and alarm. My fears are by no means diminished when I consider that these very troops may be employed to enforce the embargo, than which nothing could more thoroughly alarm the minds of our citizens. Although the funeral of this wonderful magician, in some parts of our country, is said to have gone by, yet in this day of new things, I fear something may arise from its ashes equally disgusting. Should your non-intercourse bill be advocated with as much zeal as was the embargo, it may be matured and in full vigor before the end of the coming week, and needing the assistance of this establishment to enforce it. Having no desire to see our civil laws enforced at the point of the bayonet, I do in this public manner protest against this measure as unwise, and not called for by the urgency of the occasion.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to lay before this honorable House some of the most prominent features of this bill, and have considered it both in relation to peace and war, as highly objectionable. If I have been correctly understood I shall be glad, and will thank any gentleman to obviate and remove my objections, if they are not well founded.

Ever since the publication of that famous report, made by our Committee of Foreign Relations, the majority of this House, and I may add a considerable portion of the body politic, seem to have adopted the same course of reasoning, and come to the same result. Submission, embargo, or war, have been the alternatives proposed, and those who have dared to question this political creed, like heretics of old, have been proscribed. Not being soundly orthodox in modern politics, I dislike the whole. The first I absolutely reject—the second I wish to have removed, and the third I hope to avoid. Like a medical prescription, however unpleasant to the palate, I would try to swallow the potion, if I could discover any possible good to result from it. When I hear gentlemen very gravely declare on this floor, that they are nearly prepared to exchange the embargo for war, I am almost induced to doubt my own understanding. What, sir, will you first paralyze the energies of the nation, and then call on the people to go to war? This illusion must be dissipated. What would be thought of a physician who should tell his patient, "if you should choose to get up from a bed of sickness, you must submit to have a limb amputated, although not necessary to your recovery?" Sir, he would be considered a madman; and though a person might consent to such an operation, if it became really necessary, yet on the doctrine of alternatives, thus presented, he would reject it.

Mr. Speaker, this nation is sick, dangerously sick, and the relief is in our power. For several years past we have been trying experiments, and have left the path of sound experience. As many wise men predicted, when this system was adopted, we have got almost to the precipice from which one fatal experiment more may plunge us into ruin. As soon as we began to vary from that course of policy which Washington pointed out, our political hemisphere was darkened, and collisions with foreign nations ensued. Our first resort was to a non-importation law; but as this did not work a cure of the evil, the embargo was determined on as the infallible remedy. This experiment also failing, we are now comforted with the belief that a non-intercourse may perhaps effect the purpose, and if that should fail, we are promised the blessings of war, preparatory to which, this bill for raising an army is offered for adoption. Indeed some gentlemen have claimed a sort of pledge from this House that we will go to war (about the first of June next I believe) before they will consent to repeal the embargo laws. This pledge is too great, and this reasoning too profound for me. May God deliver us from such a restorative system as this!

If there ever was a time demanding serious deliberation, it is the present. We ought to pause and examine well our ground before we proceed one step further. From the ray of light which I discover in our eastern horizon, I am induced to hope that a brighter day may succeed. To effect this, I hesitate not to say we must retrace our steps and materially alter our political course. Let not gentlemen startle at this idea; it is a subject fit only for great minds to contemplate, and for honest men to accomplish. Our system of depletion and self-punishment must be given up; and an honorable, equal, and dignified policy towards foreign nations must form the basis of our negotiations, and we may hope for success. Our situation, though hazardous, is not hopeless; and if the beacons which have been erected should not be totally mistaken, those who may soon take the helm of state cannot fail to pursue a different course.

A few words more, and I have done. The Union of these States appears to me so important to the peace, prosperity, and protection of all its parts, that I cannot express my regret when I hear the sentiment avowed, that a separation must take place. I think such a project ought not to be familiarized even in idea, and everything tending to irritation should be discouraged. Degrading distinctions and odious epithets, applied to any portion of our citizens, cannot be justified. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE) denominated those who opposed the embargo, old tories, British agents, or corrupted by British gold, he surely must have forgotten that some of the first men in the nation, and native Americans too, believe that measure to be unwise, and even unconstitutional. Some of our State Legislatures have also ventured to question the policy of this law, and even the power delegated to the General Government to enact it.

I consider it no compliment to be told, as we frequently are, by the gentlemen in the majority, that the Federal Republicans are as honest and as patriotic as any other part of the community. It is to be presumed we all have the same end in view, the good of our common country; but we have different ways of pursuing it. We are all embarked on board the same national ship, and must swim or sink together. Our united efforts are needed at this perilous crisis to preserve our national and State prerogatives distinct and entire. By the blessing of God on our faithful exertions, the Constitution and Government may be preserved; and the people, under a wise Administration, will be prosperous and happy. Notwithstanding some gentlemen on this floor, from the peculiar ardency of their spirits, and an honorable indignation at the authors of our wrongs, may urge us to war, I am opposed to such a measure at the present time, and therefore hope the motion which I have had the honor to make will prevail.

Mr. LYON followed on the same side in a speech of an hour, when the House adjourned without taking a question.

SATURDAY, January 28.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with a report and statement prepared in obedience to the provisions of "An act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks, and to authorize the laying out of certain roads, and for other purposes;" which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of certain Alabama Indians," was read twice and committed to the Committee on the Public Lands, to consider and report thereon to the House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act establishing Circuit Courts and abridging the jurisdiction of the District Courts of the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio,'" was read three times and passed.

On motion of Mr. WHARTON,

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House to whom was committed, on the thirty-first ultimo, the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act establishing Circuit Courts, and abridging the jurisdiction of the District Courts of the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio,'" be discharged from the consideration of the same.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the engrossed bill providing an additional military force—Mr. TALLMADGE's motion for indefinite postponement depending.

Mr. TAYLOR said: I am against the motion for a postponement of the consideration of the present bill indefinitely, because I believe the situation of the nation to be now such, that a further postponement of measures calculated for the defence of the country, would be little short of an abandonment of the interests and honor of this people. I do suppose, sir, that it is the opinion of a majority of this House, that the system of resistance to foreign aggression upon the ocean by a retirement from it, is to be given up. It will be recollected, that at the last session, I expressed my belief, that whenever the Legislature found this system to fail of its intended effects, they would, in a reasonable time, abandon it. I then believed that it was the best calculated of any measure which could be adopted to strike home to that nation which has done us the most harm; and although I still believe it to be the best system we could rely upon, yet, as it has met with resistance in its execution from a portion of our own people, rather than enforce it at the point of the bayonet and the expense of the blood of our own citizens, I would be willing to give it up. In speaking of resistance to our laws, I would not be understood as meaning to imply that there has been open rebellion. I mean that Constitutional resistance which has been manifested to the Eastward; that judicial resistance which has induced many to believe that the system would be better abandoned than to run the risk of producing more serious evils. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that these appeals from the laws have not been found to be general throughout the United States, yet they will have all the effect upon foreign nations as if such appeals had been universal. I allude to the transactions in the town of Boston—to the resignation of the collector of that port—and I may add, that of the collector of the port of Providence, with the occurrences which have taken place in the harbor of New York. To all these I may add the circumstance of the British armed vessels which have appeared on our Southern coast, for the purpose of forcing a trade in cotton. In this state of things, I do believe that the time when it would be proper to remove the embargo has arrived; in fact, I consider it, as to its effect, as removed already.

Thus, sir, the consideration of the alternatives proposed to the nation at the commencement of the session again recurs, to wit, embargo, submission, or war. The solemn vote which has been taken upon this subject, at an early period, to say nothing else, puts submission entirely out of the question, and it seems now to be the general opinion that the embargo is to be given up. The last, then, is all which is left to us.

Having got thus far, I will endeavor to answer a remark made some time since by a gentleman from Virginia in relation to this subject; and I am glad the gentleman left the difficult question of tribute to be digested by those in opposition to the Administration. I have heard, sir, the very language of Mr. Canning introduced upon this floor, to prove that Great Britain had a right to retaliate upon France by resorting to the measure, which I trust will always be considered as obnoxious to the rights and independence of this country. But a minute's examination of the most common mind in the United States will expose the fallacy of the doctrine. An argument used by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. TALLMADGE) was, that the tax levied by Great Britain could not be held as being a tribute, for we were not obliged to pay it if we did not choose; that it was a mere matter of calculation as to interest, and nothing more. It is strange, indeed; that thirty years of residence in a land of liberty, and of devotion to its service, should have put such an argument into that gentleman's mouth. This, sir, was the very principle against which, in the difficult times of our Revolution, that gentleman so ably fought. If I were disposed to follow the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. LYON,) and to erect on my desk files of newspapers, I could, by a recurrence to those of that day, prove that this was the very language made use of by Lord North in the British Parliament. In speaking of the tax upon tea, this was his very position, that the Americans were not obliged to pay it, unless they chose to do so. But, sir, are we now to drink this bitter cup? I trust not. This question has all the original force which it had under the Administration of Lord North. An American vessel, trading up the Mediterranean, is arrested by a British cruiser at the pillars of Hercules, and carried back to Great Britain to pay the tax levied by the Orders in Council; and is this a free choice left to us? Are we at liberty to pay, or omit to do it? No, sir. The ocean has been assimilated by some gentlemen to a cornfield, in which the American merchant reaps a glorious harvest. Well, sir, suppose one in private life was to shut up the gate which led to his neighbor's cornfield, and tell him that, unless he would pay a certain toll, he should not pass. Would any man in this country submit to it? Most assuredly not. And will the New Englanders, to whom the ocean is "an inheritance," consent to have it wrested from them by the impositions of Great Britain, and agree to pay them for a license to make use of their own undisputed rights? I do not think they will.

The fact is, the Orders of Council cannot be defended. They have, in this point of view, been but slightly touched upon, and the truth is, that they cannot be otherwise than slightly touched upon. It is a subject which, at once, goes to the heart and the feelings of every American, and it would be in vain that any one would attempt to persuade the people of this country that the Orders in Council can, in a single point of view, be justified with regard to us.

Great complaint has been made that abuse has been poured out by the friends of the Administration against the conduct of Great Britain, while they say nothing about the unfriendly and unjustifiable treatment we have received from France. In relation to this I would premise, that as to intention, I believe these Powers to be alike; they are equally willing to injure us, as their interests or caprice may demand. But Great Britain has had a greater opportunity to make us feel her enmity than the other, by having the command of the ocean. From this circumstance arises the reason of the animadversions against the conduct of England; and France, not having ships, has not been in a situation to molest our commerce, or to intercept our trade. This fact will not be denied. A gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. R. JACKSON,) when asked by my colleague, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) in debate, whether the insurance office to which he belongs, in Providence, would insure a vessel to the Continent, declined answering, or declared that he did not know whether it would. But it would not be done. The risk is equal to the whole value of the cargo, and the books of the gentleman's house would show it. That gentleman has declared that there was, on the contrary, but little risk in going to Great Britain, for there could be no fear of interruptions from France, her naval force being annihilated. It has been proved, that the risk to France, or to any part of the Continent, amounts to at least ninety per cent. By statements of rates of insurances in England and elsewhere, the political risk to the Continent will amount to the sum I have stated. Thus the reason of the complaints against England is manifest. She has had the greater opportunity, and has therefore done us the most injury, though I would be clearly understood as thinking both the aggressing nations upon an equality as to intention.

Upon the talk of war, it has been asked how can we fight both nations. Sir, I can understand this subject perfectly well. I perceive very clearly before me two of the pillars which support the splendid dome under which we are assembled; but it would be very plain, that if I set my back against one of the two, I could only behold the other. This is the case with gentlemen when they lean their backs against the pillar, Great Britain. It is evident that, in speaking of war, they cannot see England and France together; they can alone discern France. In addition to the objection of not being able to fight both nations, another has been brought forward to the raising of the Army, to wit: that it must be intended to enforce the embargo laws. For my part, sir, I will unequivocally declare, that I would never consent to the employment of a single regular soldier for the enforcement of any law, nor for that of the embargo. Now, if there be not virtue enough in the country to see the laws respected, if the militia of the different States are inadequate to this purpose, I would not employ a single regular to do it. I do not believe that the troops contemplated to be raised by this bill are intended for the purpose of enforcing the embargo; nor would I vote for its passage if I could persuade myself that this was to be its object. But it has been said, that if you put yourself in a situation to commence hostilities, you will go to war. I will also unequivocally declare, that this is my object. What have we done, sir? We have sent missions to Europe; we have sued for reparation; and, instead of receiving redress, wrongs have accumulated upon us. Does this look like a disposition to do us justice? We have been driven into our present situation by foreign outrage; and, after they have thus received from us notice of our intention, should they not retract, I am willing to strike a blow, and a blow, at the same time, which I believe will be felt.

Gentlemen have asked if we can obtain redress by going to war and taking Canada? Yes, sir, we can do it by taking Canada. It was a declaration of a great English statesman, "that Great Britain conquered France in America;" and was not England once conquered in America? She was, and may again be here conquered. We are not able to contend with her upon her own element; but upon that where we can attack her with advantage, the land, we must hope for success. I would not take the enraged bull by the horns, but in that part whereby I would stand the best chance of worrying him to death.

A great deal of recrimination has been used upon this floor to prove that the Southern States are inimical to commerce. This is to say that they have neither sense or policy, nor can understand their own interests. The subject has been so often brought up, and so frequently answered, that I am almost ashamed now to mention it. It cannot be supposed that the Southern States would wilfully seek their own destruction; that they would commit a felo de se upon their own wealth. No, sir! the Southern States rather deserve the thanks than recriminations at the hands of those who accuse us. What has been the situation of these States? They could have had their produce carried by foreign vessels; they had in this respect everything which they could wish, and if they had followed a selfish policy, instead of making a common cause with the commercial States, they would, in this state of things, have left them to contend alone, and have taken the British carrier. What was the reason we did not? Because we felt that we were a nation, united by the indissoluble bonds of friendship, and common interests. We thought that we were made for each other, associated for mutual protection, and as much bound together as were our first parents, Adam and Eve. We did not think upon the little embarrassments which might result to us, when we knew that we had brothers who were feeling the lash of the cat-o'-nine-tails, at the gangways of British men of war. We had no property afloat that would induce us to come forward with a non-importation law which was to affect us more than it could our Eastern brethren.

No, sir, it was for their interest that we consented to the law. We afterwards adopted the embargo system, and this affects the planting and farming interest as much, to say the least of it, as it does the commercial. And for whom was all this done? For those who are now the foremost to accuse us of hostility to their welfare. It was not for our own immediate interest, and if we had not now national feelings which get the better of the disgusts such accusations are calculated to excite, we would go back to the situation which we have left, and allow the British vessels upon our coast that monopoly of trade they so much desire. But we will go yet further than we have done, and sooner than yield up commerce, we will give another pledge for its maintenance and defence. We are ready to risk the property and blood of our citizens in behalf of the rights of our commercial brethren. To show that I am in earnest, I will, as one, not only risk my property, but my life, in defence of the commercial rights of my country; and it is for this purpose that I advocate the passage of the present bill. It is time that this nation should look to itself for redress, and not to the justice of European nations. We must now depend upon ourselves alone, and we should be prepared manfully to meet the event.

I will say, however, that the war, if we should have one, must be at the door, and be upon the responsibility of those people who have denied to us the use of the first system which had been adopted by the nation. Those who have refused us a fair trial of the embargo, at their door be the responsibility of any other resort. The unbiassed judgment of future times will decide upon the motives which have actuated us, and instead of looking upon this as an attempt to destroy commerce, posterity will regard it as a noble effort of patriotism for its maintenance, and as one which, if persisted in, would have secured our right more effectually than could have been done by the most brilliant military achievement. But it was not allowed to us to prove the experiment, which, in all human probability, would have put into our hands the weapon whereby we would be enabled always successfully to combat the European Powers; and having done this, I hope we will meet a firm support in the only system which is yet left for us to pursue.

Sir, we must recall the energies of the nation. Gentlemen forget that this is precisely the point which was in dispute at the commencement of the Revolution. We are told that we will have to borrow money, and that we will plunge the nation into debt. Do we not, sir, almost adore the name of WASHINGTON and his glorious compatriots? They left us a national debt, and yet we thank them; we feel towards them unbounded gratitude, and can we suppose that posterity will be less virtuous than we have been? I do not believe that they will. They would also thank us, and feel for us an equal gratitude.

I cannot believe that these men are in all respects regular troops, but I think that there are features in the bill which our habits incline us always to look upon with jealousy. But these men are only to be called from their usual occupations for a short time in each year, and their partialities as well as friendships, with the great mass of the citizens, would render them less to be feared than a body of standing troops. It has been thought necessary to have a body of this kind, which, though not composed of regulars, might serve all the purposes for which such an army could be wanted. It is true the Constitution allows us to call upon the militia for the public defence, but it prohibits the marching of them out of the limits of the United States. The men proposed to be raised by this bill can answer every purpose of a regular army; and I will state, in alluding to this subject, that I am looking upon the taking of Canada in the event of a war. I confess that I regard the possessions of the British in North America, as of much more consequence than seems to be supposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TALLMADGE.) In one point of view, the possession of Canada would preclude all that facility of smuggling which has been laid hold of since the laying of the embargo. The shortening of the line would, for the future, in a great measure prevent this. But when we consider that, by means of the footing in Canada, Great Britain has it in her power always to interfere with our Indian neighbors, and to invite them to turn their arms against us, it is of the greatest importance to prevent her from having an influence so dangerous to our peace and safety. An objection to the possession of Canada by the United States has been, that it will lead to an incorporation of the inhabitants of that province with our own citizens. Sir, I can see no good objection to such an incorporation, and I would fear no bad effects from it.

JANUARY, 1809.

Additional Military Force.

I believe that the United States must have the coast of Halifax if they mean to feel as an independent and sovereign nation. We must have that point if we ever mean to have a security for our West India trade; and it is as necessary to us as Gibraltar is to the British. All our vessels, when they proceed to the West Indies, pass directly by the mouth of Halifax, and are at the mercy of the British cruisers. If we are to become a naval nation, we will want that position, and we should have it. It is a point from which we could at any time sweep the whole commerce of Europe in these seas. But you are told that Great Britain will have a pledge for the restoration of this territory. Well, sir, and does it not behoove us to have a pledge also? It certainly does. I do not, however, so readily believe that she could have a pledge. New Orleans has been hinted at as being the most likely place at which she would aim; but the dispositions which will be made there, and the increase of force that will no doubt be assigned to it, must render that port impregnable.

The gentleman from Connecticut says, that we will have always to keep on foot immense armies to retain Canada after we should have taken it. What, sir, is the reason that we have not had to maintain an army to preserve New York, or any other place which we have wrested out of the hands of the British? I do believe that if we had Canada, the virtue of the citizens, as has been heretofore the case, would secure to us its possession.

Mr. T. concluded by observing, that the Southern people had a common interest with the Eastern. If the country should fall through foreign influence, we are willing to go all lengths with them. Should the country triumph, we will rejoice with them. In prosperity we will participate the blessings of union and peace, and if we fall, we shall share an equal fate. I, therefore, hope that this bill will not be postponed, but that it will be adopted by a large majority of the House.

Mr. PITKIN.—The subject now before us, Mr. Speaker, is of more importance to this nation than any that has presented itself since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor; and I can assure you, I never rose to address the House when I felt as much embarrassed as I do at the present moment, an embarrassment arising not only from the magnitude of the subjects which are brought into discussion, but from a consciousness of my inability to do them justice. Believing, however, as I do, that the course of measures which is now pursuing, (and of which the raising a regular army of fifty thousand men, as contemplated by the bill now under consideration, is a prominent feature,) will lead this nation to inevitable ruin; believing that not only the present, but the future happiness of this country does, in a great degree, depend on the fate of this bill, I cannot resist the impulse of duty which I feel, to use my feeble efforts to arrest its progress. Being one of a small minority, which has been so often proscribed, and whose views and whose motives have been so often questioned, and made the subject of obloquy and reproach, I can scarcely expect that anything I can offer will even attract the attention of a majority of the members of this House, much less influence their decision. I will, however, beg their indulgence, while I call their attention to the objects for which this army is to be raised.

The Committee of Foreign Relations have told us that we must have either embargo or war; in raising this military force, therefore, it is believed gentlemen can have but one of those two objects in view, either to enforce the embargo laws at the point of the bayonet, or to carry on a defensive or offensive war. I can never, sir, give my consent to the measure for the first of these objects. I have never believed that the embargo, as a measure of coercion on foreign nations, if ever so strictly enforced, would produce the effects which have been contemplated. Did I believe otherwise, did I concur in opinion with the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. TAYLOR,) that the embargo was a war, more warlike than war itself, as he has expressed himself; did I believe that, by withdrawing ourselves from the ocean for a short time, we could ever traverse it in every direction, without fear of interruption from the insults and aggressions of the belligerents; could I believe that it was the political philosopher's stone, which, by its gentle touch, would turn all our national wrongs into national rights, I would hail it with joy as the harbinger of a perpetual peace, and would even be willing that it should be enforced by military power.

But, sir, not being satisfied that these objects can be attained by the embargo, I cannot consent that it shall be enforced in a manner which can only bring distress and ruin upon ourselves.

The advocates of this novel mode of warfare under the name of coercion, have urged that it will seriously affect Great Britain in three ways, and thereby compel her to do us justice. First, by depriving her of the necessities of life, such as provisions, for which she is dependent upon us. Second, by depriving her of many raw materials, necessary for her manufactures, and particularly cotton, and also of naval stores and lumber, all of which, it is said, she can now obtain from no other country but this. Third, that as her manufactures are now excluded from the continent of Europe, by excluding them from the United States also, her manufactures, on which her national existence depends, must fail.

Will gentlemen pardon me if I examine this subject a little in detail? In doing this, I hope that no one will consider that it is my intention, much less my wish to depreciate the value of the commerce of this country. No, sir; our commerce is highly valuable not only to ourselves, but to foreign nations, and particularly Great Britain; my only object is, to show, in the present state of the world, that we have overrated it as a measure of coercion. It is said that the British West Indies are absolutely dependent upon us for provisions and for lumber, &c. There is no doubt but that the United States, from their local situation, from the nature of their productions, and from the superior industry and enterprise of their citizens, are able to afford supplies to the West India islands at a cheaper rate than any other country. But, does it follow that they cannot obtain them from any other quarter? Corn, and other articles of provision, can be raised in the islands themselves; and large supplies of lumber can be obtained from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia. During the last Summer they were in part supplied from the Spanish Main with live stock, which they had heretofore received principally from New England, and at a much cheaper rate than they obtained them from us. With respect to lumber, I have been informed, and I believe the information to be correct, that during the last Summer a single contract was entered into in Canada to supply lumber, to the amount of half a million sterling; and I do know that many of our citizens have gone into that province for the express purpose of obtaining that article.

In order to show the importance of the West Indies to the mother country, it has been stated that a large proportion of the revenue of Great Britain arises from duties on articles of West India produce, and particularly on sugar and coffee; and, as I have understood from a gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. DAVID R. WIL-LIAMS,) to the amount of about one-third of her revenue.

[Here Mr. WILLIAMS explained, and stated that he only said it amounted to one-third of the customs]

Mr. P. continued.—I will not undertake to state the amount of the revenue arising from the customs, as they are called; they may amount to fifteen or twenty millions. But, sir, the duties arising from imposts from the West Indies, constitute but a small part of the whole revenue of the British empire.

The duty on sugar constitutes nearly the whole of the revenue from West India articles, in the year 1805, viz: - - - £2,772,498

From this is to be deducted for drawbacks - - - £236,521

For bounties on the exportation of refined sugars - 807,405

Leaving only - - - 1,042,926

as net revenue; so that the whole amount of duties during that year, from the West Indies, could not be much more than one-twentieth part of the whole revenue of Great Britain; as the whole of her revenue, for three or four years past, has not been less than about thirty-five or forty millions sterling per annum.

The truth is, sir, that a much larger proportion of our revenue is derived from duties on articles imported from the British West Indies, than that of Great Britain; for, on an average of the years 1802, 1803, and 1804, the duties on rum and sugar from that island amounted to $1,456,000, being about one-eighth of the whole of our revenue during these years.

But, it is said, Great Britain herself will and does, in part, now very sensibly feel the want of our provisions, and particularly breadstuffs; the prices current of Liverpool have been quoted to prove the scarcity of wheat in that country. Are gentlemen now to be informed that Great Britain does not now depend on us for her breadstuffs, and that very little is exported there even in times of very great scarcity? Indeed, sir, the whole of our exports of wheat and flour would, comparatively, add very little to her stock. For, on examination, it will be found that, on an average of the years 1804, 1805, 1806, and 1807, we exported only 5,874,321 bushels of wheat in the whole, calculating five bushels to a barrel of flour. The most able calculations I have seen, and particularly those made by Mr. Chalmers, make the total consumption in England and Wales as follows:

Bread corn, 9,339,000 quarters, or 74,440,000 bushels. Corn made into liquors, 4,665,000 quarters, or 37,320,000 bushels. So that the whole of our supply would add but about one-twentieth part to the whole of their consumption. The idea of starving, or even, in any great degree, distressing a nation that commands the ocean, by withholding our supplies of provisions, has always appeared to me chimerical, and, from the experiment which has now been made, must be abandoned. It is asked, however, where Great Britain will obtain a supply of naval stores, so absolutely necessary for the maintenance and support of her fleets?

It can only be necessary, sir, to look into the exports to Sweden, to find where she can obtain an abundant supply of tar and turpentine. During the year 1804, 100,200 barrels of ship articles were exported from the port of Stockholm alone, a quantity, it is believed, larger than was ever exported from the United States in one year. But a small part of this went to the ports of Great Britain; she will now, however, be able to obtain the whole quantity which may be exported from that kingdom.

But, it is said, she can obtain her supply of cotton from no other quarter than the United States; and that, of course, most of her cotton manufactories might stop, and thousands of her manufacturers be reduced to beggary. Let me ask gentlemen where she obtained this article before it was cultivated in the United States? In the year 1799, she imported cotton to the amount at least of 40,000,000 lbs. In the year 1800 there was imported into England and Scotland 54,000,000 lbs. of the same article. During the former of these years, the United States exported but 9,232,283, and, in the last, but 17,789,803, to all parts of the world. In 1805, 248,799 bales of cotton were imported, about one-half of which came from the United States. In consequence of the increased cultivation of this article in the Southern States, for six or eight years past, we have supplied Great Britain with about one-half of the cotton which she has consumed in her manufactories, and her supply from other quarters has diminished. The quantity which is now annually consumed, in her manufactories, may be estimated at about 60,000,000 lbs. There is no doubt, that, by cutting off one-half of her supply at once, a temporary scarcity may prevail; it would be, however, but temporary. She will soon be able to make up the deficiency from other quarters. That I am not incorrect in this particular, will gentlemen suffer me to turn their attention to a statement made on this subject by an eminent merchant in London, Mr. Alexander Baring, whose name has been often mentioned in this House, and whose opinions and statements are justly entitled to much weight and credit.

In his pamphlet on the subject of the Orders in Council, he states the quantity of cotton imported into the ports of London, Liverpool, and Glasgow, from different parts of the world, in the year 1807, to be 282,667 bags; and of this 171,267 were from the United States, and only 18,981 from the Brazils. He also states, that the usual quantity annually imported from the Brazils and into Portugal, is 140,000 bags of 110 lbs. each. The whole of the cotton from the Brazils will now go to England. If, then, we add this quantity to that imported in the year 1807, from all other parts of the world, except the United States, the amount will stand thus:

	Lbs.
From the British West Indies - -	8,690,700
Colonies conquered from the Dutch -	13,095,300
East Indies - - -	3,422,700
All other parts (except the United States, Portugal, and Brazils) -	2,517,000
From the Brazils, 140,000 bales of 110 lbs. - - -	15,400,000

Making - - - 53,125,700

It will be observed that this is but the usual and ordinary quantity that is raised and imported from these countries, and that it can, in a single season, be increased so as to make up the deficiency from the United States. Indeed, sir, Mr. Baring himself, who is opposed to the Orders in Council, (and thinks them highly prejudicial to the interest of Great Britain,) in the same pamphlet, says, after speaking of the importation of cotton from the different parts of the world:

"There certainly can, in no event, be any apprehension of want of cotton; no article is more generally or more easily produced in all warm climates; the increased cultivation in the United States, proves that it can be afforded there at the cheapest rate, and we cannot procure it with more advantage than from a country which takes the same article back in a manufactured state, probably to the full value of the raw material which she furnishes."

But it is said that we take and consume so large a proportion of her manufactures, that, if deprived of our market in this respect, she must feel it so sensibly as to compel her to yield to us those rights which we demand. To prove this, gentlemen from different quarters of the House have stated that we take and receive her manufactures to the amount of one-third of all her exports. I understood this to have been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL.) This statement, I apprehend, is incorrect, more especially, if it is intended to satisfy and convince this House and the nation, that the United States consume so large a proportion of British manufactures. Gentlemen may, perhaps, have been led into this error by not attending to the distinction between what is called the official value and the real or estimated value of the exports of that country. The official value, it is well known, is taken from the custom-house books, according to a rate or valuation fixed more than a century ago; it is, of course, now far less than the real value. The official value, however, is the one which is generally quoted, in books, giving an account of British exports.

No one has stated the amount of the exports of that country, except the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) who, if I do not misrecollect, stated it to be thirty-seven millions sterling. This is more than the official value, and much less than the real value, according to the accounts which I have seen.

During the year ending on the 5th day of January, 1808, the official value of British exports was £26,993,129 sterling, but the real value was £48,500,483 sterling, or about $218,000,000. This is taken from an account laid before Parliament, and, I presume, may be considered as correct. The amount of exports for the year ending on the 5th day of January, 1807, I have only seen in a newspaper; I will not, therefore, vouch for its correctness. It is there stated to be £33,447,590 sterling. I presume official value, the real value of which might be nearly double, £60,000,000 sterling. It is difficult to ascertain, with precision, the amount of British manufactures which the United States consume annually, as a very large proportion which they import are again exported to the West Indies, to South America, and other parts of the world.

From a report, however, made to this House by the Secretary of the Treasury, in 1806, relative to our commerce with Great Britain during the years 1802, 1803, and 1804, we can form an estimate not far from the truth. By this report it appears that the average amount of the annual import during that year was estimated at $27,400,000, in British manufactures. These consisted principally of goods paying ad valorem duties. That, during those years, we exported merchandise, paying ad valorem duties, to the average value of $9,772,000. A part of the merchandise thus exported came from other countries, but it is believed not more than one-quarter part, which would leave for our own consumption, annually, during these three years, about $20,000,000 of British merchandise, which is but about one-tenth part of the amount of all the exports of that country. During the years 1806 and 1807, it is true, our imports of British goods have amounted to between forty and fifty million of dollars, consisting principally of those which pay ad valorem duties; but, during the year 1806, we exported the same kind of goods to the amount of $18,571,477, and, in the year 1807, similar goods to the amount of $18,564,507, of which, in 1807, $9,870,753 were exported to the Spanish West Indies and American colonies; so that a great proportion of British manufactures, which, for some years past, we have imported, have been continually destined for a foreign market and not for home consumption, and of which we have been the carriers, and received the profits. But, since the embargo and the Spanish revolution, these goods, instead of finding their way to foreign markets through the United States and through the medium of our vessels, find their way to the same markets in British bottoms.

I have thought proper, sir, to make these statements and remarks not for the purpose of showing that the trade of the United States is not highly beneficial to Great Britain, but to show that it had been overrated by many gentlemen on this floor as a measure of coercion; and, for the purpose of exculpating myself and my constituents, from the charge of an unreasonable opposition to a measure which we have never believed would produce any salutary effects.

Will gentlemen permit me in the next place to inquire whether the embargo, even if followed by a non-intercourse, will coerce France to rescind her obnoxious decrees? And here I beg leave to observe that "the great and increasing dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, are threatened on the high seas," mentioned in the Message of the President, which recommended the embargo, could not arise from the execution of the decrees of France against the United States on the ocean, for it is well known that she was incapable of executing them on that element. Suppose, sir, the Emperor of China, at one of his palaces at Pekin, or some of his Tartar provinces, beyond the Chinese wall, should issue his decree declaring the islands and dominions of Great Britain in a state of blockade, and that all our vessels found going to or from there, or loaded with their products, should be good prize? Under such a decree our vessels would be liable to condemnation, if taken in violating it; but the difficulty would be, the Emperor of China has it not in his power to take them.

The power of the Emperor of France to enforce his decrees on the high seas is nearly as inefficient as that of the Chinese Emperor. For further proof of this, let me refer gentlemen to the statements and opinions of members of the Administration, contained in the documents now on our table. The Secretary of State, in his letter to Mr. Armstrong, of February 8, 1808, speaks of the attempt of the French Government to enforce its decrees on the high seas as "an empty menace." The Secretary of the Treasury also says in his annual report:

"It may, indeed, be admitted that the decrees of France can be enforced only in her own territories, and in those of her allies; that, however efficient in preventing any commerce between the United States and themselves, those decrees cannot materially affect that between her enemies and the United States, and may, therefore, in that respect, be disregarded."

These documents, sir, prove, to my mind, that it was the wish and intention of the French Government that the United States should make common cause with them and the continent of Europe, in a commercial warfare against Great Britain, in support of what are called maritime rights. I trust, however, the House will not understand me as saying that our Government laid the embargo in compliance with these wishes and determinations. I have introduced them for the purpose of showing that a continuance of the embargo, though enforced by an army of fifty thousand men, would not compel or induce Bonaparte to rescind his decrees.

Our Minister at London, Mr. Pinkney, in his letter to Mr. Canning, of October 10, 1808, speaking of the intercourse between Great Britain and the United States, also says, "That the edicts of France could not prevent that intercourse, even if France should adhere to them;" and "that the power of France upon the seas, was, in no degree, adequate to such a purpose."

If anything else were wanting to prove that our commerce is in very little danger from these decrees, let me refer the House to another document furnished us from the Senate; by which it appears that out of five hundred and ninety-four vessels which sailed from our ports in the course of the last Summer, under special permission from the President, the most of them have returned in safety, though liable to be captured and condemned under these edicts. It is also well known, that many of these vessels obtained insurances against French captures under these decrees, for the moderate premium of five or six per cent.

But, sir, a perseverance in the embargo system, so far from compelling Bonaparte to rescind his decrees, will induce him to continue them; for, so far as this restriction on our commerce operates against Great Britain, it meets with his entire approbation. Nay, sir, I will go farther, and say, that in September, 1807, he extended the operation of the decrees against the United States on the high seas, and seized and held in sequestration the property of our citizens in his ports, for the express purpose of compelling us to take a part with him and the whole continent of Europe, in a commercial warfare against Great Britain. I will prove this, sir, from the documents on your table; and for this purpose let me in the first place call the attention of the House to a letter from M. Champagny to General Armstrong, dated at Milan, November 24, 1808, and which accompanied the President's Message, at the opening of the present session.

After speaking of "the reclamations," as he calls them, on our part, against the execution of the decrees, the injuries the United States had received from England, and the inconveniences which our citizens experienced from the new and extended operation of their edicts, M. Champagny says:

"But it is not to France. It is to England, that these inconveniences to individuals ought to be imputed. She it is who has given the example of measures unjust, illegal, and infringing on the sovereignty of nations. To oblige her to renounce them, it has become necessary to combat her with her own arms: in violating the rights of all nations, she has united them all, by a common interest; and it is for them to have recourse to force against her; to forbid her the search (la visite) of their vessels; the taking away of their crews; and to declare themselves against measures which wound their dignity and their independence. The unjust pretensions of England will be kept up as long as those whose rights she violates, are silent; and what Government has had more to complain of against her, than the United States? All the difficulties which have given rise to your reclamations, sir, would be removed with ease, if the Government of the United States, after complaining in vain of the injustice and violations of England, took, with the whole Continent, the part of guaranteeing itself therefrom. England has introduced into the maritime war, an entire disregard for the rights of nations; it is only in forcing her to a peace that it is possible to recover them. On this point the interest of all nations is the same. All have their honor and their independence to defend."

I would here observe, sir, that this letter appears to be written as an answer to one of General Armstrong, of November 12, of the same month, in which, in a very spirited manner, he remonstrated against the decrees of the Council of Prizes, in the case of the Horizon—and also in answer to other remonstrances, which our Minister has made against the seizure of the property of our citizens in the ports of France. The Horizon, it is well known, was shipwrecked on the coast of France, and in that event was entitled to the rights of hospitality, even from an enemy. Notwithstanding, she was seized, and that part of her cargo at least, which consisted of British manufactures, was condemned under the 5th article of the decree of November 21, 1808. At the same time, other property, to a large amount, belonging to our citizens, in the different ports of France and her dependencies, was seized and held in sequestration. And what, sir, does M. Champagny tell our Minister? He says, "all the difficulties which have given rise to your reclamations, sir, would be removed with ease," &c. What were the difficulties of which our Minister and our Government had complained, or to use the French style, had given rise to our reclamations? Why, sir, the very condemnation in the case of the Horizon, and the numerous seizures of our property in their ports. And what was the condition upon which these difficulties "would be removed with ease?" It was simply this—"if the Government of the United States, after complaining in vain of the injustice and violations of England, took with the whole Continent the part of guaranteeing itself therefrom."

The language of the French Minister is too plain to be mistaken. He tells us, in substance, that his master has seized the property of our citizens, and will proceed to a condemnation of it, unless the United States will join him and the Continent, in a commercial warfare against Great Britain. To prove, sir, what was the part which the French Government wished us to take with the Continent, it is only necessary for us to go back to the time when the Treaty of Tilsit was entered into between the Emperors of France and Russia, in June or July, 1807. It has always been said, and I have no doubt of the truth of it, that by a secret article of this treaty the Emperor of Russia had agreed to join the French Emperor, in excluding British commerce from his dominions. It was in pursuance of this agreement, no doubt, that on the 26th of October, 1807, the Emperor of Russia issued his manifesto, prohibiting all intercourse with Great Britain, until the principles of the old armed neutrality should be recognised and acknowledged.

Immediately after the Treaty of Tilsit, in which (as Don Pedro Cevallos, in his exposition, says) "the destiny of the world seemed to be decided in his favor," on his return to Paris in August, Bonaparte had come to a determination that as he had settled the affairs of the belligerents, except England, to his mind, he would settle those of neutrals in the same way, and he had also resolved to form an union of all commercial States against Great Britain, and that there should no longer be any neutrals—[Mr. PITKIN was here interrupted and asked what proof he had of this.] If I were permitted, sir, to put my finger on certain documents, I could prove it satisfactorily. [Mr. LOVE here interrupted Mr. PITKIN, and denied that there were any such documents in the possession of the House.] We have, Mr. Speaker, I know, documents that are public, and also those which are confidential; and according to the rules of the House, it is perhaps improper to refer to those, which they have thought it necessary to keep from the public eye. They cannot, therefore, be read in public, and indeed I know not whether they are now in the possession of the House. But, sir, I know their contents, as well as the gentleman from Virginia. I had the same information, however, from a gentleman who was in Paris, in August, 1807, and I do not hesitate to say, that I have no doubt of the truth of it. But, sir, the subsequent conduct of the French Government proves it beyond controversy; for very soon after this treaty, a new and extended construction is given to the decrees, by the express direction of the Emperor himself. On the 18th September, Regnier, Grand Judge, is directed to declare, that as there is no exception in the decree, there is no ground to make any in the execution of it. And when, on the 24th of the same month, our Minister at Paris remonstrated against this new and extended construction, and asks an explanation of his Majesty's views in relation to this subject, as it respected the United States, he is answered by M. Champagny, on the 7th of October, that "the decree of blockade has been now issued eleven months. The principal Powers of Europe, far from protesting against its provisions, have adopted them. They have perceived that its extension must be complete, to render it more effectual, and it has seemed easy to reconcile these measures with the observance of treaties, especially at a time when the infraction by England, of the rights of all maritime Powers, render their interest common, and tend to unite them in support of the same cause."

These documents, sir, prove, to my mind, that it was the wish and determination of the French Government, that the United States should make common cause with them and the continent of Europe, in a commercial warfare, against Great Britain, in support of what is called maritime rights. I trust, however, the House will not understand me as saying, that our Government laid the embargo in compliance with these wishes and determination. I have introduced them for the purpose of showing, that a continuance of the embargo, though enforced by an army of fifty thousand men, would not compel or induce Bonaparte to rescind his decrees.

If anything else were wanting to convince us that the embargo restrictions still meets the approbation of the French Government, I would refer to the late address of Bonaparte to the Legislative body, immediately after his return from Erfurth, in which he says, "The United States of America have preferred to renounce commerce and the sea, rather than acknowledge the slavery of them." But more particularly would I call the attention of the House and the nation, to a document lately published in this country, which, in French, is called an exposé, lately addressed by Mr. Cretet, Minister of the Interior, to the Legislative body. After speaking of the war with Great Britain, he says "the war will henceforth consist in repelling from all points the English commerce, and employing the means calculated to promote that end. France has energetically concurred in the exclusion of the monopoly of commerce; she has resigned herself to privations which long habits must have rendered more painful. Some branches of her agriculture and her industry have suffered, and still suffer, but the prosperity of the great body of the people is not affected; she is familiarized with that transitory state, the duration of which she beholds without fear. The allies of France and the United States sacrifice, like her, and with a resolution equally generous, their private conveniences."

After this, sir, it must be impossible for any man to believe that a further continuance of the embargo, even aided by a non-intercourse, will operate as a measure of coercion on France, so as to compel her to change her mode of warfare against her enemy. No, sir, these restrictions on our commerce, so far as they operate to injure the commerce of Great Britain, do really co-operate with the French decrees, the object of which is to destroy Great Britain, by the ruin of her commerce; and without which restrictions, those very decrees would have a much more limited effect. It is on this account, that our embargo system is borne so patiently by Bonaparte, and even receives his benedictions and that of his Ministers.

But, sir, if this army of fifty thousand men is not wanted for the purpose of enforcing the embargo laws, it must be raised for the purpose of war, either defensive or offensive.

No gentleman has stated that we are in any danger of an invasion; it cannot be pretended that there is any prospect of an attack by land. Should such an attack be made, should hostile footsteps again tread our shores, there would be but one opinion as to the course to be pursued. Such attacks are to be repelled at every risk, and at every hazard. This number of troops, therefore, can only be wanted for an offensive war; indeed some gentlemen have repeatedly stated on this floor, that war was inevitable, and have likewise stated, that, as we are the injured party, it must be an offensive war. And here I beg leave to call the attention of the House to a report of the committee in respect to our foreign relations, and which was made for the purpose of pointing out the course the United States ought to pursue, with respect to foreign nations. This report states that we have but three alternatives: "submission, war with both nations, or a continuance and enforcement of the present suspension of commerce." They say, "The first cannot require any discussion. But the pressure of the embargo, so sensibly felt, and the calamities inseparable from a state of war, naturally create a wish that some middle course might be discovered, which should avoid the evils of both, and not be inconsistent with the national honor and independence. That illusion might be dis'sipated; and it is necessary that the people of the United States should fully understand the situation in which they are placed. There is no other alternative but war, with both nations, or a continuance of the present system."

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, is this the situation of the people of the United States? Is there no middle course, no middle path, in which we can any longer pursue "the noiseless tenor of our way?" Could the committee present us with nothing better than such dreadful alternatives? If so, we have but Scylla on one side, and Charybdis on the other, and no middle passage through which we can steer our political ship. We must inevitably be dashed to pieces, on the rocks of embargo and non-intercourse, or be swallowed up in the whirlpool of European conflicts. If this is the situation of the people of the United States, dreadful and calamitous is their situation. I had, sir, hoped, fondly hoped, nay, believed, that Heaven had in store many, very many blessings yet to come for the people of this country. But, if they have no other prospects than those presented to them by this committee, I have hoped and believed in vain.

The committee, indeed, in another part of the same report, say: "The present unsettled state of the world, the extraordinary situation in which the United States are placed, and the necessity, if war be resorted to, of making it at the same time against both nations, and these the two most powerful of the world, are the principal causes of hesitation." The present state of the world is, indeed, sir, unsettled; and when it will be again settled, is known to Omniscience alone. War with both nations, and those the two most powerful of the world! Let me ask the committee what nation has any efficient power except England and France, and their allies and dependencies? Sir, there is none. War, therefore, with those nations, is war with the whole world.

Europe at this moment, sir, presents a spectacle of which history records no parallel. When the Roman Empire, enervated by luxury, was overrun by the northern nations, and the fairest portion of Europe was taken possession of by its savage, but bold invaders, it was parcelled out among the rival chieftains, who achieved the conquest. No single individual, either at that time or since, has ever had the supreme control over this part of the world. The power of Charlemagne, in the zenith of his glory, was nothing in comparison with that of the present autocrat of the continent of Europe. I am lost in astonishment, when I reflect on the enormous and unequalled power now possessed by the Emperor of France, and the rapidity with which that power has been acquired.

The minor kingdoms of Europe, as well as newly made kingdoms, have been parcelled out among the different branches of his family, almost without a struggle; and the fate of the larger kingdoms and empires has been decided by single battle. The battle of Austerlitz, sir, brought the proud house of Austria at the feet of the French Emperor; the battle of Jena annihilated the house of Brandenburg; that of Friedland, compelled the Emperor of the North to crouch at the feet of the conqueror; the house of Braganza, in Europe, was annihilated by a single word; and what, let me ask, has become of the Spanish part of the house of Bourbon? Their fate is but too well known; they are prisoners, state prisoners in France; and much I fear, the fate of the people of that unfortunate country, will also soon be but too well known; I fear even while I am now speaking, they may be the victims of the vassals of the usurper.

When I reflect on the events, which have, and are now taking place in Spain, I cannot but feel emotions, which I am unable to express. From the time when the infamous Godoy, the Prince of Peace, was elevated to power, and French influence governed in the national councils of that country, some of her best and wisest men, and particularly old Count Florida Blanca, (who, in the cabinet at least, was the Washington of Spain) were banished from Court, and have ever since lived in obscurity in the distant provinces, until the present revolution has called them into notice. During the reign of the Prince of Peace, the King of Spain has been the friend and ally of the Emperor of France. And how, sir, has this friend and ally been treated? In the first place; a large part of his western empire was demanded of him; Louisiana was ceded to France, and which we now possess (in part at least) at the expense of fifteen millions; the mines of Mexico and Peru were next demanded; the rich products of these mines were poured into the national coffers of France with a liberal, nay, with a bountiful hand; not yet satisfied, some of the best of the Spanish troops were required to fight the battles of the Emperor in the north—sixteen thousand of the most gallant troops were immediately furnished. Not contented with all these, the Emperor, at last, demands the Crown and Kingdom itself. After having enticed the old King and his son Ferdinand to place themselves in his power at Bayonne, he then compelled them to sign an act of renunciation of their Crown and Kingdom in his favor, but not until after (as Cevallos, who was on the spot, says) the Emperor in his last conference with Ferdinand, said to His Majesty, "Prince, you have only to choose between cession and death." Mr. Speaker, by this act of renunciation, the Spanish part of this western quarter of the world is now claimed by the Emperor of France, and if he should conquer Old Spain and get quiet possession of this part of America, (and it is not in our power to prevent it,) the United States are gone.

Is it possible, sir, that the Committee of Foreign Relations, is it possible that this House can seriously think of plunging the United States into a war with two nations who are at war with each other, the one of which commands the land, and the other the ocean? Will this country, as yet, comparatively speaking, in a state of infancy, certainly not advanced beyond a state of adolescence, be able to meet the shock of such a war? Sir, a war with both nations is out of the question; when we have once entered into this interminable conflict, which is now convulsing the world, we shall soon be compelled to take part with one or the other of the belligerents; and of course a connexion or alliance must be formed with the nation with which we take a part. For myself, sir, I want alliances with neither—and I hope the fate of other nations will teach the people of this country to avoid a course which may lead them to inevitable destruction.

Will gentlemen suffer me to detain them a few moments longer, while I inquire what are the precise objects of this war? and whether there is a probability of our being able to obtain those objects by a war? It is said generally, for our maritime rights. It cannot surely be for the principle that free ships make free goods (as a gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BACON] has hinted)—I understood that this has been relinquished by the present, as well as by the former Administrations. Neither do I believe it can be for what is called the colonial trade, or reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake. And as to the right of impressment of British seamen on board of our merchant vessels, which has hitherto been made the principal subject of dispute between this country and Great Britain, and an express relinquishment of which has been made a sine qua non of a commercial treaty, if I am able to understand the views of our Administration, this point has been given up, at least, for the present. It is well known that the proclamation of the King, of the date I believe of the 14th of October, 1807, recalling all British seamen from foreign employment, was laid before Congress, by the President, when the laying of the embargo was recommended; and that one object of the embargo was to coerce Great Britain to relinquish this right of impressment of her subjects from our merchant vessels.

When our Government, therefore, offered Great Britain to repeal the embargo on her rescinding her Orders in Council, I consider that they had come to a determination that our vessels might navigate the ocean, notwithstanding the right of impressment had not been relinquished, and that of course they would not go to war, in order to obtain that object. If this be true, the sole object of the war must be the orders and decrees of the belligerents. And hence, sir, the question is not, whether a war, according to the known laws of nations, would not be just against both these nations from whom we have received so many injuries. There is no doubt, that for several years past, we have had what may be called just causes of war against them both. But the question is, whether in the present unsettled state of the world (as the committee say) it is a wise, prudent, or politic measure; and whether there is a probability that we should thereby attain the objects we wish? Shall we obtain either indemnity for the past, or security for the future? The old law of nations is very little regarded by either of the belligerents. France says that England in her mode of warfare regards no laws, and therefore she is obliged "to forget them, and even for an instant to forget herself," and therefore issues her decrees. On the contrary, England says, that France is carrying on an unparalleled mode of warfare against her, and she is obliged "to retort on her enemies themselves, the consequence of their own violence and injustice." Both ground their proceedings on the principle of necessity and self-defence. Now, sir, if it were possible for us, who are the only neutral nation in the world, to stop the wild career of these mighty belligerents, and to compel them to obey the law of nations, as it has hitherto been acknowledged, and to do us justice, I should be willing to do this, even at the expense of a war. But will any gentleman say, after a long and expensive war, we should be able to obtain such terms as would secure us in our neutral rights hereafter? Could we expect that France would stipulate with us, that if ever she should again attempt to ruin her enemy, by destroying her commerce, that she would not issue decrees similar to those of Berlin, Milan, and Bayonne? And if she should so stipulate, what security should we have that these stipulations would not be broken, whenever imperious majesty should require it? And, on the contrary, would England agree by treaty, that in case France should ever commence a commercial warfare against her, that she would not retaliate by similar Orders in Council? And if she would, could we depend on a faithful performance of such a treaty? No sir, we could not. It is said, that we could take Canada and Nova Scotia, and hold them at least as pledges. I have not a doubt, that we might take these provinces, but (as my colleague [Mr. TALLMADGE] who is a much better judge than I am, says) it must be at a vast expense of men and money. But, sir, while we are attacking the extremities of the British Empire, our enemies may perhaps be attacking the very vitals of our country. It will be in their power to lay our cities, our towns along the seacoast, under contribution, and I fear in ashes. I do not know that this would be the case but I fear it would be in their power to do it. But, sir, I do not want Canada, as an accession of territory; and it will be difficult, I apprehend, to persuade the citizens of Connecticut, at least, to leave their smiling villages along the coast, exposed to the ravages of an enemy, and risk their lives in the woods and wilds of Canada and Nova Scotia. Supposing we should obtain them by conquest, would we by this obtain a security for the future, against the infraction of our maritime rights? I do not believe it. It is very questionable whether these provinces are of much real benefit to the British Empire; the ordinary annual expense of the civil and military government there, is about one million of dollars. The King undoubtedly considers this province as a part of his Empire, much in the same manner as he does a gem of minor brilliancy in his crown, which he would not have plucked from it by force; but when once gone, the crown would not be much less brilliant or the less valuable.

When I consider, sir, the prosperity which this country has experienced for fifteen years past, the accumulation of wealth, not only in our cities and towns, but in every village, during this period, and the general happiness we have enjoyed—and this notwithstanding the many injuries and losses our citizens have sustained from the aggressions of both the belligerents, I cannot consent to exchange this situation for the miseries and calamities of war, without a certain prospect of some permanent future good.

It may perhaps, by some, be considered as agreeable to the laws of honor and chivalry, to attack the world in arms, without a prospect of success; but, sir, I will never consent to place my country in such a situation, in which we can only say, as Francis the First did, after the battle of Pavia, "all is lost but honor."

I had intended, sir, to have touched upon some other topics, to have pursued the hint thrown out by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) that there was yet a hope that some arrangement of our difficulties might still be made, which should continue, at least, until this mighty conflict in Europe was over. But, sir, my strength is nearly gone, and I am sure the patience of the House must be quite exhausted. I will conclude, therefore, by expressing my most earnest hope that the bill may not pass, but be postponed indefinitely.

When Mr. P. had concluded, the House adjourned without taking any question.

MONDAY, January 30.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the eleventh of November last, so much of the Message from the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session of Congress, as relates to the Military and Naval Establishments, to whom was committed, on the thirteenth instant, a bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States,'" reported, that the committee had had the said bill under consideration, and directed him to report the same to the House, without amendment: whereupon, the said bill was committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred, on the nineteenth instant, a letter and report from the Secretary of War, with sundry accompanying documents, presented a bill concerning invalid pensioners; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to prohibit, in certain cases, the entry of foreign vessels into the ports and harbors of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter recently received from our Minister at the Court of St. James, covering one to him from the British Secretary of State, with his reply, being a sequel to the correspondence which accompanied the Message to both Houses, of the seventeenth instant. The Message, and the papers transmitted therewith, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General of the United States, accompanying his reports respecting unproductive routes and public contracts; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for making payment for the public lands of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House resumed the consideration of an engrossed bill providing an additional military force, which was depending on Saturday last, at the time of adjournment: Whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. DAVID R. WILLIAMS, that the said bill do lie on the table: and the question being taken thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

PREPARATION FOR WAR.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolution submitted by Mr. NICHOLAS a few days ago, in the following words:

Resolved, As the opinion of this House, that the United States ought not to delay beyond the — day of —, to repeal the embargo laws, and to resume, maintain, and defend the navigation of the high seas, against any nation, or nations, having in force edicts, orders, or decrees, violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States.

Mr. MILNOR moved for a division of the resolution so as to take the question first on repealing the embargo, and moved to fill the blank with the fourth day of March.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he had risen for the same purpose as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he submitted to the Committee whether, if the embargo laws were to be repealed, it should not be done with all possible speed. His sources of information, he said, were neither very numerous, nor, possibly, very correct; but he did understand it to be a fact, that, in certain parts of the Eastern States, the embargo was daily and hourly, in the broad glare of daylight, not evaded, but disregarded; that sleighs to an immense number were daily passing from the United States into Canada, laden not only with the product of that part of the Union bordering on Canada, but, also, with the product of the Southern States, which was carried, by a long and expensive carriage, from the Atlantic States to Montreal, for exportation.

There were two points of view, in which, Mr. R. said, it appeared to him that if this law was to be repealed at all, it ought to be done with all possible expedition. The first was, that those persons in our own country who had set the law at defiance, who had been guilty of the most in-civic conduct, should not reap the exclusive benefit of the commerce carried on. The other reason was, that it was well known that the St. Lawrence was frozen up, and would remain frozen long after our own waters were open. Adventurers, lured by the hope of great profit, had, at a vast expense, transported products not the growth of that part of the country, into Canada, knowing that the plan of embargo, if continued, would amply repay the extra expense of carrying it. This produce, Mr. R. said, to an immense amount, was deposited, as he understood, at Montreal, for the purpose of exporting it as soon as the ice broke up; and he presumed it was already paid for in British gold, or commodities of some sort. And this, he said, was one of the ways in which he should have no objection to finger some of their gold, viz: by getting to market before them, underselling, and forestalling them, which might easily be done from the expense of the transportation by land. He submitted it, therefore, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, whether, if the Committee determined to repeal the embargo, it should not be as soon as possible? If immediately removed, it must shake, and severely too, the capitalists of Canada; but, if the removal was procrastinated, they would reap the profits, whilst we should carry our produce to a market already glutted, or, if not glutted, considerably supplied. When the resolution came before the House, if the Committee of the Whole agreed to it, he said he should certainly move the earliest day possible for the removal of the embargo.

Mr. MILNOR said the gentleman from Virginia must be fully persuaded that he was as willing to get rid of the embargo as the gentleman himself could possibly be, for he had been opposed to the embargo system from the first day the original embargo law was passed. He said he had moved to fill the blank with the 4th day of March, for several considerations. The resolution contemplated a repeal of the embargo at a future day, and not at the present day; and, from conversation which he had held with gentlemen heretofore friendly to the embargo, and now disposed to remove it, he had supposed that an earlier day would not be agreed to. One other consideration, he said, had considerable influence with him. At present, there was a natural embargo on a considerable number of the ports of the United States. By the fourth day of March, it was pretty certain that nature would have repealed that embargo. To place the merchants upon an equality, he had supposed, he said, that it would be proper to fix a day for the removal of the embargo which would give to all equal advantages.

Mr. SLOAN gave one reason, in addition to those urged by the gentleman from Virginia, why the embargo should be speedily repealed. It was a fact known to many members on the floor, that large speculations had been made in consequence of a belief that the embargo would be continued for a great while. Articles of foreign produce, which, though not absolutely necessary, had become necessary by habit, were up to an extravagant price. An early removal of the embargo would tend to remove the sufferings of the honest part of the community, in consequence of the high price of these commodities.

Mr. NICHOLAS, who had been absent when the subject was taken up, wished to modify his resolution. This being considered out of order, Mr. N. moved to amend the resolution under consideration by striking out the whole of it after the word "Resolved," and inserting the following:

Resolved, As the opinion of this House, that the United States ought not to delay beyond the — day of —, to resume, maintain, and defend the navigation of the high seas; and, that provision ought to be made by law for repealing, on the — day of —, the several embargo laws, and for authorizing, at the same time, letters of marque and reprisal against Great Britain and France; provided, on that day, their orders or edicts violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States shall be in force, or against either of those nations having in force such orders or edicts.

Mr. LYON opposed the striking out the substance of the original motion, under the idea that it would deprive the House of an opportunity of taking a direct vote on the repeal of the embargo.

Mr. NICHOLAS said that the object of both resolutions was the same. The object of the resolution first proposed was, to repeal the embargo laws, to assert, and prepare to enforce our rights. The only object in proposing the amendment was, to bring the subject to a close, in one way or other. It had been said that the other resolution was not specific enough; that it could not be understood; that it would take up much time of the House, and when it came before a committee to draft a bill in pursuance of it, their construction of its terms might differ from that of the House, and the whole subject must be gone over again. He wished the question to be decided, and that the whole nation should know, as soon as possible, what was to be done. Gentlemen who thought that we ought to take a determined stand against encroachments on our rights, he said, would vote with him; gentlemen of a contrary opinion would vote against him.

Mr. DANA said he was for striking out the words of the original resolution, because he did not wish to vote on them, scarcely knowing what construction to put upon them himself, or what constructions others would put upon any vote which he might give on them. The resolution as it originally stood, he said, did not contain an affirmative proposition, but a sort of compound negative one. It declared that "the United States ought not, beyond the — day of — to delay repealing the embargo." Now, any gentleman who might wish it to be repealed to-day, would be clearly of opinion that it ought not to be delayed for six months or a year. So that a vote on the resolution, supposing the — day of June to be inserted as the day beyond which repeal ought not be delayed, would give no definite idea of the sentiments of any gentleman who should vote for it. He was, therefore, really obliged to the gentleman that he had brought forward a resolution which he could understand, and which had a specific practical bearing. As it respected the character of the proposition, it was a declaration of war hypothetically. He could not express an opinion on the substitute proposed, but would vote to strike out the original words, because they were liable to a diversity of construction.

The House agreed to strike out the substance of the first resolution.

A division of the substitute offered by Mr. NICHOLAS was called for, so as to take the question first on the question of repealing the embargo laws.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to fill the blank in the substitute with the first day of June; Mr. MILNOR named the fourth day of March, and Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS named the fifteenth day of February.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out the words "the — day of ——" for the purpose of inserting "forthwith."—Motion to strike out lost by a considerable majority.

The question recurring on filling the blank with the first day of June—

Mr. RANDOLPH, as the gentleman, the mover of the resolution, (Mr. NICHOLAS) was not present when he had given the reasons why he thought, if the embargo was to be repealed, it should be removed immediately, repeated them. He wished our own citizens to reap some advantage from an early repeal. Or were we, he asked, by a singular fatality in all our measures, only to injure ourselves, and benefit our adversaries, and the most dishonest part of our own community?

Mr. DANA was opposed to a continuance of the embargo until the first of June. Since it had been generally understood through the country that the embargo was to be further continued, many capitalists had forestalled the markets, so as to secure to themselves a monopoly of the foreign articles of the greatest necessity, thereby to command an excessive profit at the expense of the distressed part of the community. As respected them, Mr. D. said, that he had not a wish that the duration of the embargo should be protracted, that they might realize their gains, and make poor men their prey; and if there were any description of our citizens whom he could wish to be injured by a removal of the embargo, these would certainly be the persons. There was another reason why he did not wish the embargo to continue so long. However important it was that the general authority of the Government should be maintained as respected these States, was it not known that the reins of Government, from their extreme tension, were failing in the hands of the Administration? Were not their acts placed at defiance, especially since the passage of the last act for enforcing the embargo? Look at the whole northern frontier, said he; recollect the facility of transportation on the ice and snow. Recollect with what facility in this season the produce and lumber, &c., will pass from Vermont into the British provinces. As respected the whole of that frontier, Mr. D. said, it would be in vain to attempt to enforce the embargo laws. The mound was already broken down which retained our produce; and it was to be feared that the whole would soon be swept away. The question which now offered itself to the consideration of the House was this, and it was requisite that it should be decided promptly: whether, if the acts of Government were set at defiance, the authority of the Government should be sustained or not? If the acts of the Government were placed at defiance, Congress had but to decide instantly to enforce them by arms, or to abolish them. Did they mean to hesitate between advancing and retiring? If you mean to retire, do it whilst you can; whilst it will seem to be an attention to the wishes and sufferings of the community, instead of giving those who set your laws at defiance, the signal of your defeat, and the evidence of their triumph. Mr. D. asked if gentlemen had estimated what would take place between this day and the first day of June? Did they conceive the force that it would be necessary to employ to enforce the laws? Before they decided that point it would be well to pause. Did gentlemen recollect how much danger menaced the sentiment of attachment to their country, when foreign indulgences (as the liberty of trading derived from the contiguity of the British provinces) are given to the citizens of any portion of a country which refuses to allow them those privileges? Need I remind gentlemen of a circumstance illustrative of my idea? When the navigation of the Mississippi was at the command of the Spaniards, before the treaty of San Lorenzo was carried into effect, recollect the opportunity which that state of things gave to the agents of the Spanish Government, for making attempts to detach the Western States from the Union. How far they succeeded I do not undertake to say; but the fact is well known, that some men of considerable distinction were so far drawn aside from their attachment to the Union as to give countenance to the intrigue; and the fact having come to light, the public authority of one of the States (Kentucky) have undertaken the examination and investigation of the subject. I speak of this not as a reproach, but as an illustration of the temptation which is offered to any portion of the people, having an outlet through a river in the possession of a foreign Power, which is denied them by their own Government. I will not pursue the object, sir; for it is unpleasant to dwell on subjects which may even tend to jeopardize the Union. But I deem it useless to rely on the patriotism of the people, when the Government forgets the cement of patriotism. What is country? That portion of the globe where we have friends, freedom, and protection. It is the reciprocation of good offices, which is the cement of private friendship. It is the reciprocation of protection and support between the Government and individual—a reciprocation of benefits, which is the cement of allegiance. But, sir, when the power of the Government is exerted merely to check the ordinary industry of the community, when the people feel the power of their Government in being blockaded in port by it, instead of being protected against blockade by an enemy, what must be their feeling? Patriotism is too precious a feeling to make many experiments upon it. Really, sir, I should not wish to know, in relation to many of my fellow-citizens, what would be the extreme point to which their patriotism could be stretched. There appears to be reason to apprehend that the reins of Government are already falling in the hands of Government. I should, therefore, wish my countrymen to be no longer exposed to being alienated from their Government, and that the Government should not be placed in a situation to have its acts set at defiance.

H. OF R.

Preparation for War.

JANUARY, 1869.

Mr. TROUP observed that he could not see the propriety or expediency of fixing on a day beyond the adjournment of the present Congress, on which this change of measures should take place. What would be the effect of it? It could be considered in no other point of view than as a declaration of war, to be binding on the next Congress. The mere declaration could not be considered as adding coercion to our measures; for whatever honor foreign nations might possess, (and he believed they possessed little indeed of that,) they certainly did possess courage, and were not to be frightened into an accommodation with us by such a threat. But the measure was not obligatory and binding on the next Congress, even admitting that it should be composed of the identical individuals who composed the present Congress. There was no authority in the Constitution by which we could bind them, unless indeed this declaration involved a matter of contract. And to be sure, he said, it might be considered in some sort a matter of contract; a political contract of a singular quality—a contract between this great Government and an unruly faction in New England, which threatened opposition to the laws, and was breaking out into rebellion. Yes, sir, said Mr. T., you come out with a solemn measure, and tell them if they will forbear to rebel until the first day of June next, you will agree to issue letters of marque. It is an invasion even of the powers of the next Congress, supposing it to be composed of the same men as constitute the present Congress, to bind them to declare war, not under the circumstances then existing, but under those which existed at the time you were pleased to enter into this declaration. But not only will this measure not be obligatory, but it is very possible that the next Congress may be as different in its composition from the present, as the present Congress is from the Junto of Spain, or the British Parliament. In every point of view, therefore, Mr. T. said, he conceived it a futile proposition.

Mr. MILNOR was opposed to postponing the repeal of the embargo till the first day of June; for which he assigned the same reason which he gave before for proposing the fourth day of March. If it was so extremely oppressive as to excite discontent and rebellion, its extremely unfavorable effects to ourselves would be a sufficient reason for its repeal. Mr. M. said, that although he would fix a day for the repeal of the embargo, he could not carry his civility to the belligerents so far as to give them notice on what day we would commence war against them. Were we in such a situation that we could instantly bid defiance to Great Britain? When war comes, said he, it will be proper to consider whether it be politic, proper, and necessary? If it be politic, and the nation cannot continue out of it without a sacrifice of its honor, then let us have it, and not take it in this manner, declaring to the belligerents that if they do not come forward on a certain day we will commence hostilities against them. The next Congress will be better able to decide what will be proper on the first day of June than we can now do; and if we are not instantly to go to war, it will be decorous, wise, and right in us to let the question rest till the next Congress come here in the end of May, and leave the responsibility with them.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said if ever a man's mind was embarrassed on a topic on which he had to legislate, he confessed that his was. He saw a measure and a system which he thought susceptible of the clearest demonstration to be more warlike than war itself, a system which preserved this nation in peace and happiness, about to be abandoned, and for the causes which had been assigned. When the late intelligence had reached him from the northeast, he said, it had borne a character most distressful to every man who valued the integrity of the Government. It appeared to him to be of such a character as not to leave a doubt as to what course should be pursued. There could be but two courses, either to extend the strong arm of Government, or to abandon the law. Under that impression, (said Mr. W.,) choosing not to enforce the law with the bayonet, I thought it proper to acknowledge to the House that I was ready to abandon the embargo. I did talk about insurgency and rebellion too, sir; and the reproof which I received from the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. ROWAN) was correct; that the best way to drive people into rebellion is to accuse them of it. Perhaps, sir, I ought to apologize to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NICHOLAS) for calling up this subject, when the resolution was proposed by him, and he was not disposed to call it up. I applied to him to call it up, and understood that it would be disagreeable to him on account of his indisposition. But I felt myself obliged to call it up, and not to permit such a proposition to lie on the table beyond the moment when I could get to act on it. Like the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Georgia I am disposed that we should act for ourselves and not for the next Congress. To me, sir, the embargo always appeared a blessing to this country. True, it has always operated to prevent us from making money, but that was all that was injurious in its operation; and, sir, I was so much of a fool, had so little knowledge of human nature, as to believe that there was patriotism enough, love of country enough, pride enough in the nation, to induce its freemen to be willing to abstain from making money, for the good of the nation. I have been egregionally mistaken, sir; I thought I was legislating for freemen who value their rights; that, whilst they were the only people in the world trusted with arms to defend themselves, they would have scorned to take money for the prostitution of their country. I did not think there was a man in the nation who would act the part of a pimp to his mother. It has been so, however; and dreadful, cruel, must be the torments of those who have been accessory to it.

Preparation for War.

H. OF R.

[Mr. WILLIAMS here went at considerable length into an examination of the arguments of Mr. PITKIN, on Saturday last, in reply to a former speech of Mr. W. on the subject of the embargo.]

We have but small choice of courses to pursue, said Mr. WILLIAMS. One course is to admit foreign vessels into our ports as long as the embargo continues. Now, though I do believe that we should be perfectly justifiable in enforcing the embargo and suffering foreign vessels to come and take away our produce, as a punishment to a certain class of men in the country for their treasonable conduct; yet, sir, legislating for a whole nation, not for any particular class, I cannot consent to that.

Another course is that recommended by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. GARDENIER,) to go back and undo all you have done. Will you tread back your steps and go back with him to Jay's Treaty? I have no hesitation in saying that, if we were even placed in the situation in which we then were, I would not accept of it. That treaty carried a feature in it which ought to have damned it at the first view. It took property from one portion of the community to pay for advantages to the other. Yes, sir, it did. You know that a solemn stipulation was made in a treaty of peace, to pay us for the property which they had stolen from us; and you and the House know it was treated away to secure commercial advantages; and yet, thank God, the Southern States did not rise in rebellion against it.

We must select either a continuance of the embargo or war, sir. If ever there were a number of men in this world who had the destinies of a nation in their grasp, the oppositionists to the embargo have that high power. There cannot be a doubt, if excitement had not been made, or if after it was made it had been allayed by those who excited it—and, sir, I have no wish now to excite a disagreeable sensation in the breast of any man; for I have said enough on this head heretofore—if they would now attempt to allay the fervor instead of increasing it, that it would be put down; and if put down, there cannot be a doubt but we should be preserved in peace, and gain stipulations of peace honorable to our country. For God's sake, let me conjure gentlemen not to forget that we have a country. If they repeal the embargo they must support war, because their character—yes, sir, their character as men loving their country is at stake. Will you drive us to a repeal of the embargo, and make no resistance? Are you ready to lie down quietly under the impositions laid upon you? You have driven us from the embargo. The excitements in the East render it necessary that we should enforce the embargo with the bayonet or repeal it. I will repeal it—and I could weep over it more than over a lost child. If you do not resist, you are no longer a nation—you dare not call yourself so—you are the merest vassals conceivable. Sir, if gentlemen will not support us in a war, and I give fair notice that if we take off the embargo I am for war—they must support it, or they will sink the character of the nation. If they will support neither war or embargo, if they destroy the effect of both, I ask you, sir, does not the prostitution of the character of the country lie at their doors? If they mean submission, I will thank them to say so. It somehow or other happens that Republicans are thought to be friendly to France, and Federalists to Great Britain. I believe neither imputation to be correct to the extent to which it is carried. But it is a fact that the British ear is open to that side of the question sooner than to us. Now, sir, I appeal to the minority, who hold the destinies of the nation in their grasp, for they can enforce embargo without the bayonet—I beg them, if they will not declare war, that they will do the best they can for their country. If avarice has so seized on our hearts, as to take away wholly the love of country, (and assuredly it has if we submit) for God's sake let me entreat gentlemen to make the best terms they can for us, to secure the kind protection of the British Government for us—to procure us the miserable boon that the tax on us may be collected here without compelling us to go to Britain to pay it. Sir, the blood which runs through my veins, tells me I was not born to be a British subject; it tells me that the opposition to us must have sucked the same milk—that we are of the same family. Then let us with one heart and hand take hold of war. But, says the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TALLMADGE,) what will you gain by it? It is not money, sir, I want. You lose money by a war, but you gain your rights; you gain the chance of dying honorably in your country's defence instead of submitting, without resistance, and that will be a consolation to thousands, if their country is to be disgraced. Yes, sir, solemn as the reflection is, if we take off the embargo I am for war, and I hope the whole House will be for it. It is true that it brings along with it miseries without number. You will see fear, despair, and all the family of distresses, driving ruthlessly over the country. But it will be infinitely less of suffering to die in defence of the country than to live in bondage. I will not submit. I will plunge into the gulf, and I hope every man will follow me, when we have lost our mantle of peace, the embargo.

Mr. DANA thought it proper, if gentlemen talked of dying for their country, that they should die usefully; for, really, the mere dying could be of no service whatever to the country. He said he was not disposed, at this time, to go into a discussion of the embargo subject generally, but he would state one general position, viz: that the existing policy is a novelty in the history of human society. From the earliest period of time, Mr. D. said, there were no proofs that the system ever did, or ever could produce the events which gentlemen prophesied. When, then, this was an utter novelty on earth, when gentlemen proposed a course never known to savage or civilized life, were they not bound, specifically, to state facts incontestable in support of it? And what, said Mr. D., have they done? Avowed a general, broad, political faith, and wholesale predictions that it will produce an effect, in defiance of all experience. And, am I bound to say, when gentlemen come forward thus, that the plan will succeed? The thing is against you, sir. No ardor of patriotism, intrepidity of courage, or excess of devotion, could make it effectual. He said that the contest was so unequal, in the nature of things, that the United States could not succeed in it. Nothing but superhuman aid could make it succeed. When gentlemen came to examine into facts, it would be found that they omitted to examine the bearing of the thing, in general, or in detail. When had any officer of the Government, or any member of either House of Congress, undertaken to give a view of the relative dependence of the countries of the world upon each other? As far as commerce is essential to the existence of Great Britain, said Mr. D., even now she has the whole world before her. As far as commerce is essential to our existence, the whole world is shut to us by the embargo. Even say that Britain loses one-fourth of her revenue, we lose the whole of ours. They lose a part, but a moderate part, indeed, of their commerce, whilst we lose the whole. The embargo cannot succeed, in the nature of things; and, I am not astonished that you do not find it, in any of the diplomatic correspondence, stated as a measure of coercion, because it would be no easy matter to prove it to be so. What are you to operate on foreign Governments by this measure? Famine and insurrection are to be your chosen troops, your auxiliaries to overturn their systems. You assail them by famine, which is to call up insurrection. This is, I think, the language of the advocates of the embargo. And, can I wonder that it is never spoken of in our official diplomatic correspondence as a measure of hostility? Mr. D. said it was unfortunate that the embargo had ever been laid, and peculiarly unfortunate that it had been continued. Did not gentlemen already say that a faction, a miserable faction, put the Government at defiance? Were the reins of Government held by such trembling hands? If rebellion exists, said he, do you hesitate a moment to give orders to your battalions to march and put it down? If you will not to do this, at once repeal the statutes which give offence. [Mr. BASSETT asked to whom they gave offence?] I am speaking of the obnoxious statutes which are put at defiance, said Mr. D. For what possible use can they be longer continued?

Mr. D. said he had thought that the days of ancient chivalry had not returned yet. Time had been when the champions of old had been accustomed to have fetes and tournaments, and fix days of battle for each other, sometimes an hundred on each side. This was a species of private war; a splendid display of personal courage. But, to talk of one nation giving a day to another to meet it in battle, was a thing which, he said, he had not expected to see in these days. Did gentlemen expect, after Great Britain and France had been wading through blood for years past, that they would be awed into a compliance with our wishes? With whomsoever we fought, Mr. D. said, we should find no contemptible foe. The bravest of our troops might say, when they had been victorious, that it was an honor to be victorious over such men as those. This belligerent hypothesis, said Mr. D.; this contingent declaration of war; this verbal fighting, without actual preparation, will produce little effect. Foreign nations cannot then concede what we demand, without appearing to deprecate our anger; and they will scarcely do that. But, the question is not, now, which nation is wrong, Great Britain or France; but, what will be the most serviceable to my country? The motion under consideration does not seem to promise any beneficial effect, and therefore, I shall vote against it.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that this was certainly a question of no ordinary magnitude, and he had understood, from the most direct source of information, that the gentleman who had brought forward this motion, (Mr. NICHOLAS,) was extremely indisposed. He could wish, for one, to hear what the gentleman had to say in support of his motion, and with that view moved that the Committee now rise. Carried.

TUESDAY, January 31.

Mr. MUMFORD presented memorials and remonstrances of the citizens of the first, second, and fifth wards of the city of New York, at meetings held by the said citizens, respectively stating certain hardships and inconveniences to which the memorialists and other inhabitants of the said city and State have been, and are now subjected, in consequence of the operation of a late act of Congress more effectually to enforce the several embargo laws of the United States; and praying, for the reasons therein set forth, an immediate repeal of the said act.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the resolutions proposed by Mr. NICHOLAS and Mr. BACON, on the twenty-fourth and twenty-seventh instant.

Mr. BASSETT, one of the members for the State of Virginia, presented to the House certain papers in relation to a violation of the several laws laying an embargo upon all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, alleged to have been committed by the officers and crew of the schooner Caroline, of Norfolk, and owned by Daniel Sanford and John Hipkins, formerly trading under the copartnership of Buller Coker and Daniel Sanford; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. BLOWNT, that the farther consideration of a bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening and extending to the river Mississippi the canal of Carondelet," be postponed indefinitely; and the question being put thereon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, that the farther consideration of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines," together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, be postponed indefinitely: the question was taken thereupon, and resolved in the affirmative.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the time for making payment for the public lands of the United States," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to whom was referred, on the twenty-third of November last, a report of the Committee on the Public Lands, made the twenty-first of the same month, on a memorial of the House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory.

PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. POINDESTER, the House proceeded to consider two resolutions proposed by him, which were read and ordered to lie on the table on the twenty-sixth instant; and the same being again read, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a land office for the sale of the lands of the United States, east of the Red river, and west of the Mississippi, in the Territory of Orleans; and that they have leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting the right of pre-emption, in certain cases, to actual settlers in the Territory of Orleans; and that they have leave to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

A division of the question thereon was called for by Mr. BASSETT; whereupon, the question being taken that the House do agree to the first resolution, as originally proposed, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The second resolution was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Messrs. VARNUM, SEAVER, COOK, ILSLEY, BARKER, CUTTS, and GREEN, presented petitions from various towns in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the mode in which the late election of Electors was conducted in that State.

Mr. CUTTS moved, as the time was fast approaching when it would be necessary to decide on the subject of these petitions, a reference of all the petitions on this subject to a joint committee of the two Houses; which was withdrawn to make way for a resolution to the same effect offered by Mr. BACON, which was agreed to in the following words:

Resolved, That a committee on the part of this House, jointly, with such as the honorable Senate may join, be appointed for the purpose of taking into consideration the several memorials from sundry of the citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the mode in which the appointment of Electors for President and Vice President has been proceeded to on the part of the Legislature of said State, as irregular and unconstitutional; and praying for the interference of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, for the purpose of preventing the establishment of so dangerous a precedent; and that said committee do examine the matter of said memorials, and report their opinion thereupon to both Houses.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry to the Senate the several memorials abovementioned, and desire their concurrence in the aforesaid resolution."

Ordered, That the said proposed resolution and order do lie on the table.

PREPARATION FOR WAR.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on Mr. NICHOLAS's resolution; and the question pending being on a motion to insert in the blank, the first day of June—

Mr. KEY hoped the blank in the resolution would not be filled with the first day of June next, because the circumstances of the country required the embargo to be earlier repealed, or such measures to be taken as would enforce its due execution. Before the first day of June arrives, said he, on which it is proposed to remove the embargo, four months would intervene; during which time, if the same opposition to the East which existed now should still prevail, the country would be in a very extraordinary situation. If we continue the law, I shall be among those who would rigidly enforce it, for I have no idea of being dictated to by any section of the Union. But, as I believe, from the accounts which are received, that we cannot enforce it without a measure much worse in its effects than the consequences which might be supposed to result from taking it off earlier, I should, therefore, be in favor of the earliest day possible. We ought not to resort to an exertion of the authority of this nation for four months, nor to continue the measure so long as to excite that sentiment which will certainly follow the enforcement of that measure, except some great advantage be expected from it, if continued for that time. There was another reason why, he said, an earlier day should be fixed. If the House should not think proper to take off the embargo during this session, a new representation would have met here nine days previous to the day mentioned. The present Congress ought to leave the next Congress free to act, with more information than this Congress could possess, because they would have it in their power to avail themselves of the intermediate information. As to that part of the proposition which related to the repeal of the embargo, therefore, the day proposed was too distant. As to the remainder of the proposition, which, he presumed, was to be taken in continuity with the former, it was still worse. It was giving notice to the beligerents, of a disposition, within a particular period, to do what it is not in our power to perform; because, the functions of this House ceasing before that period, the right of determining the course to be pursued, depended on the decision of the new representation. It was impossible, he said, to anticipate the line of conduct which would then be pursued. If the embargo be not removed before the close of the present session, he hoped, at least, that the blank would be filled with the day anterior to the next meeting of Congress. He called upon gentlemen to know whether they would keep it on without enforcing it; and, he asked, whether an enforcement for four months was worth the advantages which gentlemen supposed its continuance would afford? He hoped that the blank would not be filled as proposed.

Mr. DURELL hoped that the blank would not be filled with the first day of June. If the measure of embargo was to be changed for another, he said he saw no reason why the change should be procrastinated. He hoped it would take place at so early a period as would give an equal chance to all the ports in the country. We have heard much, said he, on this floor, in relation to the opposition, in a certain section of the Union, to the embargo laws. I think many observations have been made on this floor, in relation to the embargo laws, which cannot be justified by facts. I have been utterly astonished at a declaration in a newspaper, ("The Monitor,") of this morning, viz: "The majority of the members of the Eastern delegation in Congress, have openly asserted 'that no laws passed by the General Government will be deemed obligatory by their constituents, if they should interfere with their local pursuits and advantages. They publicly consider the 'embargo law as a dead letter,' &c. Now, sir, I wholly and utterly disavow such an opinion; and, I think that a printer in the District of Columbia should not be permitted to make such statements, when unwarranted by facts.

The majority of the New England delegation have not stated on this floor that no laws passed by the General Government will be obligatory, if conflicting with their local advantages. It is a scandalous libel on that majority. By letters I learn that the late supplementary embargo law is not generally approved; that some few have gone so far as to pronounce it unconstitutional. But that a majority of the people possess the sentiments ascribed to them in this paper is wholly false and untrue. Declarations of this sort have a pernicious effect on the community. As respects the State which I in part represent, (New Hampshire,) there is no opposition to the embargo laws. Not a petition has been presented to either branch of the National Legislature for the repeal of those laws, or expressing any sentiment in relation to them, although they suffer as much as their neighbors in Massachusetts. The people (the Republicans at least) are, if I know anything of their sentiments, perfectly satisfied with the law; they have gone with the Government from first to last. Is it justifiable then, sir, that a printer in the District of Columbia should say that the people of New England will oppose your laws? It is unjustifiable and abominable.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee.—With more embarassment of mind I attempt to make some observations on the subject before the Committee, than at any time heretofore, when I have had the honor of submitting any observations on any subject, during the present session of Congress. The reason is, that it is not determined what measure shall be substituted for the embargo, if it shall be raised.

It affords me great pleasure to hear the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. DURELL,) so positively contradicting an assertion which he read from a newspaper. What the gentleman said ought to be taken for a good omen, portending that the few citizens in the Eastern States who have been disposed, somehow or other, not to pay proper respect to the embargo laws, are returning to the practice of those principles of correctness on which the safety of this nation must depend. This is in unison with my own opinion respecting the citizens of that section of the Union. Notwithstanding all that has been said about insurrection and opposition to the laws, so as to endanger the United States, I cannot induce myself to consider it in a serious point of view; positive facts must be proved to me, before my belief of such things shall be had. My confidence in the great body of citizens of the Eastern States is not done away, and I believe there is in the same States a sufficient quantity of force to suppress any attempts which might be made against the Union. And when it comes to the point, there is reason to believe that patriotism similar to that which influenced the Western States in the case of Burr, will also influence our brothers of the Eastern. My vote in this case shall not be influenced, nor is it influenced, by anything that has been said to be done respecting the embargo laws in any of the Eastern States; all such influence is disavowed by me. In this case and every other my vote shall be given according to my understanding what is the real interest, and will best promote the honor, rights, and independence of the United States.

Mr. R. said, that for some days he had been of the opinion that a commercial non-intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and all other Powers having in force orders and decrees violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States, might have been the most proper measure to have been adopted in the then state of things, in place of the embargo; and that under that non-intercourse the United States, some time longer, might have glided along. But, in the language of the gentleman from Connecticut, "the burying hath gone by;" the opportunity for that system it is apprehended is lost. Let it be observed that a commercial non-intercourse system, is not a system of submission to the edicts of either Great Britain or France. Great Britain does not command the United States, to abandon the ocean, or not to trade with her; no such thing. Great Britain declares her ports open to the vessels and produce of the United States; either for internal consumption, so far as it is necessary to supply her market, or for exportation.

Preparation for War.

H. OF R.

Great Britain declares that for that liberty, tribute or duty, call it what you will, must be paid. France does not command the United States to abandon the ocean, or not to trade with her. France declares American vessels, which have been visited by British armed vessels, or have been in British ports, or have British merchandise on board, or British licenses to trade, shall be subject to capture and condemnation. Certainly then the opinion, that a commercial non-intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and all other Powers having in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States, would be submission to Great Britain or France, is not well founded.

Great respect ought to be paid to the observations of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) who was of opinion that the embargo ought to be raised forthwith. There can be no doubt that, if the embargo laws are forthwith repealed, the great quantity of produce, which is said to have passed into Canada, being there detained for sometime by the ice, for that reason may not get to market as soon as other produce shipped from the United States. Notwithstanding the force of these observations, they do not contain sufficient reason to repeal the embargo laws so soon. Let it be considered that the ports of Baltimore and Philadelphia are by the rigor of the winter now blocked up, and probably will continue for some time. In that condition may several other ports in the United States be; if then the embargo laws are forthwith repealed, you will give a decided advantage to those ports which are open or continue always to be so, either in the Southern or Eastern States. This would be partial and unfair, and in operation unjust. If the embargo is raised, let it be at a day so distant, at least, that the merchants in every part of the United States may have notice; not only so, but that the day on which the embargo shall be raised, may be so distant, that there may be every reason to conclude that the natural frozen embargo which now exists shall also be taken off from every port in the United States. If the merchants are to start their vessels, as for a race, let them all have opportunity of a fair start, and let not some of them have time to run over half the course before others of them can get away from the starting place.

I will vote (said Mr. R.) to fill up the blank with the words "the first day of June," for reasons to me equally cogent. The embargo has now continued for more than twelve months, and the great body of the citizens have, with true magnanimity and patriotic love of country, bore up under and supported it, notwithstanding its accompanying privations. An embargo of the same nature and extent, in all probability, would, in the term of six months, have shaken any other maritime nation to its centre. It was left and remained for the sovereign people of the United States in their neutral capacity to manifest to all other nations an hitherto unexperienced firmness under an embargo of such duration and extent. This embargo, and the firmness with which it was supported, will be a grand landmark to future generations by which to steer their political course.

Mr. R. said, it had been his opinion, that the embargo, if it had been universally regarded with that respect which it ought to have been, would have operated as an impenetrable wall of defence to the United States, until those days of trouble, in which nations in Europe appear to be executing vengeance on each other, had passed over. It certainly would have had that effect, if patriotism and love of country had universally prevailed over love of money. The United States are a new nation, composed either originally or personally, of emigrants from almost every European nation. This nation does not owe its origin to any one European nation, and neither of these nations has any right, for that cause, to claim or demand any peculiar favor. The United States are three thousand miles distant, far removed in the depths of the wilderness, from the bloody wars of Europe; it might therefore have been most proper, and most consistent with their safety to have been contented at home, and patiently endured the privation of foreign superfluities, even without the constraint of an embargo, for some time longer, and if possible, until those days of European affliction had passed over.

There is now on hand, it is presumed, a vast quantity of produce. The agricultural interest has, to its great disadvantage, endured for a sufficient length of time, the great depression in the price of produce; if then the embargo is designed to be raised in time for the produce to get to market, it ought not to be delayed until the first of June. On the fourth day of March next let the embargo be raised. There will be sufficient time for the merchants in every part of the United States to be informed of that event. On that day, there is reason to believe, the natural embargo by freezing, which now exists, will be taken off. On the 4th day of March next, another Administration will come into power, and it may be most proper and convenient that that Administration shall commence its career with a new order of things. The United States have abstained from navigating the ocean a considerable length of time; lest, then, it may be believed that there is an intention to abandon it altogether, on the fourth day of March next let the navigation of the ocean be resumed, and on that day and forever after let the United States assert and maintain their right to navigate the ocean, the great common and highway of nations, freely and agreeably to the laws of public reason.

When I contemplate, said Mr. R., the great danger to which the seafaring citizens and commerce of the United States will be exposed on the ocean, it is with great reluctance indeed I agree to raise the embargo. Great Britain with steady policy, for centuries past, has been endeavoring to acquire the dominion of the ocean and monopoly of commerce. To these two idols, dominion of the ocean and monopoly of commerce, an immense profusion of human blood has been poured out in libation, and the commerce of every maritime nation has been sacrificed. Great Britain after various efforts and struggles, has at last acquired the favorite object; in other words, has by main force seized upon and usurped the dominion of the ocean, the common property of all nations, and by her laws has virtually declared that no nation shall buy or sell unless the property or merchandise shall be stamped with her mark. The decrees of France are also arrayed against the commerce of the United States, and threaten destruction to every part of it that shall come within their grasp. In this state of things, if the embargo be raised, there can be but one opinion as to merchant vessels, and that is, that if they may be designated to put to sea, they shall be authorized, in the first instance, to arm. On the subject of war, nothing hitherto has by me been said. I desire to avoid war if possible, and therefore will not take war into consideration at this time, and why shall the United States forbear longer than the fourth of March next to resume the navigation of the ocean? Has not all negotiation with Great Britain and France failed? With Great Britain it has run down to a mere dispute about words. It appears by the late despatches from the Minister of the United States in Great Britain, that the question of negotiation now is, whether such words were spoken, and if spoken, with what understanding; this certainly is descending into the abyss of humiliation. I cannot forbear, said Mr. R., expressing a wish that our Ministers were on their way home, although they might experience severe weather on their passage.

We have been told that the British fleet is a barrier; it is admitted that it is a barrier—a barrier against the freedom of the ocean, against the freedom of commerce, and against the commercial rights of nations.

We have been told that Great Britain is fighting for her existence; in what manner does that respect the United States? The United States cannot be charged with the cause of her quarrel. But Great Britain is contending against a Power who appears to desire the dominion of the continent of Europe. Let it be so, that will not avail, or help the position; some of the greatest, best, most honorable, and patriotic men of Great Britain, have said, that if the power of France has arrived to transcendent greatness, Great Britain may thank herself for pushing France to that state of greatness. Let Great Britain restore the many thousand seamen, citizens of the United States, whom she holds in slavery, to their country. Let Great Britain indemnify for the many millions worth of property of citizens of the United States, by her unjustly captured and condemned. Let Great Britain rescind and repeal all her edicts, proclamations, and laws, which, violate the lawful commerce and rights of the United States. Let Great Britain declare that the ocean shall be free, and that the commerce of the United States shall travel unmolested on the highway of nations. Let Great Britain make reparation for the many violations of the sovereignty of the United States; and after these things are all performed, and justice done to the United States, then let gentlemen tell us that Great Britain is fighting for her existence.

There was a time when Great Britain had it in her power to have conciliated and secured to herself the friendship and affection of the United States; a time when, after the fire of the Revolutionary war had been extinguished, the United States were blooming into commercial existence, then was the time for Great Britain to have taken the Hercules in her arms, and to have cherished him as a brother; by so doing she might have had a brother, indeed, who would have stood by her in the day of trouble. On the contrary, Great Britain has been studiously, anxiously, and industriously careful to alienate the friendship and affections of the United States. Let the whole conduct of Great Britain towards the United States, since the treaty of peace, be attended to, and then let the unimpassioned and impartial observer say whether Great Britain has not been industriously careful to alienate the friendship and affection of the United States, from herself.

Let the impartial witness judge in this cause, and he will pronounce sentence against Great Britain. Great Britain, by violence, has rent asunder those bonds of social friendship which might have connected her and the United States forever. But, sir, we are asked, why shall we arm? Who is our enemy? These questions may be answered, by asking two other questions, viz: Why shall we not arm? Who is our friend? Sir, it appears as if the whole world was arrayed against the United States. Let any gentleman take the map of the world, and put his finger on the spot, designating the place, where dwells a nation the avowed friend of the United States. It will give me great pleasure indeed, to be so informed. And here, said Mr. R., I will take the liberty to observe, that it is time, and it is right, for the United States to look over the world, and if possible, ascertain the fact, whether there be that nation; and if that nation can be found, I shall have no hesitation to take him in my arms, to call him friend and brother, and to make with him a treaty of everlasting amity, love, and friendship.

Mr. Cook.—Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to filling the blank for repealing the embargo on the first day of June next, and to issue letters of marque and reprisal at that time; because, sir, this is a Government of the people, and their voice is not at present for war. You have too long interposed the embargo as a shield to our citizens against British depredations; they have lost their war pulse; they must again suffer, to again wind them up their former spirit. This being a Government of, and from the people, whose servants we are, it is our duty to advance their interests and to enforce the general will of the nation. Not, sir, that the embargo laws cannot be executed by the arm of this Government. I unhesitatingly declare that this Government can be supported; and your laws can by the strong arm of Government be enforced. But, sir, is it true policy to enforce these laws? I do presume it is not, as it may produce a civil war, the worst of all wars. The embargo has been sufficiently tried, and the experiment has proved that it is not sufficiently coercive to induce the belligerents to abandon their orders and decrees. Why then continue it to the injury of our own citizens, and especially those who are our best citizens, our friends, who are most disposed to support the Administration and our laws?

Preparation for War.

H. OF R.

Sir, I lament that the public sentiment and opinion on the subject of foreign aggressions is different in the different sections of our country. The South say embargo or war; and the North and East say, no embargo, no war. I applaud the resentment of the people of the South, and highly revere their high sense of honor. I lament that this difference of opinion exists; yet, as it does exist, we must take things as they are, and legislate accordingly. The genius and duty of Republican Governments is to make laws to suit the people, and not to attempt to make the people suit the laws. In monarchies the people are drilled to suit the laws flowing from the despot; but this never should be attempted in a Republican Government, the strength of which is the love and attachment of the citizens. Sir, you cannot make war which will promise a successful issue whilst the country is disunited. The people must with one voice unitedly call for war from every section and village of our country. Then indeed we may venture on war. The people must urge us into war; we cannot drive them into a successful contest. No, sir, you know the attempt is futile, is idle. Sir, as I consider myself a representative of the people, I view it as my duty at this eventful moment to make known to you what I do conceive to be (not the universal) but the general opinion and wishes of your citizens of all politics in the Northern States. I will not be answerable for the correctness of these opinions and wishes of the people. No, sir, I could in some instances wish they were more consistent and less governed by the cupidity of gain. Yet, sir, their opinions arise from their local situation. The nature of man is the same everywhere; surrounded by the same objects, their opinions, sentiments, and conduct will be the same. Place the people of the South in the same situation, and surrounded by the same temptations, and pressed with the same losses, and their conduct would be the same as those of the North. Sir, from the communications I have received from the North, and from other sources of information, I believe that I shall be able to state their opinions and some of the reasons on which their opinions are founded. To comply with their wishes, we must repeal the embargo laws at as early a day as will comport with justice to all the merchants of our country. Let all have an equal chance to be first in the foreign market, and perhaps the first of March will be as early a day as will comport with this necessary provision. As a substitute for the embargo, they mean not submission. Their voice is, "arm in defence of natural and national rights." They wish for liberty to arm and defend against an infracton of our indisputable rights on the ocean. This defensive arming they wish to see regulated in such manner as shall preserve peace if possible, and to do away (as far as is honorable and politic) every unnecessary cause of collision with foreign Powers. To do this, will it not be wise, considering France and England as equally offending us, to put our relations with them on exactly the same basis? Inhibit by law the exportation of all contraband goods from our country, and permit none but real citizens of the United States to navigate the vessels of the United States.

These restrictions, which indeed would not injure our fair trade, but would expel from our country the demoralizing dregs of jails and men-of-war, would serve in a great measure to prevent collisions, and to secure to our own citizens the reward of their own enterprise. To resist in such a manner as to induce a change in our favor, let us increase, and perhaps double the duties on all importations from the offending Powers, and reduce the duties on goods from other quarters.

These, and other retaliatory measures, may be adopted, expressly, to be only contemporaneous with the present piratical systems of the Europeans. And, sir, if laws be necessary to prevent our citizens from selling themselves for slaves, by the purchase of British licenses, enact laws the most penal, and even the most sanguinary against such traitors to their country's rights.

Our merchants, whose all may be the forfeiture of a much longer continuance of the embargo, or a declaration of war, lament that the violators of our maritime rights, their allies and satellites, constitute almost all the commercial world with whom they have been dealing. They therefore deprecate all measures tending to a war with so many nations, as utterly destructive to trade. At least they pray for a suspension of the calamities of war, until the course of events may justify us in choosing a single enemy to contend with; at present so equal are the Emperor and the King in the trade of plunder, that no selection can be made; for it would be absurd to aid one for the same abuses which induce us to fight the other.

Sir, I know some would resort to non-intercourse; but if we do, I fear that the same spirit which has defeated the embargo, will defeat the laws of non-intercourse, and we should be obliged soon to repeal them also. The spirit of trade is active and ever busy, and it must have vent. The late forbearance of Great Britain has increased the clamor for a renewal of trade, and for a speedy repeal of the embargo. You know, sir, that of about five hundred and ninety vessels which sailed since the embargo, by permission, only eight or ten have been captured. This affected forbearance of the British may lead to more numerous captures, when we generally resume the use of the ocean. Our merchants may again experience their treachery; and nothing short of a renewal of British spoliation will again drive the New England merchants to the feet of Government, with tenders of lives and fortunes for the support of war. If our vessels are permitted to arm and defend rights wholly indisputable, it cannot be called submission, for it is its entire opposite. But I have already declared, that a further continuance of the embargo, now its coercive effects are despaired of by seven-eighths of this House, will be submission.

Nor are we any way answerable for the consequences to either of the offending Powers; they deserve nothing but war from us; yet if the policy we may adopt should press harder on one than on the other, if we study nothing but our own interest, wholly disregarding of them, we must be exonerated from the reproaches of the candid. I wish Americans would look more at home, and less to foreign nations, for motives of Government.

Sir, it is said, that by filling the blank with the first day of June, with the substitute of letters of marque and reprisal, we should thereby hold out a threat which might induce a recession of orders and decrees. As war would inevitably be the consequence of a persistence, I believe that such a threat would have a directly contrary effect; and as I am averse from an expensive war, which neither promises us honor or riches, so am I against continuing the embargo until that time.

Sir, I hope I shall not be misunderstood. I speak of opinions and sentiments, not as I wish they were, but as they really are. Reflections from gentlemen of the South, against the commercial and gain-loving sentiments of the North, will only serve to disunite, at a time when the chain of our Union ought to be brightened.

Sir, all such reflections, all rantings, asperities, and personalities, should be carefully avoided by the real friends of the Union. We from the North fight our enemies, but we reason with our friends. We conclude that a man has either lost or expended all his reason, when he attacks the person of his opponent instead of his arguments, and we carefully distinguish between the calm voice of reason, and the rant of passion and prejudice. I trust we shall here unite and save our country.

Mr. EPPES said he understood that the only question at present was, with what day the blank in the resolution should be filled. It was not his intention on this question to enter into the merits of the proposition. But as his friend (Mr. NICHOLAS) who offered the resolution was not in his place, and he found no gentleman had attempted to assign any reasons in favor of the day which he had proposed, Mr. E. said he would offer a few observations in support of that day. In the course which I pursue on this floor, said Mr. E., I am not to be driven from that line of conduct which I consider best, by the feeling of any portion of the people of this country; and while I will ever manifest a proper respect for the opinions of men in any portion of the country, I will never shrink from that course which I consider calculated to promote the interest of the great body of the people. I have no apprehensions, whatever course be taken, that we have anything to fear from insurrection and rebellion, and I believe that the people of the Eastern country, when they see the charges made against them, on this floor and elsewhere, will feel no other sentiment than indignation, that men can rise and denounce them, not only as likely to rebel, but as actually in a state of rebellion. I ask gentlemen who believe that the people either are or will be in a state of rebellion, to produce the evidence in support of the charge. Do you know, sir, that force has been opposed to the execution of your laws in any portion of this country? If the people in any portion of it have raised the standard of rebellion, if men as enlightened as the Americans really cannot bear the laws of their own Government, I ask gentlemen to point out the particular cases which justify the assertion. I believe that no such opposition does exist; and I express with confidence, if any such does exist, that we have no information of any kind which can be relied on on that point. It does not appear to me that the feeling which has been manifested in regard to this measure, affords any just ground on which to legislate. We are to consider what course is best calculated to promote the interest of the country, and that course we ought to pursue. If men in any section of the Union will oppose the laws of their country, we have force enough to put them down; and I will never shrink from using it. This much I say, at this time, because the opposition to the laws was the first ground taken in opposition to the first day of June. Another ground is, that the fixing on that day will interfere with the rights of those who succeed us. I do not consider this to be the case. We were called here to exercise our judgment as to the good of the people. The Legislature can never die; and when the next Congress meet, if any circumstances shall have occurred which shall induce them to change the course contemplated, our acts will not at all affect the course which they may think proper to pursue. I believe, sir, that every member in the House will do me the justice to say that I never have concealed my opinion of the situation of the country. It must be granted that our situation is serious; that it ever will be serious when a free people are placed in such a situation that they must either abandon their rights or enforce them by physical strength.

It has been said that war is not the greatest evil which could occur. Sir, I consider it the greatest evil which could befall our country, except a surrender of our rights or independence, and that I believe to be a greater evil, because there is nothing in this world worth preserving, if we lose our freedom and independence. But if this country is to adopt the principles of the wandering Jews of Europe, if we are to suffer ourselves to be stripped and robbed without resistance, and obtain our livelihood by mean or dishonest practices, it is proper that we should put ourselves under the care of some European Power, for the protection of those rights which we have not the spirit to defend. If we postpone the repeal till the first of June we shall have an opportunity of again hearing from the different Powers of Europe, and of knowing what may be the operation of the public despatches. We shall know whether they will withdraw their orders and decrees, or whether appeal to arms. I have always thought that when the embargo should be removed, war must be the result; and if I am disposed to postpone for a period an event which will always be awful to a country like this, gentlemen will do me the justice to believe, that I am not less willing than themselves to maintain the rights of the country. It will give us one more chance for peace; and notwithstanding the opinions which have been expressed, I declare to God that I am anxious for peace. But when the question is between peace and a surrender of our rights as a nation, I am in favor of war. I am willing to take this one chance of peace, and for that reason I am willing to postpone the period of issuing letters of marque and reprisal, till the first of June. I have another reason. When this nation tries its strength, I am not willing that it should do it unprepared. I have no idea that war can be carried on without men. How are you to fight, sir? Are you to arm your merchant vessels—to let your vessels sail with all their canvass stretched, to British ports, to take licenses, pay tribute, and disgrace their country? The arming your merchant vessels will have the appearance of resisting taxation without doing it. What would be the consequence of our vessels going out armed for their protection? You might as well nail your embargo law to their masts, and suppose it will protect the merchant vessels, as to think of doing it by arming them. The situation of the world forbids the idea that we can force a trade against Great Britain. We must raise men and prepare to attack her where she is vulnerable; and when we have done this we may remain quiet, till it is time to commence operations. Another objection has been made to inserting so late a day as the first day of June. It is this: that we give notice to the belligerents, that on a certain day we mean to make war upon them. When we come to examine this objection, sir, it is nothing. Have not gentlemen declared in their places that Congress is to be convened to exchange war for embargo? Have they not made preparation for an extra session for the purpose? The British and French Government are as well convinced of our determination, as they can be by any resolution we may pass. It cannot be an offence, therefore, for the postponement till that day is evidence of a desire for peace. We have withdrawn from the ocean our commercial capital, and fifty thousand citizen mariners, from a desire for peace. Whenever then the embargo be repealed, it is war, if the obnoxious edicts be not repealed; and I am willing to postpone this change a few months, that we may not disgrace ourselves to the world, and make ourselves ridiculous at home, by going to war without men. And while I make this declaration I wish gentlemen distinctly to understand me, that I never will submit to the edicts of the belligerents; and also, that I will forever vote against the removal of the embargo during a continuance of the belligerent edicts, unless those who wish to remove it will substitute war for it. And this determination I will maintain, even if it drive the whole country to rebellion. Even if driven from my seat at the point of the bayonet, I never will surrender the rights of my country by a removal of the embargo without an efficient substitute.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said, that the mode of filling this blank must depend most materially on the course which the House should think proper to pursue. He said, he should be governed much in the vote which he should give by the supposition that the course would be such as should be consistent with the honor and dignity of the nation. He hoped gentlemen would not be diverted from the course which was proper by this or that publication, in any newspaper; that they would never vary their course in conformity with the suggestions of others, nor deviate from the course which they pursued, because newspapers had proposed a contrary one. I, said Mr. J., will not be influenced by newspaper publications, because our affairs are too important for us to suffer ourselves to be influenced by their attacks on the House, or on the Government; neither will I be influenced by a fear of exciting insurrection if our measures be not abandoned, believing that our course is correct, and that it is indispensable to maintain our course at all hazards, even at the point of the bayonet. And I beg of gentlemen not to be diverted from what has been declared the only course of honor and propriety, by the intimidating threats or inflammatory resolutions of a few popular meetings. I am convinced that the great mass of this people will pursue such a course, as will convince those opposed to the laws in force, that, if constitutionally enacted, they shall be enforced till they be constitutionally changed; and if we do subserve the views of those who are determined to put down the laws at all hazards, and change our course, we deserve not to remain in the councils of the nation, we ought to be supplanted by men who will do what is right, regardless of the consequences. If our measures be right, the people will support us; and if wrong, the elections will produce a change in the policy of the national Councils—a pacific one, not forced upon us at the point of the bayonet. I am of opinion that the first of June is the proper time with which to fill the blank in the resolution before you, for many substantial reasons, most of which have been urged by my friend, who last addressed you. It will be recollected that our last accounts from Europe are only down to the first of December. Important events are taking place there, having relation to our affairs, by the pressure of the belligerents upon each other, and perhaps upon ourselves. I know that an idea was advanced, and it could not have escaped the recollection of gentlemen, in the letter read yesterday, (Mr. Canning's answer to Mr. Pinkney,) that this Government had been influenced in its conduct towards Great Britain, by its negotiations with France. The Ministry of the former has been induced to believe the false charges originated from prostituted presses here, and wafted across the Atlantic, that there is a design in Government to subserve the views of France coincide in the views of the French Emperor. I believe, sir, that the perusal of the documents laid before the House at the commencement of the session, will induce them to entertain a different opinion. What would be said, were we to let loose our vessels to-morrow, with letters of marque and reprisal, if, before they were well launched on the ocean, the winds of March should waft to us a vessel bearing the olive branch in her prow? We should justly be accused of precipitation, for not giving time to the nations of Europe to consider what course they shall pursue towards us. It will be seen that my argument is predicated on the idea that war must follow a removal of the embargo. I cannot suppose, after an almost unanimous vote of this House, that they could not submit without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, that they will submit. I conceive that letters of marque and reprisal must unquestionably follow a removal of the embargo, because any other course would virtually amount to submission. Arming our vessels cannot possibly have any good effect. What would be the consequence of such a measure? We admit the right of search for contraband of war; and to resist it would be an act of war or piracy. If a belligerent vessel meets one of ours armed for neutral trade, and discovers that it is of inferior force, resistance would be ineffectual, and would completely seal the destruction of the vessel. If the force of our vessel were superior, which would not be the case perhaps one time out of ten, the cruiser would sheer off till it were reinforced with the assistance of another; arming our merchant vessels would produce no good effect then, and we must issue letters of marque and reprisal, if we would not submit. But, gentlemen say, let us fix on an earlier day, that we may catch the Northern speculators. The national net must not be spread and drawn, sir, for such petty purposes as crushing a few dishonest men, who in the pursuit of money have prostituted the honor of the country as far as depended upon a rigorous execution of its laws. If we listen to such policy, we shall change our opinions every day, as much as if we listened to newspaper abuse from that quarter. I concur heartily in saying that it would not be a threat to either nation to declare that the embargo shall be repealed, and letters of marque and reprisal issued. It will be a lure to both. Neither nation can consider it as a threat to itself, but to its enemy. And if they should choose to consider it as a threat, it has been said frequently, that another course could not be pursued; for were we to make this declaration with closed doors, many instances have proved that the precaution would be ineffectual. The declaration by the act for an extra session, that the month of June will be the limitation to the embargo, was as effectually notifying Great Britain that we would pursue a different course, as if we were now formally to declare it. I am therefore of opinion that the change of measures should not take place till the first of June; the interval between this time and that will give an opportunity to the European Powers to say whether they will have war with us or do us justice; and as no man there has pretended to defend either the orders or decrees, on the ground of right or the laws of nations, I hope they will show that they have yet a little justice left—for they must see that the imputation that this Government is yielding to the influence of France, or that it is hostile to England, is the most shameless falsehood that can be conceived. The offer to repeal the embargo as to Great Britain if she would repeal her Orders in Council, was an offer to take sides with Great Britain. I hope that they will be convinced that it is their interest to change their policy towards us; I trust that their people will, as they have done heretofore, change their Ministry for the purpose of changing their measures. They will have seen that we ask but half justice at their hands; that the embargo law is but continued for the purpose of avoiding war with them; that we are willing to rescind our embargo if they will withdraw their orders, leaving to friendly adjustment the affair of the Chesapeake, and a thousand other acts, each of which might be cause for war. I think that I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Cook) to say, that the course which he suggested was not perhaps correct; but that the people pressed it upon him. Sir, I hope the House will not, like the gentleman from Massachusetts, be influenced by such considerations to do that which their judgment tells them is not correct; but will pursue the line of their duty, without being diverted from it by the wishes of any particular class of people.

Mr. NELSON said he rose to make a few, and very few, observations on this subject. Two or three different days had been mentioned with which to fill the blank. He had heard no reason which satisfied his mind that the period should be postponed until the first day of June. He said he was sorry that the resolutions had been introduced into the House. He knew not whether it was not proposed to give up the best system that could be adopted, to take up another which was totally untried. He objected to the introduction of the resolution, upon two grounds, one of which had been given as a reason for introducing the resolution, viz: that the embargo is at this time a dead letter, and could not be executed. I believe, said Mr. N., that it is not reduced to the situation of a dead letter yet; and I believe that it can be enforced without bloodshed, and that the honor of the Government is as much at stake on that point as on any point in contest with foreign nations. What is our situation, sir, according to the arguments of gentlemen? A law has been passed by the General Government, within its Constitutional power, which is acquiesced in by nineteen-twentieths of the people. But the remaining portion, perhaps not so large a portion as one-twentieth, have made opposition to it—have made a noise and clamor against it—and now we are called upon to give it up. The next general law we pass may operate severely on the Southern States; the people may make a noise; the walls of Charleston may be covered with cannon, and noisy demagogues may run up and down the streets, haranguing the people, and we might repeal it. The next law might operate on the people of the Western country. They might, perhaps, follow the precious example of the Eastern people, brush up their rifles, tell us this is a hard law, and therefore we must repeal it. Is this Government? Is a Government of this kind worthy of support? Away with it, sir, and let the people form a Government which is worthy of support, a Government which is capable of supporting itself: it is not come to this, sir; it is all mere idle declamation. If we adhere to our system, there is no doubt that it can be carried into effect. The fifty thousand volunteers which have been decreed as intended to enforce the embargo laws, were never calculated on for that purpose. No, sir; the people there are as strong as anywhere; and if it be necessary to put down a few traitors, the people of the country can do it. It is not necessary to march men from one State to another to put down rebellion or insurrection; the people will put it down. Every man of reflection in the Northeast would reason with himself in this way: "What are these people about to do? They are about to overturn all law, by undertaking to decide the constitutionality of laws which are undisputed by the proper authority. If these things are acquiesced in, what becomes of my property, which is only secured to me by law? If the people can put down one law, they have the same right to put down another." Would not every man of property, of rationality, argue thus? Surely he would; for that man must be a madman who would wish to see any law put down in this way. So long as a law is unrepealed, it is the law of the land; and while it is, every man will say it ought to be carried into effect until it is constitutionally repealed. Then, I ask, whether we are about to give up this system to do one of two things, viz: either to submit to Great Britain and France, or to enter into war? There is not an individual in the nation who would agree to submit. What will be the consequence of war, and what its results? No one can tell. Will it bring money into our pockets? I fear not. Will it redound to our honor? I fear not. Will it procure us the object we aim at? I fear not. What is there of the belligerents that we can get at? We can affect but one; all her territory on this Continent may be got. Is it worth retaining when in our possession? I believe not. Submission is out of the question; and however I deprecate war, I had rather go into it at once, than to repeal the embargo, and do nothing else; for, if we wage another war for seven years, and are unsuccessful, we can do no worse than submit at last. It is better to submit after resisting, than to submit without resistance. As a man acts a more honorable part who resists an insult, than the man who will take offence at nothing. We had better have our houses and property burnt forever, and involve ourselves in a national debt for ages, than submit to the belligerents. We are in a dangerous situation, such as we were never in before.

And I will ask another question. What reason have we to believe that those who will not support the embargo because it operates on a foreign nation, will go to war with us against that nation? Why, sir, when those people oppose our laws, constitutionally enacted, the evil is great; but if we enter into a war, and they will not go with us, but directly or indirectly aid the enemy, will not our situation be worse? Those very men who set your laws at defiance, if you go to war, will be against you. But let what will come, whatever may happen, is better than submission. If we give up the embargo system, the sooner we go into the other the better. Two reasons have been given why the repeal of the embargo should be postponed until the first day of June. It is said that, by so doing, we shall have time to raise men.

Sir, at the last session a law passed for raising troops. We find it not easy to get troops in this country, where the wages of the laborer are so high, and of the soldier so low. It is not to be expected that a man who can get ten dollars a month, be well fed, and sleep under a good cover, will put himself under the power of any officer, who has absolute sway over him, for five dollars a month, when he must sleep in the open air, and undergo all the hardships incidental to a state of war. Added to this, a man who enlists for a soldier is liable to have his brains blown out, and that is generally considered as an inconvenient circumstance, sir. Our soldiers, therefore, are generally enlisted from amongst that class who are too idle to work for their livelihood. There are not, thank God, a great many of that class of men in society; and there not being a great many, is the reason why recruiting goes on so slowly in this country. Between this day and the first of June you would scarcely be able to raise three thousand men. And would these men, in that time, be better soldiers than so many militia? No, sir; time and discipline alone can make soldiers. Raise men now, and by June they will know but very little more of discipline than our militia. If then, men could not be raised, or, if raised, could not be disciplined before the first of June, this argument in favor of postponing the repeal of the embargo until that time is done away. Another argument in favor of the first day of June is, that we will take the last chance of peace. I am tired of this, sir. We have taken at least thirty chances of this kind. If we must go to war at last, it would have been vastly better that we had gone to war immediately after the attack on the Chesapeake. It is taking a chance in a lottery which consists entirely of blanks and no prizes. In order to prevent our striking them the first blow on the first of June, either of the belligerents may strike us before that time. They will know that we cannot strike until the first day of June, and they may therefore take the first day of May. If the embargo is to be given up, I do not care how soon, if it be to-morrow. And I beg the House to understand me; I never will let go the embargo, unless, on the very same day on which we let go the embargo, we draw the sword.

H. OF R.

Preparation for War.

JANUARY, 1809.

I shall vote for that part of the resolution relating to a repeal of the embargo, because I do not wish to check the wishes of the House on the subject; for, when the embargo is taken off, it should be done with a unanimous vote. As to the second part of the proposition, I shall also vote for drawing the sword; but, if I should be in the minority on that, when the subject comes into the House, I shall vote against every part of the proposition.

Mr. GARDENIER said that it seemed that the House was on the eve of commencing a new experiment; that they had declined the favorite one, which was promised to be so very effectual, the efficiency of which it had at one time been considered stupid for any man to doubt; that they were about to lay that by—and for once, he said, it seemed that he was likely to be in the majority. He was happy to compliment the wisdom of the House on the occasion. He was, however, unfortunately one of those whose confidence in the authors of experiments in this country had not been at all increased by the issue of that experiment which had been thirteen months in coming to an issue. He said he must therefore be permitted to doubt of any proposed experiment. In respect to the present proposition, sir, said he, I feel myself, as it were, walking in the dark, with a blind guide. Therefore I must exercise the humble privilege of judging for myself, of endeavoring to feel out for myself my own way, to the great conclusion. I have, however, made one reflection, on what I have heard on this subject—that on this occasion we are not overwhelmed with a profusion of promises of any good effect to be derived from the measure proposed. It appears to me, and I take it as a happy omen, that no gentleman has ventured to say that war would obtain the objects for which alone war ought to be waged. I recollect, sir, that you were told, when the embargo was laid, that it would have the best effect. There were many who believed it; a majority of this House believed it. And for myself, when I looked whence this encouragement, this prophecy proceeded, I was almost inclined to doubt whether it would not work well. But now no one appears to believe that the proposed measure will bring us to any issue whatever, to any determination of the distresses of the country; and yet, because it is spirited, brave and manly, we are to plunge the nation into a war, and sacrifice all that the embargo has left us. No one tells you that such a course would be productive of any advantage. I cannot go into a measure, sir, from which even the friends of it do not hope any good. I do not like fighting merely for the sake of fighting, when there is no object in view. It is exhausting the nation when it is growing to be powerful. I will engage in no Quixotic expeditions. I will go to fight no windmills. I will, as was said by a gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. LYON,) who says many sensible things in this House, sir, let the nation grow. The nation has not arrived to that state of manhood in which it can claim superiority. If the policy of the present day be pursued, it will be a rickety infant; it may be a spunky spiteful child, but will have no strength, and will never command respect. I therefore say again, with the gentleman from Kentucky, let the nation grow; let that be the policy of the Government, and we shall be respectable for that policy. Everything which derogates from our strength, tends to render us unimportant as a nation.

It is with sensations of the deepest regret that I have heard gentlemen on this floor make use so frequently of the term rebellion, and apply it to a portion of the country in which, I venture to say, no spirit of rebellion exists. If the consciousness of their rights, and, among those rights, of the right of pursuing their own happiness, be rebellion, you have rebellion enough in that country, sir. Have we come to this already, that when a people are ground down into dust, when all their fair prospect of prosperity is blasted, when they have no hope even for existence, when the comforts of life are even taken away from them, when they experience nothing but suffering—when such a people, convinced (as I think all reasonable people must be convinced) that this is to produce no good purpose, rise up and say that they cannot consent to be martyred thus, that it shall be called rebellion? It is too much for human nature; they have borne sufferings of a most unexampled character for months, but, in hopes that the speculations of our political theorists might be realized, they have submitted to them, and vented their dispositions only in memorials to the President before the commencement of Congress, for they conceived that when Congress met there could be no doubt of their being relieved. When Congress met nothing was done. What would you have of freemen? They have intelligence; the very form of our Government supposes that they have intelligence, and that they are capable of judging of their own interest. This people, so intelligent, so wise, (and after this at least I hope I shall be considered as a good Republican,) see with a great many others, that this embargo, however, it may operate on one of the belligerents—I believe it is not pretended that it operates on the other—cannot possibly operate to such an extent on the former as to bring that nation to terms. Then, say they, all this excessive suffering to which we are subjected, is to no purpose; we must still go on supporting this state of things, without being encouraged by the slightest glimmering of hope. Can you ask it, sir? Can you expect it? Recollect that if on the one hand the Government is entitled to respect, there is a people for whose benefit that Government was instituted; and it cannot be expected, whatever may be said here, when the Government does not do good for them, that they will say that they will support it. No people ever did say so. You are too theoretic; you cannot expect it. But to call this decision of the people, to whom it rightfully belongs to make it—to call this decision, when expressed in the deep-toned language of indignant patriotism, rebellion—sir, I cannot find a word to express my ideas at hearing the majesty of the people assailed in this way; and, as a Representative of the people, I will not endure it; it is abominable.

Preparation for War.

H. OF R.

But, how do gentlemen make out rebellion in this case? Does any gentleman suppose the town meetings in New England are to rise up and make rebellion or unregulated resistance to the laws? Indeed, let me assure gentlemen that there is not the slightest ground for apprehension of this kind. You must recollect, sir, that the General Government was originally formed by free and independent States; and when the causes which produced the Union ceased, it is not to be wondered at that the Union should cease with it. And it is the duty of this body to take care that the causes which produced it shall be kept in full and complete existence. It is by employing proper means only that you can ever hope to produce a desired effect. The Government was instituted for certain purposes: when those purposes cease, the Government must cease also. All free people know this: history is full of examples of it. Instead, then, of telling the people that they are in a state of rebellion, make your laws such that they will like them—as that they shall be happy under them—and then, sir, you never need talk to the people from this House. You have evidence of it under the present Administration. The people felt obliged to it that they were happy, because the sun shone upon them, but the system pursued is at an end, because it was not calculated for the storm and tempest: it could not endure turbulent times. Because it has fallen to pieces, the Administration has become more unpopular. The President himself has said, that when laws please the people, they will rally round the standard of the law. It would seem, sir, as if a degree of pleasure was felt by some gentlemen in the House, in supposing the people of the East and North to be a people inclined to be restless. Suppose that the people of the South could not believe that the embargo would answer the purpose for which it was designed; suppose that they were satisfied that it would bring them to no happy result; is there that disposition in the people of the South that they would sit quiet and bless the hand that put these useless burdens upon them? Is that the character of the South? I have a much better opinion of the people of the South than to believe it. If, notwithstanding, the embargo has produced no effect, their great confidence induces them to go on supporting this thing, they act very patriotically in so doing. The North and East oppose it from motives equally patriotic; and it is strange to me, that, as to that point, thirteen months should not have brought all men to the same mind. When the people of the South, under a former Administration, felt themselves aggrieved; when they thought that the public liberty was in danger; when they were told that the alien and sedition laws were about to ruin them; did they sit still under them? Was there a quiet submission to the Government? No, sir; the Legislature of the State of Virginia did what they thought to be their duty: they thought themselves right and the Government wrong, and took a great and commanding stand for the liberty (as they thought) of Virginia. Why should not Massachusetts, too, take the same stand, when she thinks herself about to be destroyed; not because she differs with you on mere points of theory; it is their very bread which is attempted to be taken from the people there, without which they cannot enjoy the liberty of the press and speech—a pressure infinitely more severe than that caused by the alien and sedition laws. And I am rather surprised that gentlemen, whose hearts no doubt glowed with patriotism when they saw their own State take a stand, cannot endure the same stand when taken by another State.

I do not make these remarks by way of casting a reflection on the State of Virginia; I do it to show that human nature is the same throughout the United States. Make your people believe that they are imposed upon and suffering without cause, and they will every where manifest the same disposition. Let the people of the South be but once convinced, as the people of the North are, that this embargo is but a weak and feeble expedient, and they will join the people of the North against it. But it seems that in one point at least gentlemen show a proper practical disposition, and I give them most sincere thanks for it. They start at last at pursuing a system which might in the end produce consequences which I tremble to think of. But it seems at last that the embargo is to be repealed, and, in behalf of the suffering country which I in part represent, I give gentlemen my most sincere thanks for it. But I beg of them, having made up their minds to relieve us from one calamity, that they will not in the manner of doing it bring a still greater calamity upon us; that they will not, when we ask them for bread, give us a stone. The resolution, taken altogether, is no removal of the embargo. It is a continuance of the embargo in its worst shape, in its most distressing form; though I believe, if gentlemen who are disposed to relieve us from the embargo could see the substitute for it in the same light in which it appears to my mind, that there would be no difficulty in rejecting the latter part of the amendment, proposing the issuing of letters of marque and reprisal. In that case vessels may go out; but where will they go? You will in that case be at war with both France and Great Britain. Is there any one that believes that we can enjoy any commerce under such a state of things? Do you affect to tell us that we shall be restored to the navigation of the ocean, and at the same time create dangers which did not exist before, by adopting such measures as will utterly prevent the practical enjoyment of liberty? You tell a merchant to go out to sea, and there he will be captured. It is trifling with the impatience of the people, trifling with their interests; it is giving them nothing. It is strange, sir, that the Government of the United States, when there was little real danger in navigating the ocean, should have thought it necessary for the purpose of “keeping in safety our essential resources” to lay an embargo; and that when they have by their measures made a safe navigation so impracticable that scarcely one in twenty can escape the clutches of the enemy, they should say to the merchants “now you may go.” Depend upon it, sir, that you cannot deceive the people of the commercial States in this way. If you would comply with their requests, and obviate the further progress of the ruin which like a blast has spread over them, restore them their commerce. They will thank you. You will strengthen the bonds of union, which should never be relaxed. Let them be the bonds of a great and high-spirited people, and they will endure forever. But do not give them this boon, which, in the moment of giving it, you prevent them from enjoying. An act which shall say that the embargo shall be repealed by prohibiting commerce more effectually by another mode than the embargo could do, will not and ought not to satisfy the people. There is nothing in it. I protest to you, sir, that I feel no little affliction that, at a moment when I thought that there was a probability that the embargo was to be removed, the liberty of the seas should be wholly taken away by the proposed system, which will produce war with Great Britain. The only difference between the two systems is, that now you enforce the embargo, and if this resolution take effect, Great Britain will enforce it for you. The impossibility of carrying on a practical navigation will be precisely what it was before. I do not know, in point of expense, that it might not be better that Britain should keep on the embargo than that we should do it ourselves. If blood is to be spilt in keeping on the embargo, I had rather it should be British blood than American. Let us know what we have to depend on, sir. If you mean to repeal the embargo, do repeal it. But remember that if in doing it you do not restore us the use of the ocean, you do not repeal it for that purpose for which its repeal is necessary. Remember that, sir; and let your acts be such as shall spread harmony and happiness through the country. But the people are too wise to suppose that any sincere disposition exists to restore commerce, when you yourselves say that it shall be at an end in the same breath that you profess to restore its wonted activity.

I was in hopes, when the first resolution on this subject was proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, that some compassion was to be manifested to the people of the East, but that hope declined with that day's sun. The same system is still to be persevered in. Can gentlemen hope that they can restore the confidence of the people by this sort of conduct? Let the Government either enforce the embargo, or remove it. Let them either permit our citizens to go on the ocean, or let them say that they shall not go on it. Let not gentlemen suppose that the people of the East will take such a present as that proposed. They will, by-and-by, shrink from your presents, and will not touch them. We beg for nothing but to be dealt fairly with, to be told, in plain terms, what you will do. If you do that which is right, and go to work and restore the prosperity of the country, we will join with you heart and hand; but we are not to be brought into unanimity, because a course is pursued which all reflection tells us is visionary. I was pleased yesterday, sir, with the impassioned eloquence of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) as honest a man as God ever formed. He told us, if we removed the embargo, we must go to war. It is in vain for gentlemen to expect us to go to war, when we can see no object for war. We value too highly, for that, the prosperity of our people, their wives and children. We go amongst them and see their situation, they are a people fond of money, if you please; and when we find that a man can support life comfortably, we think there is really more honor in seeing the families in our cottages well fed and decently clothed, than in sending them out to fight, when no man can tell what it is for. It is not so spirited, sir, but there is much more happiness in it. When I have done my duty in keeping the people in a state of happiness, I can go home and place my head on my pillow with a safe conscience; but I should not, if I were to plunge this country into a war which, on the one hand, is unnecessary, and on the other, can produce no good. If we even have real ground for going to war with Great Britain and France, if, by going to war, we could only be worsted, I would smother my resentment a while, and do as boys at school often do, wait till I am big enough to fight. I would, at least, have the instinctive wisdom of children. I know not what to add on this subject. My mind is exceedingly distressed by the course which it strikes me is now contemplated. I wish to see gentlemen less theoretical and more practical; to see them abandon theory, and consider for a while the means of promoting the plain honest comforts of the people.

Mr. DANA said, he rose at this time, principally, to protest, in the name of the people of the State of Connecticut, against the supposition that it could be necessary for them, for a moment, to vindicate their character against any insinuation of the editor of a newspaper, printed at the seat of Government, however the editor might suppose it to be gratifying to those whom he wished to please. When gentlemen talk of New England, said Mr. D., and of Connecticut, as comprised in it, I would observe one thing; that the people of Connecticut have confided the management of their affairs here, to their Representatives in Congress; that they are not in the habit of petitioning this House. If they wish laws repealed, they do not address memorials to you on the subject; but if you believe, because they do not, that they approve of the laws, you are totally ignorant of the country. Whatever may be imagined about that State's being managed in a peculiar way, you know but very little about the people, if you imagine that they are not actuated by sentiments of liberty, if you imagine that the sentiment of liberty is not one of the most inextinguishable, or that their attachment to Republican principles is not of the strongest cast. Their love of liberty is characterized by a high and sacred regard to order. The liberty which they wish is a rational liberty, one in which wisdom and justice reign supreme, which secures to every man his right, and protects every man against aggression.

As to the idea of a rebellion in the northern portion of the Union, I say that no such thing exists. I have heard it spoken of as if there did. It is strange that gentlemen can hesitate one moment if they believe that rebellion exists. If it does, let not one day pass over before you array your battalions and order them forward. If you will not do this, you are bound not to consider any agitation as rebellion. If it be rebellion you do not do your duty if you do not suppress it. You are compelled to decide whether you will denominate it rebellion or dissatisfaction. If it be rebellion, crush it. If it be only an expression of dissatisfaction at your measures, respect it. Gentlemen speak very freely of that country; they cannot touch it too lightly, especially when they speak of the bayonet as applied to it. Sir, gentlemen must beware how they touch on this topic, especially when it is viewed as arraying one great portion of the Union against another, especially when you load with terms of opprobrium a large portion of the Union, when it is represented as being the hot-bed of faction, as the nursery of torism, as the residence of "British agents and persons corrupted with British gold." When gentlemen talk on this subject, let them recollect one thing. The inhabitants of that part of the country are not ignorant of their own strength; and no threat of vengeance will make them obey you for a moment. It is a moral force, and that only, which controls them. Of one thing, sir, gentlemen cannot be ignorant, neither are we. The physical strength of the different portions of the Union, is not according to the ratio of representation on the floor of this House. When, therefore, gentlemen talk of engaging the authority of the Government, let them appeal to sentiments more worthy, more honorable; and when we talk of our acts, let us recollect that a power superior to ourselves has set limits to our authority, and said, "thus far shall you go, and no further." [Mr. EPPES asked to whom the gentleman particularly referred in the observations which he made.] Mr. DANA said, he did recollect particularly, but he was remarking on the general current of observations, which had been made in the House for two or three months past. He could only say, that though he felt the observations at the time, he had not particularly noted by whom they were made, and they had left only a general impression. And there is one other thing, said he, which I have felt very strongly—the habit or example of denouncing, of covering with terms of opprobrium a portion of the people of the United States, who may not approve all the measures of the Government. I have felt these things because they are grossly misconstrued as an encouragement to that ferocious yell of denunciation, to that savage war whoop of vengeance which is excited out of this House in certain portions of the Union. It is of the utmost moment that that spirit should be repressed in various parts of the country. If in the moment of peril instead of arraying on this floor the petty passions of party, we were to combine to suppress it, we should more consult the interests of our country.

A committee appointed to consider our foreign relations, has presented us three alternatives—submission, embargo, or war with Great Britain and France. They conceive it to be necessary to take one of these. For myself, sir, I declare that I do not wish to take either. As to war with Great Britain and France, I should wish to delay that till I could understand how it was to be made. As to this going to war with two nations at war with each other, I should like first to make some inquiry on the subject. I wish to know if any gentleman of military talents has drawn up any system of fighting three armies together. One against two on the same side, is no new thing, sir; but three against each other is a perfect novelty. I really do not know they could draw up their troops in order of battle, supposing three armies to meet. They could not be drawn up in parallel lines, for each army must be opposed to two others. It is a sort of prismatic or triangular thing; for I cannot take three lines and form a square of them, or any other regular body. How would they form a line of reserve? The only way that I could think of arranging an army on this principle, was to draw up the three armies in a triangular form, the angles at 120 degrees, the whole making 360 degrees, or a whole circle; but in this case you must keep them there, not let them move, or you destroy the principle. This is a new thing which I wish to have explained. It is not the old-fashioned way of fighting at all, nor was it ever known in ancient or modern war. When we go to sea, how will the system stand? Three frigates, British, French, and American, all at war with each other, meet. Now if any two of them were on the same side I could understand it; but I cannot understand this. I have read an account of an English ship-of-the-line going out and running between two enemies' ships-of-the-line in the night, and a heavy fire commencing on each side, backing with considerable address, and leaving them to fire on each other. But really, sir, I cannot imagine how ships of three belligerents are to go to work. They cannot lay along side, forward, or aft; and yet I do not mean to deny that this thing cannot be done. For myself I have no suspicion that any man who has nautical skill enough to command a frigate, or any man who can give the order of battle for a brigade, could think of engaging at the same time with two enemies. If on this principle you go to war, therefore, you must trust the command to persons totally unworthy of command.

Mr. EPPES.—I am glad that the gentleman from Connecticut has exhausted in debate the feelings with which he commenced; that he has concluded his remarks in perfect good humor I have no doubt. His dissertation on triangles, although ingenious enough, does not appear to me entirely new. The gentleman might add much to his stock of information on the uses of the triangle by perusing a luminous pamphlet recently printed on this subject, called the "Trial of Alexander Whistelo." It is a book containing much curious learning, and I am certain the gentleman from Connecticut will receive amusement and instruction from its perusal. I regret extremely some of the observations which have fallen from the gentleman, and am happy that he did not intend to apply any part of them to me. I disclaim having ever reflected on the people of any part of the United States. When, on a former day, in debate, I declared that the tory principle had assumed in this country an official form, I referred to a sentiment which I read from the Essex resolutions, containing what I at that time considered, and still consider, a tory principle.

We are told that we are now about to abandon the embargo and make a new experiment. What is the new experiment? Letters of marque and reprisal. The trial of force after every other remedy has failed is not a new experiment. It always has been, and ever will be the last resort in contests between nations. When every other mode of adjusting a difference has failed there is nothing left but to give up the contest or fight. Sir, from the period at which the United States, under the auspices of the Federal Government assumed its rank among the independent nations of the earth, we have been the object of suspicion and jealousy to the present great belligerent nations of Europe. Attached to peace, and anxious to preserve it, all our efforts have been directed to this object. Our habits are not warlike. The glory of conquest and the splendor of conquerors, are spectacles unknown to this happy country. The sympathy excited in this country towards France by the American Revolution, first roused the jealousy of Great Britain. To this jealous feeling we may attribute many of the wrongs inflicted on us by Great Britain from the year 1783 to the year 1795, when our differences were adjusted by treaty. The conclusion of this treaty roused the jealousy of France. The sympathy produced by the American Revolution had been weakened by time, and was totally lost during the sanguinary period of the French Revolution. From the conclusion of the treaty with Great Britain our peace with France was in danger. Various acts of injustice and violence, on the part of that Government, brought us almost into a state of actual war. Our differences were adjusted by treaty; but the suspicion and jealousy of both these Powers remain. To that unfounded suspicion and jealousy we owe many of our present difficulties. The demon of jealousy alone could induce either of these Powers to believe that this nation is disposed to attach its destinies either to France or Great Britain. Nothing will satisfy Great Britain but involving us in her contest with France; nothing will satisfy France but involving us in her contest with Great Britain. Everything short of this is represented by each as partiality towards her enemy. Each Power, on the pretext of our being partial to the other, has offered us injuries, to which we must either oppose effectual resistance, or surrender our independence. Shall we fold our arms and sit down content under all the wrongs that we have received, or shall we try our strength? It is no longer a political delusion.

We are about to remove the embargo. This precautionary measure is to be abandoned; our vessels are no longer to be chained to the docks; they are to be employed on the ocean, and American seamen will find active employment in avenging the wrongs and vindicating the rights of their country. In this important object I had hoped we should all unite. It seems, however, that this new experiment of fighting is considered rather worse than the embargo. I have been astonished to hear gentlemen get up and speak on the old worn-out subject of the embargo. They tell us that the people must find their way to the ocean. Can they go on it without arms? Take letters of marque—fight your way? No, this is war; it will prevent their going on the ocean at all. It will wholly destroy commerce. Nothing but resistance to Great Britain and France, effectual resistance, can ever restore commerce. It is gone, and with it agriculture, if these decrees and orders are not opposed by all the energies of the nation.

What is our present situation? It is not my intention to occupy the time of the House in reading documents; from these documents I consider as established, beyond a possibility of denial, the following positions:

1. That Great Britain has violated our territory, murdered our citizens, committed enormous depredations on our commerce, impressed our seamen, excluded from market seventy millions of dollars of our exports, and subjected to tribute, to the following amount, the great staples of our country, viz: tobacco, three dollars per 100 lbs.; cotton, sixteen cents per pound; corn, sixteen cents per bushel; flour, two dollars per barrel; fish, ninety cents per 100 lbs.; pork, six dollars and eighty-six cents per barrel; beef, three dollars and thirty-three cents per barrel.

2. That France has violated her treaty, committed enormous depredations on our commerce, burnt our vessels on the high seas, subjected them to capture for causes over which we have no control, and subjected to capture our commerce with Britain, its islands and dependencies, amounting to thirty-three millions of dollars.

3. That both these Powers have attempted to mark out the course which the United States ought to pursue towards its enemy; and, under the pretext of retaliating on us for supposed submission, have carried their injustice and violence so far as to leave to the United States no commerce which can be pursued with safety or honor.

4. That negotiation has been tried with both these Powers in every possible form, and has failed.

Will any gentleman come forward and deny any one of these positions? He cannot. Documents on the table demonstrate their truth. These injuries cannot be submitted to. They must be resisted. The last appeal to the justice of these nations has been made. Whenever the embargo is removed we must fight. Whether we fight on the triangle, the square, or the form called rough roll and tumble, I care not. Fight we must, unless we are destitute of principle and of courage.

H. OF R.

I would not submit without a struggle to the unjust pretensions of either of these Powers. The causes which produced the American Revolution were trifling compared with the present monstrous pretensions of the belligerents.

Will the people, who spurned a paltry tax on tea, when united under the same Government with Great Britain, submit to a tax on the most valuable staples of their country, and hold the right to carry them to market at the will of a foreign Power? It is impossible; our ancestors gave up a country affording everything to gratify avarice and pride. They placed themselves under the goddess of liberty, in a forest filled with howling savages, and destitute of the comforts of life. Shall we, the descendants of that people, shrink from maintaining our independence? Shall we, to avoid the evil of war, take the greatest of all evils, a base submission to foreign Powers?

We are told that the alien and sedition laws, which called forth all the energies of Virginia, were mere sauce compared with the embargo. They were bitter pills, never to be swallowed; they were clear, open, and manifest violations of the Constitution, and the reasoning of the committee of the Virginia Legislature against these laws remains unanswered to this day. Whenever the people of Massachusetts, or any other State, shall come forward and show me that a law is unconstitutional, and in the same firm and Constitutional form, and that I have violated their rights, I am willing to retrace my steps. But when they tell me that they cannot live but by a base submission to a foreign Power, I will say to them "starve." Whenever the people of this country cannot live without crouching to a foreign Power, let them starve. I cannot consent to surrender, as a dessert, or for a whole dinner, the rights of this country.

We are told we cannot maintain our rights; that we must grow before we fight. We cannot grow under base submission to foreign despotism. Look at the history of the world, and see whether any nation has grown up under oppression. It is tyranny which produces ill-formed and rickety children, and not an adherence to the rights of men. But the gentleman from New York has told us that this attempt to assert the rights of the nation by war, is worse than insult! I have shown you, sir, that the people are excluded from the ocean by the decrees of Great Britain and France, and if we raise the embargo, war must be the consequence. Why, sir, if we take off from the list of places to which we usually trade, those places affected by the decrees and orders, we have, as has been repeatedly shown, but a commerce of seven millions and a half. Will you take this? If you do and prohibit intercourse with the places affected by the decrees, it is submission.

Take the second project which has been offered, viz: to arm our merchant vessels, and allow them to trade. If our differences were with France alone, this would be an effectual and honorable provision. We could force a trade against France. Our situation would permit it. But will any gentleman say that we can carry tobacco, or rice, or cotton, or fish, to market on the Continent of Europe, and protect it with cannon against Great Britain? No, sir; arming the merchant vessels will give only a commerce with Great Britain. It is consigning to individuals the destinies of the nation. Issuing letters of marque and reprisal is a fair, manly, and open resistance on the part of the nation. It will afford to our citizens a chance to get back some of the property of which they have been plundered. It will give neither Power a monopoly of our commerce. We can assail both belligerents and fight them both at triangles, squares, or oblongs, or in every possible form in which we can meet with them. If our arms can be employed with effect on water, our vessels must not be encumbered with cargoes. Letters of marque and reprisal will be effectual resistance to both these Powers—arming our merchant vessels is not resistance in the present state of the world. It can be followed only with disgrace to the nation and ruin to the individual. It will give to Great Britain the exclusive monopoly of our commerce and destroy the value of all the great staples of our country. Having already stated to the House once to-day the reasons why I think that the embargo should not be continued beyond the first day of June, I shall trespass no longer on your attention.

WEDNESDAY, February 1.

On motion of Mr. BURWELL, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be instructed to furnish the Librarian of Congress with two complete sets of all documents laid before Congress at each session:

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the fifteenth of December last, a letter and representation of Thomas Paine, presented to this House on the fourth of February, one thousand eight hundred and eight, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PREPARATION FOR WAR.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on Mr. NICHOLAS and Mr. BACON's resolutions—the proposition for filling the blank with the first day of June being still under consideration.

Mr. BACON said, that perhaps the almost interminable debates to which this subject of embargo in whatever shape it was presented to us always gives rise, might justly be esteemed not the least amongst those many inconveniences which were imputed to it. Sure he was, that it was by no means an evil so entirely imaginary as were many of those which both in and out of this House had been laid to its charge. It had cost us a most vehement and impassioned debate to get into it; had been the theme of an almost perpetual debate during its continuance, and it now seemed that we could get out of it only by the same course. For himself he should have been willing to have met the present question by a silent vote, if a similar disposition had been generally evinced on either side of the House.

H. OF R.

Preparation for War.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

From present appearances, said Mr. B., I am sorry to be obliged to realize, that in my vote on both parts of the resolution under consideration, I shall probably be compelled to differ with many, though I trust not a majority of those with whom it has usually been my pleasure and my pride to unite on most questions of a public nature. In the observations which have fallen from some of those gentlemen, there has appeared to me to have been intermingled at least some indirect thrusts at those of us who on this question might be thought disposed to differ with them in opinion, in relation to the propositions now pending before us. This is a state of things which it was perhaps very natural to expect, and we may probably as well now as ever give a free vent to those transient feelings which it is calculated to excite, and settle the account at the outset.

On this head it was intimated yesterday by a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) that the popular clamors which were at present so loud in some quarters of our country might perhaps deter some gentlemen from adhering to that course of policy to which they might otherwise assent; cautioning them at the same time that they might be hurled from their seats by the people, if through a defect of the nerves they should shrink from a rigid performance of that duty which the crisis called upon them to perform. Mr. Chairman, with respect to political nerves, we have probably, most of us, as good an opinion of the strength of our own as they deserve; but to judge of this particular working upon the system of others, is at once a difficult and delicate undertaking. So much does the nervous system vary, according to the different habits and constitution of politicians, that it is impossible precisely to ascertain its operation, or the different results to which it sometimes conducts us. With some, it undoubtedly operates to create a sort of instinctive horror at the prospect of popular disapprobation, and a peculiar sensibility to popular clamor. With others, its tendency is to foster a confirmed repugnance against differing, in any essential point, from those enlightened few whose opinions we have been habituated to reverence, and whose general principles we have been accustomed to respect. Its influence upon our public conduct should, unquestionably, in both respects, be sedulously guarded against. For if, in one case, it degrades the legislator into the variable and unstable demagogue, in the other, it sinks him into the levee politician, or the accommodating courtier. For one I can truly declare, that I know of no public situation in which the firmness of the nerves can be so severely tested, as that in which we are forced to differ from the opinions of those in whom we are accustomed to confide as politicians, and sincerely to respect as men. My present situation enables me to speak with a most feeling sense of the truth of this remark. But, as on the one hand, I feel it my duty not to be driven, or, as the expression has been, not to be kicked into any course which I cannot approve, by the rudeness of my political adversaries, so, on the other, would I be careful not to be seduced into it by any overweening deference to the opinions of my friends, however respectable in their private characters, or exalted in their public standing.

With respect to the present question, Mr. B. said, he was compelled, from the best consideration which he could bestow upon it, to differ from the very respectable mover of the resolution on both parts of his proposition; on the first, as to the time at which he proposed to give it effect, and on the second, as to the extent of the measure itself. The proposition now was, to fill the blank with the first day of June. So far as this applies to the repeal of the embargo, what beneficial ends can be answered by deferring it to so late a period? There were certainly many positive benefits to be calculated upon from its early repeal; amongst these, was the consideration that it would more effectually quiet those public jealousies and discontents which had been so assiduously excited and promoted in some parts of the Union. Most of these, to be sure, he well knew to be unreasonable and unfounded; many of them, he had no doubt, were wicked and perverse. Still, if by any measure, not otherwise exceptionable, they could be effectually allayed, it was certainly not an undesirable object. It surely could not be sound policy, by adhering to this system beyond the measure of absolute necessity, to risk in the hands of any faction which might be disposed to wield it, an instrument by which they may endanger the Union of our country, and raise themselves to power on the ruins of liberty and the Constitution. There were many other advantages, in a commercial view, which we should derive from a speedy repeal, and which would be very much lost by deferring it to so distant a period; these had been urged by others, and he would not enlarge upon them.

What, then, are the advantages expected to be derived from a protraction of this measure four months longer? As to any coercive operation which it may have upon foreign nations, when the utmost period of its continuance is once declared by law, no gentleman expects anything of that sort from it—from the moment that a limitation is fixed, its coercive force is allowed to be gone. It is only, then, as a measure calculated for the preservation of peace with foreign Powers, that the protraction of its repeal for so long a period can be thought desirable. That this is an object of the highest moment, and for the attainment of which we should cheerfully submit to very great sacrifices, cannot be denied; it is for this, and this alone, that we have so long consented to them; but, as we may sometimes even buy gold too dear, so the chance of an honorable peace, and, under the present aspects, it is at best but a chance, may be purchased too high. It will be too high if it even expose to hazard and interruption the continuance of our internal union and our national tranquillity. Sir, when I speak of an interruption of tranquillity, I beg not to be understood as being intimidated myself, or impressing others with any apprehensions of domestic insurrection, or, as it has been denominated sometimes on this floor, rebellion against your laws in any part of this nation.

Though no such idea can be entertained by those of us who are well acquainted with the people of New England, yet in justice to those gentlemen from other quarters, who have in their remarks here alluded to such a state of things, I must say that the outrageous and intemperate language which is daily held forth in most of the principal papers of a certain character in that section of the country, and the direct and open justification of forcible resistance to our laws, which they frequently inculcate, have an inevitable tendency to create in the minds of the public here, a belief that New England is vast verging to such a lamentable and disgraceful state. Sir, I have said heretofore, and shall continue to say, that all such suggestions, from whatever quarter they may come, are a libel upon the good people of New England; and however much disposed the conductors or patrons of these prostituted papers may be to plunge their fellow-citizens into acts of insubordination and open resistance to the laws of the nation, they will never succeed. The known and established character of that people is a sure pledge of their incapacity to be driven into any such desperate attempts by the arts of a few ambitious and insatuated partisans, and for the subserviency only of their selfish purposes. It is not therefore from the fear of having to meet any such state of things that I should be desirous of shaping any public measure. But there may perhaps arise a state of public feeling, through the influence of prejudice and delusions, which, though very far from either open resistance or insurrection against law, may yet be very different from that state of public tranquillity and national union which at a period of threatened hostility from foreign Powers, it is extremely desirable to cherish and preserve, when it can be done without the sacrifice of any material object on the part of the nation; and as no material object can in my view be calculated upon by a continuation of the embargo to the first day of June, which we shall not be at least as likely to attain by placing it at an earlier day, I cannot but allow some weight to the consideration which I have alluded to. If by means of the embargo we are to obtain our object with foreign Powers, of which we are not without hope, it has probably before this time had its effect, and if not, no effect can be hoped from it after its limitation shall be known, whether the period of its repeal be fixed either one month or three months distant.

So much, sir, as to the day with which it is proposed to fill the blanks, so far as it applies to that part of the resolution touching the repeal of the embargo laws. As it affects that part of it which goes to authorize general reprisals against either or both of the aggressing nations, I would remark, that even were I satisfied with the character of the measure proposed, in the present peculiar state of our affairs, I could by no means consent to this mode of taking it. In every point of view, the policy of declaring offensive war against any nation four months in advance, is to me wholly objectionable. In the first place, it is taking upon ourselves to judge of the fitness of a measure at a future time, which our successors in the next Congress can, when the time arrives, determine the expediency of, under all the circumstances which may then present themselves to them, much better than we can; and it ought to be remembered, that if the contest is then entered upon, it is our successors, and not we, who have got to carry the country through the struggle.

It is further objectionable, as its effect must be to throw the advantage of the game out of our hands and into those of our adversary; and after being formally notified, that we are determined to strike on the first of June, and not before, they must be poor calculators indeed, if they do not take advantage of us and strike first. Such a step is also eminently calculated to defeat the very object which is usually and principally intended by the measure of reprisals; which object is, as I have ever understood, to enable the citizens of an injured country to indemnify themselves for the losses which they may have sustained through the aggressions of the injuring country, or those of its subjects, out of the property and effects of the latter wherever found. It ought, therefore, from its very nature and objects, to be an operation of the moment. The blow should be struck at once, while the effects of the adversary are within our reach; but by giving public notice of our intention so long before hand, can anything else be expected than that the latter will either withdraw his property, or so protect and secure it, that the great object of our reprisals will be in a great measure defeated? Surely not.

But, in addition to these objections, as to the time proposed for the execution of this measure, I am by no means convinced that the measure itself is the next best which can be presented to us, by which to resist the aggressions of our adversaries, upon removing the embargo. It has very often been urged upon us, that the idea of a war on our part with two nations, each of whom was at the same time at war with the other, was utterly absurd and impracticable, and could not be seriously thought of; that the difficulties of such a state of things were great and serious, as it related to a direct offensive war, could not be doubted, though no one could say that the situation of a nation might not be such as to render it her duty to meet and risk it, at every hazard. At any rate, the objection to it could only be considered as having any force when applied to an offensive state of hostilities. As to defensive resistance, or a war of defence merely, it could surely be no objection to it, that it would have to be exercised against two or more nations, who might be aggressing upon either our territorial or maritime rights. These it would be our duty at all hazards to defend, as well as they could, should they be assailed by all the nations of Christendom. If all the warring tribes of savages beyond the Mississippi should at once invade our territory, in different directions, we must meet them; and whether we fought by any rules of either ancient or modern warfare or not, repel them by our utmost means. Our maritime rights might not be capable of the same effectual defence, but, if attacked, we must resist and defend them, in some shape or other, be the assailants as numerous as they might. Such is, in some measure, the peculiarity of our present situation, and it furnished a weighty consideration why we should avoid waging an offensive war as long as possible, seeing that we could not well select our single adversary, with honor to ourselves, or without seeming to do it by compulsion of the other. But this furnished no reason why we should not resist, defensively, the aggressions of both, in the manner proposed in the resolution which I had the honor a few days since to lay on the table, and which is now regularly before this Committee. It is in fact for the reasons before suggested, that I should prefer this as the first step to hostilities, and the next best mode of interposing our resistance to our enemies. Another reason is, that it affords us another and a much more probable chance of escaping an open and general war, the calamities of which have been so feelingly described; the horrors of which, at this extraordinary period, no tongue perhaps can describe, and the end of which no man can, with any precision, calculate. If we at once issue general reprisals, (which is only another name for direct war,) the die is from this moment cast, the last hope of peace is fled, and we have nothing to do but to make the best of the contest we can. On the other hand, if we take the intermediate step—authorize defensive resistance and special reprisals, only when first assailed—we do not thereby put both the belligerent Powers up to their mettle, and place them on that point of pride from which they may fancy they cannot, consistent with their honor, recede. Such will not be the situation in which a measure of mere defensive hostilities will place the relations between us. So far from it, that, if we are at liberty to entertain any hope of a returning sense of justice from either of them, it may, I flatter myself, be calculated upon from a course of this sort. From which of them it should first be expected, it is impossible to undertake to calculate. In relation to what may be expected from one of them, no one can perhaps conjecture. But I will say, that if those who govern the Councils of Great Britain are not yet utterly overcome with a spirit of madness and infatuation, they must recede from the execution of the system which they have levelled against us, when they see that after so long a forbearance we are at length determined to risk open collisions, if they see fit to force them upon us any further. Should they then recede, there can be little doubt that France will do the same in a very short period. But, if she shall not, I think that I may safely pledge myself (for all those at least with whom I have usually acted) that they will unite as one in avenging, in the best practicable mode, those outrages upon the national honor, interest, and independence, which we have unanimously declared are not to be submitted to from any Power on earth; and which (whatever may be pretended by Great Britain) this Government has always been ready and anxious to vindicate our country against, could we have been suffered to do it with honor to ourselves, and without a seeming compulsion at least on her part towards us. The fact is, that as it respects both those Powers, their conduct has on both sides, hitherto been so utterly wanton, capricious, and thwarting towards us, that they have contrived (in the expressive language of our Minister at the Court of Great Britain) to embarrass, perplex, and confound all those measures of resistance to the aggressions of either, which they have been continually requiring us to take against each other. We choose not to take measures any more than "to give reasons upon compulsion," and we will not so take them. We will, however, I trust, defend ourselves against the depredations of both; and if they both, or either, choose to persevere in the execution of their lawless aggressions, we shall, it is hoped, become more united in our determination and our efforts to vindicate our rights, if they shall continue to be assailed.

At any rate, I am for leaving it to the wisdom of the ensuing Congress, which is to meet at an early day, to determine upon that position which the nation shall take in relation to such a state of things as may grow out of the course which I propose. They may very probably choose to enter a step further into the contest, should no accommodation of our difficulties be effected before they shall assemble. As one of that body, I shall not, at present, any further pledge myself to what extent I would then go for the protection of commercial rights, and for the interests of commercial men. After the sample which they have too generally afforded of their principles, and the treatment which this Government have received for the difficulties in which they have involved themselves, at their request, and in the vindication of those interests which these men claim as peculiarly their own, it is to be hoped every future Administration will very cautiously commit the fortunes of the country at their instigation. Like most of the members on this floor, I represent only an agricultural population. That people, though having no peculiar interest in the pursuit of foreign commerce, have been willing, hitherto, to contribute their most effectual aid in assisting their commercial brethren in maintaining their peculiar rights. But, after what has so lately passed on the part of these gentlemen, I should hardly advise my constituents that it was their duty not only to insist upon fighting all the world for the assertion of commercial rights, but even to fight the merchants themselves, as it seems they must, in order to make them also fight for their own interests. In the management and regulation of the concerns of these people, there really appears to be something which renders it at least unsafe for a legislator to pledge himself to anything specific in their behalf. In regard to the noble animal who traverses the land or roams in the forest, there is something steady upon which we may with some safety calculate; but with respect to the wayward motions and tortuous windings of the slimy and slippery eel, who squirms in the ocean, it is impossible to calculate where or how we may best lay hold of him, or the most effectually regulate his course. On all these points, without pledging ourselves any further, I am disposed to leave it to the wisdom of our successors to put the nation in such an attitude as the circumstances then presenting shall render it most expedient.

Mr. TROUP said, he wished to postpone the consideration of this subject, for, the more he reflected the more strongly was he confirmed in the opinion that, if the resolutions were adopted in any shape, they could only operate as an empty menace on foreign nations. It would not be a binding declaration on the next Congress, and could only be considered, in relation to foreign nations, as a dishonorable concession. Under what circumstances, said he, were these resolutions brought into the House? The House has solemnly resolved not to submit: has resolved to place the country in a posture of defence; has resolved on a further execution of the embargo laws; it has passed a bill for an extra session of Congress in June; and yet, having done all these acts, the course of measures is suddenly changed, and under what circumstances? Why, sir, at a moment when we are threatened with internal commotion, after gentlemen on the opposite side of the House have told you that you would not go into a war, however seriously you threatened it; after you have been told that your resolutions were nothing but paper resolutions; after gentlemen have told you that your embargo laws could not and would not be executed; we hear of insurrections in the Eastern section of the Union; we hear of what is called Constitutional opposition to the laws, of Constitutional and unconstitutional bodies for the express purpose of declaring the unconstitutionality of the laws and encouraging violent resistance and opposition to them; and yet, sir, you determine to repeal your embargo. It is not, therefore, at the foreign hostility with which we are menaced, nor yet the disturbance of domestic tranquillity with which we are threatened, that I feel the least uneasiness. I am only seriously concerned for fear that this yielding, this concession (if it be only conjectured to be a concession) to a domestic faction of any description, will end in the destruction of our Constitution and the ruin of your Government. It will be evident and incontestable, and it must grieve any man to think of it who values the liberties of his country, that your Constitution is not strong enough to stand the rude shock of faction. Gentlemen will not give themselves time to think seriously, sir. They will not divest themselves of local feeling as they ought to do. I am ready to acknowledge that this Government has been heretofore wisely administered; it has exclusively governed by the mild virtues—prudence, moderation, clemency, forbearance, and economy. These are the principles which have heretofore characterized your Administration; but, as your condition changes, will not the principles of your Government change also? When you are threatened with foreign and domestic war, does it not become you to put away your peace principles and put on the habiliments of war? In such case, will not firmness and decision of action and liberality in the expenditure of public money characterize your conduct. Certainly. If you are threatened with war, at home and abroad, the best mode of avoiding both is a vigorous repression of opposition at home, and a direct resistance of hostility from abroad. If gentlemen consider this Government in the nature of it to be a weak Government, they are mistaken. It is the strongest Government on earth both for peace or for war. The great fundamental principle on which all political institutions are built is that of obedience to law: it is the fundamental principle of your Government that the will of the majority shall govern; and that this will, when expressed, shall be executed, even at the expense of all the minority who stand up in opposition to the law, is as fundamental a principle as any. And, if the Executive fail in the execution of the law, he fails in his duty to his country. He never will fail, I am sure, and the execution of the law, I will leave to him. If he wants the ways and means give it to him; but be it your province to make the law and his to execute it. And if rebellion actually existed, it would not be for you to look to it. It ought to have no effect on your deliberations any further than you are concerned in granting ways and means for the energetic execution of the laws. I speak with deference on this subject, sir, when I recommend any specific course to be adopted in preference to any other mode; but it appears to me to adhere to the course heretofore marked out by yourselves—to go on in the course of right and justice and policy, without turning to the right or left to inquire who approves or disapproves. It is not possible that you can consent to exchange your course for the purpose of avoiding the clamor of a party. It would be the height of extravagance and folly in us to proceed in such a manner as to forfeit the esteem of a large portion of the people to oblige a minority. If nine-tenths of the people are ready to enforce a measure, you will not abandon it because one-tenth threaten to rebel against it. And what better pledge could you give of your determination to raise the embargo on the first of June than the act for an extra session, accompanied with the declarations which were made on its passage? These are the reasons—and, sir, I am sorry to make such desultory observations on so important a subject—why I would determine to continue in the old course till June, to make preparations for war in the meantime, and in June to declare that war under all the circumstances of the times.

Mr. BURWELL said, as he intended to vote to fill the blank in the resolution with the first of June, he thought it proper to make some remarks on the policy which would govern his vote, and the effects which he conceived it would produce. With respect to the embargo laws, said Mr. B., I always have understood that they were to cease in the Spring or early in the Summer. From that fact having been understood, the observation of my friend from Georgia, that we are compelled, by the state of things in the Eastern country, to take off the embargo, does not apply. The course now proposed would be pursued if those circumstances had not produced anxiety. I perfectly agree with the gentleman from Georgia that it would be improper for this House to give up a wise and just measure, because an opposition to it exists in any particular portion of the country. But, sir, the embargo will certainly produce no effect as a coercive measure as soon as it is understood that the opposition to it has become so serious as to endanger the public tranquillity. Where we enter into a contest with the Governments of Europe, which consists in patience and forbearance, it is not to be expected, when they find that a change of things is probable, that they will not persevere. They will hold out when they conceive that the measures of the Government will be changed. Nothing is, to my mind, more clear than that this will be the effect produced on foreign Governments, and that its coercive effect can only be calculated on while we have union in its support. It is a fact, owing to certain things, which have taken place in a part of the United States, that its beneficial effects have, in a great measure, been destroyed by evasions which have heretofore taken place, and which will again take place, where the people are disposed to connive at violations of the law. The effect of the measure must be destroyed, unless the Government take measures to enforce it. If the House give a pledge that it shall expire at a certain time, I feel satisfied that every man will sit down quietly and encourage the execution of the law. As to violations of the law, produced from actual suffering or pressure, I cannot bring my mind to a belief of it. I believe that the uneasiness in the Eastern country proceeds entirely from an idea that the embargo originated in an intention to destroy commerce, and to favor one foreign nation in preference to another; and that, if they had not their feelings excited by this perversion of fact, they would bear the measure as well as other citizens. This has produced this restlessness; and when a course is pursued which will do away the anxiety on this subject, I believe they will bear the measure with patience. As I am decidedly of opinion that, when the embargo ceases, if the causes which produced it do not cease, this nation must go to war, not in defence of petty commercial rights, but of rights which involve the sovereignty of the nation, I am disposed to put off the period at which it shall commence, that we may have another opportunity to appeal to the interests (not to the justice) of the belligerents, which, in my opinion, will produce a beneficial effect. What will be the effect of passing the latter part of the resolution offered by my colleague? Why, that if the orders and decrees be not withdrawn before a certain day, letters of marque and reprisal will be issued against both belligerents, or against the one which perseveres. How will this affect our disputes abroad? If France recedes from her decrees, and Great Britain rescinds her orders, of course, we shall then be at peace with both. Suppose France were to refuse, and Great Britain were to think proper to withdraw her Orders in Council, what would then be the state of things? You stand involved in a war with France, because you have pledged yourself, and you are the only branch of the Government who can make such a pledge. Mr. Canning, in his letter of the 23d of September, seems to have founded an objection to a proposition made by Mr. Pinkney, because he did not make it directly and officially from his Government, but as an expression of his opinion, that it would be agreed to by his Government. I repeat, then, that if this House will take the ground proposed, the assurance is strong that they will withdraw their Orders in Council; they certainly will, if they choose to see the United States involved in the prosecution of the war against France. I submit it to gentlemen whether it be not of sufficient importance that we should bear this embargo till the first of June, to leave to the Government power to make that sort of offer, and present that result to the European belligerents. Our Administration has heretofore had no power to make such a pledge; but if the measures of Congress would authorize the President to make such an offer of alternatives, I think it would produce an adjustment.

But it is objected to as pledging the next Congress, as passing a law now to govern them when they meet. If anything should happen between now and the next meeting of Congress, would it not be perfectly competent to them to repeal the law in whole or in part? Nothing can be more clear or evident than that you will not embarrass the succeeding Congress or mark out for them a course which they will be compelled to pursue. I should be the last man in this House who would intimate anything like a new proposition to either of the belligerents, were it not for the last letter of Mr. Canning, in which he expresses a hope to Mr. Pinkney, that they shall still be able to settle the differences between the two nations on amicable terms. When they express a desire of that kind, I should always be ready to meet them. Whether the desire be sincere or not, it is not for me to say; but I am disposed to accommodate them with an opportunity of proving their sincerity. It would unite us; and this state of things, in my opinion, aided by the events taking place in Europe, will induce them to accommodate with us. Everybody knows how the hopes of the British Government and people were elated by the events taking place in Spain. In proportion as their hopes from that quarter diminish, they will feel more disposed to enjoy that commerce which they have lost by their own imprudence and illiberality. It is objected that, by this course, you will apprise the belligerents of the time when you will commence hostilities, and, by that means, will enable them to benefit of your intended measures of hostility. But, sir, it is well known that it was expressly understood that Congress is to meet here in May; and that whenever the measure of embargo is removed, some stand will be taken to avenge the injuries of this country. I will ask, if the act for an extra session is not evidence sufficiently strong of this determination? But, how could you surprise them, sir? They have no property in this country, for they have already withdrawn it. Their merchantmen are generally armed, and commence operations when you may, you will find no material change in the preparations of the belligerents.

The proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts for arming our merchant vessels, and permitting them to wage a defensive warfare, appears to me to be the most unfortunate of all courses, if you mean seriously to defend your maritime rights. If you permit your merchant vessels to arm, they will all go out incapable of resistance; and even if they are bound to some neutral port, if any occurrence shall take place which shall compel you to involve yourself in war, the whole of your property abroad is within the reach of the British navy, and she might take a step to secure the whole floating property of the United States. That war will be the consequence, I cannot doubt, and you will commence it under every disadvantage. After your property is taken, you will fight in vain for its recovery. I think that we should either defend these rights, or give them up. If we maintain them, let us rely upon our own resources, and upon our own exertions. This will completely defeat one motive for laying the embargo, which has so far secured our property and rendered us invulnerable to the attacks of the enemy.

A gentleman from New York, (Mr. GARDNER,) who spoke on the subject yesterday, observed that you were about to take a course to deceive the people; that you were about but to continue the embargo under a different name. Now I am much mistaken, sir, if that be a fair inference from the state of things which would exist even in case of a war with Great Britain. Is it not known by every gentleman that we had a commerce even during the Revolutionary war? To be sure it was not as extensive or as lucrative as in a state of peace. But can any gentleman believe now, when our enterprise is at least as great and our opportunity greater, that our merchants could not carry on commerce better than they could then? Certainly. Notwithstanding all the exertions of Great Britain in guarding your coast you may carry on commerce. But what does that argument amount to? Does the gentleman from New York wish, because a particular portion of the country could carry on a lucrative commerce, notwithstanding the Orders in Council, by selling their product in the British markets, that the whole interest of every other section of the Union should be given up? Are the great interests of the country to be completely given up, because one class of people would receive relief from it? Of what consequence is it to us to cultivate the soil, if we are restricted to a particular market, which, it has been shown, does not consume one-seventh of our product?

Is this the policy which gentlemen think we ought to pursue? As for legislating for a particular section of the Union, the doctrine is so novel, so inconsistent with the very object of Government, that I am astonished that any gentleman on this floor should advance opinions of this sort. If we are to yield to these Orders in Council, to permit the external commerce of the United States to be taxed by Great Britain, let us go the whole length. It is not to be expected that those regulations which now exist to favor the carrying trade of a particular class of the people can be persevered in, if we are obliged by them to submit to taxation. If we are forced to submit, at least let us have our produce carried to market as cheap as we can, and not in addition to foreign taxes pay a tax at home, by way of bounty to the shipping of the Eastern States.

It has been asked by some gentlemen, what are you going to war for? A gentleman from Connecticut asks if you are going to war for the principle that free ships make free goods? Is that a candid question, sir? The United States have given up that principle as far back as Jay's Treaty. It was abandoned in the correspondence of the Secretary of State with Genet in 1794. How then can the gentleman justify it to himself in holding out to the nation that we are going to war for a principle formally abdicated? I put it to the gentleman, whether the cause of quarrel between us should be made to rest on a principle not at all in contest? Another gentleman from Connecticut says he will go as far as any gentleman in defending the honor of his country. I have no doubt of it, sir; for the gentleman by an honorable service in the Revolutionary war has already proved it. No doubt, if the gentleman from Connecticut could, like myself, believe that the independence of the nation is prostrated if we submit to these edicts, he would be as little disposed to submit to them as I am. But, sir, when he placed the question on commercial ground altogether, and left it to the calculation of the merchant whether he would pay taxes or not, I am not surprised that we differ. It is no new thing to differ about the seat of honor. But I cannot bring myself to believe that the affairs of this nation are totally absorbed in the interest of the merchant. It is immaterial to the merchant what is his situation. The risk is always added to the value of the merchandise in the sale, and subtracted in the purchase; it is always so managed as to give the merchant a profit in the end. If the whole commerce of the United States was restricted to a traffic between Philadelphia and New Orleans or Mobile, the merchant would find his profit in carrying on that commerce. But that is not a reason why the agricultural part of the community should be rendered subservient to the commercial, or that we should be saddled with a system which will be ruinous to agriculture forever, because merchants cannot now make money. I conceive the interest of agriculture to be materially connected with that of commerce—I mean free, unrestricted commerce; but I do not conceive that it will be promoted by permitting the merchant to trade, and submitting agriculture to ruinous taxation.

Another question has been asked by the other side of the House, which deserves some answer. It is asked, what we should gain by a war with Great Britain. I do not expect, sir, that we should destroy the British navy, or invade the island of Great Britain. But we shall be very fortunate if by war we save our honor, our standing as a free nation. Let us not submit, and lose everything in a pecuniary point of view, and our honor besides; for that must be the consequence of submission. We shall be in a worse situation than Francis, after the battle of Pavia, everything will be lost. But gentlemen say, why go to war, when you have no way of operating on the belligerents? Because we will not submit to an abandonment of our rights. I do contend that we have the means. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PIRKIN) used a strong argument the other day to prove it. He said that your embargo, so far as it operated on the British West Indies, was a nullity, because Canada and Nova Scotia furnish them with everything they want; that the British northern provinces were the means of feeding the West India islands, notwithstanding your regulations. Now, if by getting possession of Canada, you could in that way affect other possessions and interests of Great Britain, it is important to have possession of it. The gentleman from Connecticut gave strong reasons why we ought to dispossess Great Britain of Canada, proving how we could in that way operate on her interests. It is well known, too, that the possession of that Government gives her an opportunity to operate against you, to excite not only the Indians out of our limits to direct warfare if necessary, but by merchandise and intrigue, to excite them within our own country. And though I would not risk the peace of the country to free us from evils of that kind, yet if we were forced into war by more irresistible causes, I should certainly consider this collateral advantage gained by it important. Have we not already seen the peace and internal tranquillity of the country disturbed by their influence amongst the Indians? Certainly we have, and I wish to see an end to it.

There is another reason, sir, why the United States should view with extreme uneasiness the proximity of that country in possession of a foreign Power. It gives them means of interfering in our political concerns; and, as has been said in another part of this building, they have exerted those means in our country. To them is owing the unfortunate belief in a part of this country, that the majority of this House is actuated by improper motives. The expulsion of the British from Canada has always been deemed an object of first importance to the peace of the United States, and their security against the inroads of an enemy; however for party purposes its importance may be now depreciated. [See Journals of old Congress, June 1775, and WASHINGTON's instructions to Arnold,—Marshall's Life of Washington, page 315.] And, sir, whilst on this subject, I will observe, that when I hear gentlemen on the other side of the House complain of their motives being assailed, I am tempted to ask them why they are not more tender of our motives? Can they point out any individuals in the majority who are not as firmly bound to their country's good by the ties of kindred, property, and everything dear to man, as they are? I presume not; and whilst they exclaim against irritation, why do they not observe the course which they recommend to us, toward their political opponents, men who have as strong claims to courage or to patriotism as themselves? What have we been told by gentlemen on the opposition side of the House, who have charged you so repeatedly with a desire to involve the nation in a war with Great Britain? Why, sir, that you could not be driven into a war. Was it to have been expected, that after all the irritation and all the sensibility produced in certain sections of the Union by a charge that you were endeavoring to plunge the people into war with Great Britain, that a declaration of this kind would be made? I confess I was not prepared for it. Is the House disposed to verify the prediction of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that we "cannot be kicked into a war with Great Britain," or with any other nation? This is assigning the nation a low station in the ranks of honor; they are put out of them altogether. For I do from my soul believe that the course proposed in the resolution, if adopted, will terminate in a settlement of our differences with Great Britain; and in the present course of the world, when we have received from France so little justice and liberality, we are only restrained from renewing intercourse with Great Britain, because a renewal, under present circumstances, would not comport with our honor, certainly not with our interest. If she would enable us to renew our intercourse with her on terms which would not disgrace an independent nation, I would certainly renew intercourse with her; but I cannot do it with a nation which affects to treat us as one of her acknowledged colonies. The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. PIRKIN,) who spoke of this subject a few days ago, furnished, I think, one of the strongest reasons why we should not for a moment admit the plea of retaliation in justification of the British orders. He told you, supposing the Emperor of China were to issue a decree declaring the British islands in a state of blockade, it would be a mere nullity. The argument is correct. And I ask in return, whether a menace so perfectly empty, so merely brutum fulmen, (to use an expression of a gentleman from Maryland, Mr. KEY,) would justify so ruinous a retaliation as that adopted by Great Britain? It has been said that the French decree of Berlin was not of more effect than a similar decree of the Emperor of China would be. If this be the fact, and I do not contest it, how is it possible that the British Government could justify the right for that reason to take a measure so ruinous to this country? The gentleman went on to quote the opinion of the Secretary of State and others, to prove that his position in relation to the harmlessness of the French decree is correct. I admit it, sir; and it furnishes the strongest possible reason why the claim of Great Britain should not be acquiesced in, and proves to my mind that the pretence of the necessity of retaliating was an insincere and artful profession intended to gull us, and disguise her own injustice.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PRIN) gave us a most glowing description of the power of France; told us that all the world was prostrate at her feet, and Spain was about to be overrun by her arms. Sir, if I am not much mistaken in the view which I have taken on the subject, France is weaker now than she was before the Spanish revolution; nor, if she succeeds in the conquest of Spain, do I believe that she will be more powerful, because she formerly not only actually commanded that Government, but the Spanish colonies. The French have not received from the Spanish colonies in South America less than from twenty to thirty millions of dollars annually. As for Portugal, she was under the necessity of purchasing her neutrality at the price of six millions of dollars annually. France has lost not only that, but the Portuguese colonies also; and if we judge of the importance of these colonies by the measures pursued in England to get their commerce, we should be induced to suppose that the resources of France are seriously impaired by losing them. But granting all the gentleman's premises, what does his argument amount to? Is there any man who doubts the disposition of France to use all the influence in her power over us? Is there any doubt that if we were near France we should be attempted to be reduced under her dominion? There can be no doubt of it. We have seen such a system pursued to her neighbors, that no man can doubt it. Is not the happiness of this people sufficient to tempt this conqueror in the fulness of his power to blot from the history of the world an example which must set in the most odious colors the present situation and past history of France? There can be no doubt that every European Government must feel a hostility to this Government. It is a standing reproach to their policy, and a dangerous example to their people; though I fear, sir, that scarcely one-tenth of the population of the extensive continent of Europe know that such a continent as this exists. Yet the existence of this Government operates to produce jealousy and alarm in those Governments. Admit, I repeat, that France is so powerful, are we in any danger from France? I believe not. How could she operate on you? What has become of her West India islands? Has she been able to preserve even those from the hands of her enemy? She has not secured them, and can it be believed that she could transport a force here? I beg gentlemen to put this question to themselves: Is it possible to believe that if there was any effort made in France to attack us, we should not with one heart and hand unite against her? If there be a gentleman who feels a doubt, his reason must be under the dominion of a suspicion I do not envy, and which I should be sorry to feel for any portion of the people of my country. If this country should be engaged in a contest with France at this time, what would be the consequence of our relative situation? Every one knows that our population is increasing so rapidly as will soon give us a force sufficient to resist any effort, even the combined efforts of all Europe.

Here the gentleman's argument comes properly into view. He considers the safety of the United States as depending on the British navy, which presents a barrier to the transportation of French troops. Admit for a moment that our security against invasion does, in some degree, depend on the British navy. Does that operate as a reason why we should not resist that nation when attacked in a vital manner? Certainly not. Have we any object in view in resisting British aggression which will weaken the naval force of Great Britain? I believe not. There is not a principle which we ask of her that can affect her prosperity or interests, unless it be to make her re-engage the revenue she has collected from our commerce. And are gentlemen willing to contribute to the support of the British navy, by submitting to fiscal regulations of this sort? Certainly not. Admitting, then, that the British navy is the barrier between us and France, our wishes do not go to impair the strength of her navy. They will add an additional strength to it, by giving her markets of infinite importance, and give her supplies, which will increase rather than depreciate her system of defence. But let us admit, for a moment, that the effect of our opposition to the extortion of Great Britain would be to destroy or weaken her navy. Is it possible that gentlemen could, to avoid a contingent evil from a foreign nation which injures us, consent to sacrifice the independence of our nation, and submit to present, for fear of future domination? No, sir. You would have nothing worth keeping if you lost your independence. Then let us maintain it as long as we have the means. But why should gentlemen urge that argument upon you—an argument intended to prevent anything like resistance to Great Britain at the very moment when they tell you that a war with her would be ruinous to you? They laugh at the idea of affecting Great Britain, and say she will crush you in a moment; and yet you are called upon not to resist her, lest, by so doing, you overturn or jeopardize her at pleasure, and destroy the barrier between you and France. I ask gentlemen if these arguments do not destroy each other? I really have listened to arguments of this sort with astonishment; that gentlemen, in one breath, should say that you can do nothing to injure Great Britain, and, in the next breath, caution you against proceeding in your operations against her, lest you should create a degree of pressure which shall destroy that invincible Power whom you cannot touch. But it has appeared to me that this very argument which has had a great deal of weight in the nation; which has cooled many who would be disposed under other views of the subject, to defend the rights of the nation, is utterly out of the question. The gentleman says, that commercial restriction is useless; that if you prevent foreign nations from coming to your custom-house, they will smuggle. Sir, the only means by which Great Britain can be vitally attacked or destroyed, is by this sort of regulation, which the gentleman says is nothing. The mode in which the commerce of Great Britain is attacked on the continent of Europe, is by excluding her commerce from the ports of that country. If so—and the gentleman says it is harmless—how is the existence of Great Britain endangered by this formidable combination on the Continent? And yet, sir, I understood that to be the drift of the gentleman's whole argument. As for the commercial resources, capital, and money, which that nation has to sustain itself against any other nation, nothing is more clear to me than that she possesses them now as much as ever she did. I consider her more safe, infinitely more safe, than she ever has been; that she is in no sort of danger. That argument may be retorted on me, and I may be asked why would I contend with a nation which I admit to be so strong. I shall certainly admit that we could not destroy the British navy, or coerce her to any terms that would be degrading to herself; nor would I ever wish it. While I feel for the honor of my own Government, I should never wish that any Government should commit its rights to any demand of the United States.

The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA.) yesterday seemed to be much at a loss to conceive how the United States could enter into the triple war. The gentleman placed the subject in a laughable point of view, and I was certainly amused by his wit, though not convinced by his arguments. But, sir, if we were to commence hostilities against both these nations, would any man believe that the war against both would continue for any length of time? Certainly not; there can be no doubt that one of them would meet you on such terms as to enable you to carry on the combat against the other till your rights were acknowledged. The gentleman ought to have recollected, when he combatted this idea of fighting neutrally, that it originated on that side of the House. What has been the complaint on that side of the House? Why that we did not maintain our neutrality by making our commercial measures operate with strict impartiality against both of the belligerents. If our measures operate equally on both, it will have proved that we were not more hostile to one than to the other, and thus one strong source of objection to our measures will be removed.

I do call upon gentlemen on the other side of the House most seriously to consider this proposition, and to view it in the aspect in which I have presented it. If I know myself I am sincerely anxious to preserve peace with both these belligerents. I do believe that the result which I have mentioned would follow the course proposed to the House; that if France would recede from her decrees your peace would be settled with both; that England would then revoke her orders of course, as the only ground on which she has ever placed them would be removed. If France refuses, it will enable the British Government to accommodate with you, to make you her friend, and throw you in the scale against her enemy. If gentlemen view the subject as I do, they will conceive that there is but one course proper to be pursued; to persevere in the embargo till this intelligence of our determination can have reached Europe, and an answer be received. For, if you take off the embargo to-morrow, whether the House determine to defend its rights by defensive war, or enforce them by offensive war, the effect which I propose will be destroyed; because, if you take off the embargo, I shall be egregiously mistaken if we are not involved in war in six weeks or two months, and a war too in which you will lose all your property on the seas at one sweep. I think, therefore, that gentlemen seriously disposed to cultivate peace with those nations will enforce the embargo; for, if it be not enforced, I too shall be for taking it off. The state of things in Europe now is particularly favorable to this appeal; and I am convinced that such is the respect which gentlemen owe to the people whom they represent, some course must be taken to support our rights, and not by submission endanger the peace and independence of this country forever. I have expressed my views, sir, of the subject. The House will decide for themselves, and take the course which they think best. If they determine to take off the embargo on the 15th February, or any other day before the first of June, however I may lament it, I will co-operate in taking other measures.

Mr. VAN DYKE.—I am in favor of that part of the resolution now under consideration, which relates to the repeal of the embargo. It is probably known to most gentlemen in the House that I was not originally an advocate for the system of retiring from the ocean. It so happened that I was not present when the vote on the first embargo law was taken, and of course the Journals do not record my disapprobation of the measure; but I do not hesitate to declare that such a law, without any limitation as to its duration, would never have been sanctioned by my voice. However, after Congress, in their wisdom, had adopted it, my sincere wish was that it should receive a fair and satisfactory experiment, and I was willing to give my support to the full and honest execution of the measure, in the hope that some good might result from it. To me and to my constituents it would have been grateful if our wrongs could have been redressed, and our rights secured by a plan of operation so pacific. To the proposition, therefore, submitted at the last session for amending the original law, on the ground that such amendment was necessary to insure a fair trial of the experiment, I did not oppose my vote.

During the present session, there has been introduced into this House from the Senate, and passed, a bill, for enforcing the embargo, many provisions of which, in my opinion, far exceeded the limits of our Constitutional powers, and against which I was obliged by a sense of duty to raise my feeble voice. That bill, however, was approved by a majority, and is now in operation, and under these circumstances it is submitted to the wisdom of Congress to decide whether the system shall be continued, or repealed on the first day of June next, or at an earlier period. From the best consideration which I have been able to give the subject, I am satisfied that a postponement of its repeal until the first day of June next will be opposed to the best interests of the nation. I am not going upon the principle that any part of the Union is in a state of rebellion, as some gentlemen have intimated, nor upon the ground that it will be necessary to send an armed force to shed the blood of our brethren, in order to execute the law, (as some seem to apprehend,) but upon the broad principle that the embargo system has effected all the good that its warmest friends can ever rationally expect to reap from it. That its pressure upon the people of the United States is unequal and partial; that the hope of coercing the belligerents by it is vain; and that its further continuance will operate wholly to the injury and oppression of our own citizens. Sir, if we credit intelligence stated by gentlemen on this floor to be received, as well from the Southern as from the Northern and Eastern sections of the Union, we cannot doubt that the measure has already become so extremely unpopular, that the law is eluded and violated in such a manner, that our produce is daily exported, and the nation whom you expected to coerce and bring to your feet by the embargo is, in despite of all your vigilance and all your penalties, reaping at this moment a rich harvest from your commerce, by the agency of many of your own citizens. In truth, sir, if we look at home, we see the honest, the conscientious man, who obeys the law, suffering a very heavy loss, while the man who disregards and violates it, cannot fail to be rewarded with a rapid increase of wealth. If we extend our view across the Atlantic, we find the Emperor of France applauds our magnanimity in abandoning the ocean, and Great Britain laughs at the imbecility of the measure. My judgment therefore tells me that it is time to remove such a system; and I should cheerfully concur in a proposition for its immediate repeal; but as that course does not meet the sentiment of the majority, I am compelled to choose between the first day of June and fourth of March. The same reasons which weigh in favor of an immediate repeal, will induce me to give my vote for the earliest day that is proposed.

I must now claim the indulgence of the committee while I examine the second branch of the resolution, proposing to issue letters of marque and reprisal against Britain and France on the first day of June next, unless they revoke their orders and decrees. This proposition involves a question still more deeply interesting to the nation than that which I have just noticed; a question of no less magnitude than that of peace or war. No honorable gentleman will deny that issuing letters of marque and reprisal is an unequivocal act of hostility, leading directly to war, and usually its immediate precursor. This is extremely different from authorizing our merchants to arm their vessels and defend themselves when engaged in lawful commerce, against the unjust attacks or illegal restraints of the belligerents, for it is the employment of a hostile force, with express authority from the Government to capture and make prize of any property of those nations that may happen to come within the power of the person bearing such a commission. It is in effect tantamount to a declaration of war, and will never be adopted by prudent statesmen, unless they are prepared to meet the last appeal, for you have no reason to calculate upon the forbearance of your opponents, a moment after they are apprized of your taking such a course. If actual war is resolved on, I should deem it much more politic to begin seriously that active, efficient preparation which ought to precede it, and when we are ready for the contest, tell the nation and the world, that war exists, and thus let every man in the country know what he has to depend upon.

What is our present condition? Without an army; without ships; with a scanty supply of ordnance and military stores; our cities and towns, on the seaboard, naked and unprotected, and the National Treasury all but empty. Will it be wise, will it be prudent in this situation, on the first day of February, to give formal notice to your adversaries, the two greatest Powers upon earth, that you mean to go to war with them on the first day of June next? Sir, we ought to calculate well the effect of such a proceeding; for in my view it is placing the nation in the worst possible situation. This Congress will be dissolved on the fourth of March; you can take no further warlike measure from that day, until the next Congress shall assemble late in May, and in the mean time your enemy, apprized of your intention, is invited by the certain prospect of gaining an advantage, to make the first stroke. The course is equally novel and extraordinary. You are bound; but your adversary is free to act whenever his inclination or interest may dictate. You will place everything at hazard without the possibility of reaping any benefit, for I cannot believe that such a threat will aid negotiation, by alarming the belligerents, or that they will be inclined to lend a more favorable ear to our just remonstrances, under the influence of such a measure. Sir, the question is not whether we have just cause of war against those nations; for every American will agree that the conduct of both has long furnished ample cause for an appeal to arms; but the true question is, whether, having so long forborne, it will be most advisable at this moment to declare our intention to wage war at a future day? In my opinion we shall act more like wise politicians, by not making such declaration at present, and by leaving our successors at liberty to act in May next, as their wisdom and judgment shall direct, from a full view of our foreign relations, as they may then exist.

When the subject of war is presented for deliberation, it cannot be improper to inquire a little more particularly into the state of our foreign relations than has yet been done, in the discussion which has taken place. We have become so habituated to rail against the French Decrees and British Orders, violating our lawful commerce and neutral rights, that we seem in a great measure to have lost sight of our situation with respect to the belligerents, prior to the adoption of those unjust measures, under the immediate pressure of which we are now suffering. The history of those decrees and orders is concise and easily understood. With France we were at peace, and our commercial rights were guaranteed by a solemn treaty, in full force, when His Imperial and Royal Majesty, trampling under foot the law of nations, and setting at defiance the national compact, undertook by his famous Berlin Decree of 21st November, 1806, "to declare the British islands in a state of blockade," "to prohibit all commerce and correspondence 'with them,' and "to make all merchandise belonging to England or coming from its manufactures and colonies lawful prize." Thus attacked, Britain claims the right of retaliation against her enemy, and by her Orders in Council undertakes to counteract his decrees; and thus, although each declares that the blow is aimed only at the enemy, our rights as a neutral nation are violated and our commerce is destroyed; and we are brought into a state of collision with both belligerents. In this situation it seems natural to review the diplomatic scenes which were acting between the British Government and the Administration of this country, prior to the date of the Berlin Decree, and impartially to consider whether we have not omitted to take advantage of the most favorable moment for adjusting many important subjects of negotiation, or committed some errors which now tend to increase our difficulties and embarrassments with that Government, and whether there was no honorable course by which we might have avoided the present collision. Such a review, when taken with candor, may be useful, and cannot, I trust, produce any evil consequence in our foreign relations.

With a sincere desire of ascertaining truth on this point, I have bestowed some attention upon the documents which the President was pleased to lay before us during the last session, and which we are to presume contain, a correct and authentic history of those transactions. I have not examined them with a jaundiced eye, nor shall I attempt in any point to magnify or extenuate the facts that have presented themselves to my mind, as worthy of the attention of the Committee, in connexion with the subject of our foreign relations. The motives of the Executive make no part of this inquiry; it is the public act, and the consequences flowing from such act, to which as statesmen we should direct our eyes.

As infallibility is not an attribute of our nature, I shall certainly not surpass the limits of my representative duty, when I state that it is not only possible, but very probable, that our Administration may have committed some errors, and if we look carefully into those documents, perhaps we may discover that a part of our embarrassments are the consequence of such errors. In advertent to the facts to which I refer, I shall, to avoid any mistake of language or sentiment, read a few extracts from the documents themselves.

It will be recollected by the Committee that the Treaty of 1794, with Great Britain, so far as it relates to commerce, expired on the first day of October, 1803, by which the commercial intercourse of the two countries was left to the regulations which the parties separately might think fit to establish. On the fifth of January succeeding we find a letter addressed by the Secretary of State to Mr. Monroe, our then Minister at London, accompanied by the plan of a convention between the United States and Great Britain. On 5th March, 1804, we read the extract of a letter in which the Secretary, after noticing the expiration of the commercial part of the Treaty of 1794, and making some observations on the state of commerce between the two countries, proceeds in these words: "These observations are 'made not with a view to any negotiation whatever, leading at the present moment to a treaty 'on those or any other commercial points,' &c.; as a reason for not pressing which the particularly delicate situation of Great Britain at that critical moment is assigned. From this letter, I understand the Executive forbade our Minister from negotiating any treaty until further orders; and it is not discoverable that any other communication was made upon the subject until the sixth of March, 1805; under which date we find the extract of a letter from the Secretary containing these words: "The experience of every day 'shows more and more the obligation on both 'sides to enter seriously on the means of guarding 'the harmony of the two countries,' &c. By this letter an injunction is laid on Mr. Monroe to enter seriously upon the subject of negotiation, and we find Mr. Monroe did accordingly engage seriously in that important trust. By advertent to a letter from him of date April 5th, 1804, we discover that, at the first interview between Lord Hawkesbury and himself, his Lordship "went so far as to express a wish that the principles of our Treaty of 1794 might be adopted in the proposed convention, where they applied;" but Mr. Monroe "gave him to understand he could not, according to his instructions, accede to the idea." In perusing the next document, Mr. Monroe's letter of 7th August, in the same year, we are expressly informed that Lord Harrowby unequivocally offered to renew the Treaty of 1794. What says that letter?

"He asked how far it would be agreeable to our Government to stipulate that the Treaty of 1794 should remain in force until two years should expire after the conclusion of the present war? I told his Lordship that I had no power to agree to such a proposal."

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Preparation for War.

H. OF R.

As the negotiation proceeded, and it was discovered that obstacles and difficulties more serious than had been at first apprehended arose, we discover that the British Commissioners, in August, 1806, repeat the offer which had been previously made, for, in the letter of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, dated September 11, in that year, they state in these words:

"In the course of this conference Lord Auckland renewed a proposal which he had glanced at in our first interview, that the Treaty of 1794 should be made the basis of the present negotiation."

This was rejected. I am, therefore, authorized to assume the fact that, during the negotiation, an explicit offer was repeatedly made by the British Government to renew the Treaty of 1794, and that offer was as often rejected by our Executive; and we may well pause and consider whether in rejecting that, without being sure of making another at least as good, a very serious mistake has not been committed? What were the insurmountable objections to that treaty, which induced the Executive to put everything at stake between the two countries rather than continue it during the war in Europe? It is true, the claim of the British Government to take British seamen and deserters from our merchant vessels is not abandoned by that treaty; but the renewal of it did not prevent us from pressing that subject by negotiation, for we shall see, in the further examination of the documents, that the British Commissioners were willing to proceed with the discussion of a plan which should have for its object satisfactory regulations effectually to secure American seamen. Had our experience of the operation of that treaty alarmed us? Was our country ruined, or in danger of being ruined by it? No, sir; we reaped many and important advantages from it; and our country flourished beyond all example. Let experience, the only true test of merit, answer. If we look back to the years 1793-'94, we shall discover that our country was then threatened with war; the treaty was formed, and, notwithstanding all the noise and clamor against it, which assailed the Administration, the wisdom of the Senate and the intelligence and firmness of WASHINGTON secured to the people, by its adoption, many years of unparalleled prosperity and happiness. Yes, sir, under the auspices of that treaty were laid, by the Father of his Country, the foundations of the Temple of Peace, which was erected by his patriotic hands, and whose magnificent dome was supported by the sound pillars of national faith. At its entrance were seen the cheering emblems of plenty; and within you beheld the Genius of Liberty, in majesty, dignity, and resistless power, guarding the choicest gift of Heaven to a free people, "the Constitution," yet unviolated by the ruffian hand of military force. In this fair temple the arts and sciences, commerce and agriculture greeted each other, and worshipped in harmony together. Thus stood the splendid edifice, surrounded by a band of brothers, united by mutual confidence and affection, the pride and glory of America, exciting the admiration and commanding the respect of the world. Under the protecting influence of that treaty commerce unfurled her sails in every quarter of the globe, and brought to our shores the rich reward of industry and enterprise. Agriculture flourished, giving a happier aspect to our country by its progress in improvement. Then, indeed, the husbandman hailed with joy his golden harvest; for each succeeding harvest insured to him a golden reward for his labor. Individual wealth increased, and the national treasure was greatly augmented. Is the picture, which I have drawn, too highly colored? I believe not; consult the history of those times, and you will be convinced that all those advantages were enjoyed by this happy country under that treaty, and it is not less evident that those blessings have been gradually disappearing ever since the day that it expired. Mark the contrast which the history of this day presents, and judge whether very serious consequences have not followed from the refusal to renew that treaty. What is our present situation? You behold commerce palsied, agriculture drooping, distress and ruin stalking over the land, and civil discord raising her fiery head, more terrific than all the hosts of Europe. The foundations of the Temple of Peace are sapped, the building totters on the brink of destruction, and, from the present prospect, I shall think the nation fortunate, if we can save the Constitution from being buried under its ruins.

It is true that, in a certain event, the refusal to renew the Treaty of 1794 would not have been injurious to the nation; that is, if the Executive had succeeded in making a more beneficial bargain; but in this, unfortunately, his hope and expectation failed. I grant you, sir, that no preceding Administration ever enjoyed so promising a season for favorable negotiation; for, sir, we had the opportunity of addressing the ear of the patriotic Mr. Fox, united with a Ministry of similar political sentiments, composing just such a cabinet as we should have elected to treat with; a Ministry who, Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney inform you in every letter, profess the most friendly disposition, and are sincerely desirous to settle all matters in difference between the two countries upon fair and just principles. The opportunity, I repeat, was the most auspicious; the prospect the most flattering that we ever enjoyed for such a purpose. Let us trace from the same authentic source the history, the progress, and the issue of the business.

It is well known to every man in the nation that ever since the acknowledgment of our independence, our Government has, at every opportunity, pressed upon the cabinet of Great Britain the abandonment of a practice which is certainly embarrassing to our commerce, and from its abuse has been in many cases extremely injurious to our own citizens. I mean the right which that Government claims of taking from the merchant vessels of other nations British seamen and deserters, and which has always been tenaciously insisted upon by Great Britain on the ground as she alleges of self preservation. It is true that during the present Administration, in the year 1802, Mr. King, our then Minister at London, succeeded so far as to obtain a relinquishment of the practice on the high seas, but could not obtain an extension of it to the narrow seas, and of course the project of arrangement then failed. This fact is stated in the letter of the Secretary of State of 3d February, 1807. By recurring to the instruction sent to Mr. Monroe for opening a negotiation with the British Cabinet in 1804, the first and most prominent feature is the same long controverted point, which is not to be made the subject of regulation or arrangement, for the broad principle of that Government, abandoning altogether the right of taking even her own seamen or deserters from our merchant vessels, is insisted on as the great ultimatum or sine qua non of any treaty. I agree, sir, that if this point could have been obtained, it would have been a very brilliant victory in the field of negotiation, at which the nation would have rejoiced, and with which no man would have been more gratified than myself. But such a victory was not to be expected. For the correspondence of your Ministers inform you, that notwithstanding all their exertions and their skill to gain that point, they found it beyond the reach of negotiation, and they disclose to you the reason which is frankly avowed by the British Cabinet, and which is stated in the letter of Messrs Monroe and Pinkney of November 11, 1806, in these words: "At our meeting the next day the British Commissioners stated, explicitly, but in a very conciliating manner, that it was not in their power to adopt an article in the spirit of our project; that the Board of Admiralty had been consulted on the subject as had also been the Crown officers in Doctors' Commons, who all united without exception in the opinion that the right of their Government in the case in question was well founded, and ought not to be relinquished. They added, that under such circumstances the relinquishment of it was a measure which the Government could not adopt without taking on itself a responsibility which no Ministry would be willing to meet, however pressing the emergency might be." The result, sir, is known; an informal arrangement was made, by which our Commissioners say, "we place the business almost, if not altogether, on as good a footing as we should have done by treaty, had the project which we offered them been adopted." This informal arrangement on the subject of impressment being thus made, a treaty is concluded and signed by our Commissioners, 31st December, 1806, and transmitted to the President with their explanatory letter of January 3d, 1807. In that letter our Commissioners again speak of the informal arrangement for the protection of our seamen, and declare their opinion, "that although the British Government did not feel itself at liberty to relinquish formally its claim to search our merchant vessels for British seamen, its practice would nevertheless be essentially, if not completely abandoned."

These, sir, are the observations of our own

Ministers, from which it is plainly to be inferred, that no talents, no exertion of diplomatic skill, no ingenuity of argument whatever, could induce the British Government to submit to an abandonment of their claim. It is the same answer which has been invariably given to all our applications on that subject. That Government always declares its willingness to enter into any regulations for the full and effectual security of our seamen, but at the same time candidly informs you that no Ministry could survive the surrender to you of the principle or right of taking their own; and of this our Administration have for a number of years had pretty strong evidence, derived from actual experiment. The treaty thus concluded, and thus explained by our Commissioners, is received by the President, examined and rejected, because the claim of impressment is not formally relinquished, and because in other particulars it does not come up to his sanguine expectations. Sir, in the observations which accompany its return to our Commissioners, it is acknowledged that "the change made by the third article in the provisions of the Treaty of 1794, relative to the British possessions in India" is not as favorable as it stood in that treaty. By referring to the explanatory letter of our Commissioners, we discover why that change was made; because the British Government will not consent to grant us in the new treaty as favorable terms of trading to their India possessions as we enjoyed under the Treaty of 1794, which they had so repeatedly offered to renew. This is full and satisfactory evidence that, after rejecting the Treaty of 1794, our Administration have not been able to make as good a bargain in a very important point, the India trade, even under circumstances most propitiously favoring their attempts.

Does the Executive charge our Ministers with a want of skill, exertion, or fidelity, in the discharge of their important trust? No, sir; read his declaration in the letter which the Secretary addressed to them on returning the treaty: "The President has seen in your exertions to accomplish the great objects of your instructions ample proofs of that zeal and patriotism in which he confided, and feels deep regret that your success has not corresponded with the reasonableness of your propositions and the ability with which they were supported." And yet in the same letter we find again expressed the fixed determination of the President "to decline any arrangement, formal or informal, which does not comprise a provision against impressments from American vessels on the high seas." Thus repeating and insisting upon that point as the ultimatum in any treaty arrangement.

In this manner the Treaty of 1806 was rejected by the President, without condescending to advise with his great Constitutional Council. What would have been the result of the negotiation had the treaty been submitted to the consideration of the Senate it is impossible to divine; whether the united wisdom of the President and Senate would have been able to effect such a compromise and arrangement of the points in controversy as to be mutually satisfactory must remain forever unknown; but one fact may be assumed, that the advice of the Senate upon a subject so deeply interesting to the people, could not have placed the nation in a situation more embarrassing than our present. The history of the ratification of the Treaty of 1794 furnishes an example of the suspension of an objectionable article and the acquiescence of Great Britain in the adoption of the residue, and shows that a spirit of conciliation in that instance produced the happiest result. But if the great ultimatum broadly insisted upon by our Executive, be adhered to, probably no Administration can ever make a treaty with that nation. The British Government tells you that it cannot surrender the point in controversy without endangering its very existence, and that no Ministry can abandon it in the latitude that we require. How then can you calculate upon better success while that Government is able to defend itself? Can you rationally expect more than what is offered? "to adopt some liberal and equitable plan for reconciling the exercise of what that Government deems a right essential to its existence with the just claims of the United States and for removing from it all cause of complaint and irritation." The object which we have in view is the security and protection of our own citizens; this it is the duty of our Government most strenuously to insist upon, and if negotiation will not effect it, an appeal may safely be made to the spirit and feeling of the nation to defend it. But if that object can be obtained by honorable negotiation, I am much deceived if the people will consent to stake their peace and happiness in a contest to protect British seamen and British deserters, who may be employed on board our merchant vessels on the high seas. But, sir, was the security and protection of our own seamen abandoned by our Ministers in the late negotiation? If we credit them, they never lost sight of that object. It is true there appears no stipulation in the treaty upon that point, because they were bound by their instructions not to treat formally, but on the principle of an unqualified abandonment by the British Government. But the explanatory letter of our Ministers and the subsequent letter of Mr. Monroe of 28th February, 1808, gives us reason to believe that the arrangement was at least worthy of experiment; especially as that point (as well as our claim for illegal captures) was left open to future discussion, and was placed, as Mr. Monroe informs, upon such a footing as to give our Government the command of the subject. His words are these: "We were therefore decidedly of the opinion that the paper of the British Commissioners placed the interest of impressment on ground which it was both safe and honorable for the United States to admit; that in short it gave their government the command of the subject for every necessary and useful purpose." If his opinion be correct; if that question was placed upon ground both safe and honorable, and left in such a situation that our Government had the command of the subject, would not such an arrangement be satisfactory to the nation? Would it not have been wise at least to try whether the practice would correspond with the theory? In my opinion, sir, it did merit the united deliberation of the Senate and President before the determination was taken to reject that treaty, and attempt to renew negotiation upon points so long and so ably discussed. The issue of the affair corroborates this opinion, for when the treaty was returned, a change of Ministry having taken place, so far from acceding to the proposition of proceeding again to discuss the points to which the President objected, Mr. Canning readily acquiesces in the rejection, and informs us, that as we had not accepted the convention, the whole subject must be resumed when leisure may permit. It therefore yet remains uncertain whether a more favorable treaty will ever be obtained.

But, sir, suppose either the Treaty of 1794 had been renewed or the late negotiation had been conducted to an amicable issue, and we had with promptness and energy resisted the Berlin decree, which outraged the law of nations and trampled upon a solemn treaty, is it probable that our country would, at this time, have been reduced to the dilemma stated in the report of your committee, of submitting to a ruinous embargo, or waging war with two powerful nations? Sir, in my opinion, we should not have been engaged in war with either, for the mode of resisting that decree was plain and easy, by authorizing your merchantmen to arm and resist any unlawful attacks upon your commerce. This plan would have prevented war, and protected our lawful trade, without embarrassing our Government, or compelling it to take part with either of the belligerents.

From this review of the history of our negotiation since 1803, it appears to me that we have committed errors of no small importance as they regarded the interest of the nation. Should the Orders in Council be repealed to-morrow, our commercial intercourse with Britain would be in the same situation as in 1804, and the whole ground of negotiation must be again travelled over. Connected as we are by commerce with Great Britain, it is impossible for us to continue friends long without some commercial regulations; the sources of controversy are too numerous; the points of collision are too prominent. Such is our situation with respect to that Government—and what is the remedy prescribed by our political doctors? Nothing less than war. Yes, sir, we are called upon to indulge our passions and resentment in idle menaces, by declaring to-day that we will go to war in June next. I hope, however, while we indulge our feelings, we shall not forget our want of preparation, or lose sight of the principles of our Government. Ours, sir, is a peace Government, and is not well calculated for offensive war. Its spirit, like the benign spirit of Christianity, breathes peace and good will to all men. Whenever the occasion for trying its energies may happen, it will be found weak or strong, according to circumstances.

Preparation for War.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

I will illustrate my idea. In a war of defence against attack or invasion, the whole strength and force of the nation will be spontaneously exerted, and every man becoming identified with the Government, the impulse will be irresistible, and we shall then want only a skilful commander-in-chief, to direct with judgment the physical force of an united people. In a war of enterprise or offence, our Government will be weak, unless the cause of war addresses itself strongly to the feelings of the great majority of the people, and the necessity of it to vindicate the essential rights and honor of the nation is plainly discerned; and for this obvious reason, you cannot raise a regiment, or man a gunboat, without voluntary enlistment, or provide money, (the very sinews of war,) without the consent of a majority of the people, expressed by their Representatives. Before we declare war, or adopt a measure which leads directly to that event, we ought to be well assured that the great majority of the nation are ready and willing to unite in the contest; a fact of which, at present, I really entertain strong doubts, excited by the language of memorials on your table, and information daily received from different parts of the Union. I know we can conceal our errors from the view of the people for a season by a declaration of war. The still small voice in which they address the understanding will be unheard amid the din of arms, or drowned amidst the groans of the hapless victims of war. They will be lost in the blaze of our burning villages, or obscured by clouds of smoke ascending from the funeral piles of our devoted cities. But let me ask this House, or rather let me ask the nation, whether they are prepared to bring their peace, their happiness, their treasure, and their blood, and present them all as an offering to atone for the errors of the Administration? Will nothing less than such a sacrifice expiate those errors? I trust some other equally honorable and infinitely less costly will yet be found. Sir, I am convinced that no honorable gentleman within these walls would advocate war to cover those errors, and therefore I cannot impute to any one such a motive.

Perhaps, sir, when I state my unwillingness at this moment to declare war against Great Britain and France, or to adopt the plan of marque and reprisal, I shall be asked if I mean to submit to their unjust orders and decrees? I answer no. I hope the idea of submission has never been entertained in this House. I trust, sir, that the term "submission" is not found in the vocabulary of an American statesman. It is true that the Committee of Foreign Relations, in a detailed report, after reciting our wrongs, has informed us that we have only to choose submission, embargo, or war with both nations. With all due deference to the superior judgment of that honorable committee, I must beg leave to enter my protest against their inference; and as they have given us the premises, I shall probably be pardoned, if I venture to consult my own understanding and draw my own conclusions. I cannot perceive how it can well be called submission for our merchants if they please to trade with Great Britain, or France, or any other part of the world, notwithstanding those orders and decrees.

By submission, is understood the doing under coercion that which is commanded, or the refraining from doing that which is forbidden. France says, we shall not trade with Great Britain, and Britain, in return, says, we shall not trade with France.

The whole tenor of the orders and decrees, as applicable to this question, is negative or prohibitory. If, then, our merchants being at liberty to stay at home, or to go to France, do actually go there, that act is clearly not submission to the decree of the Emperor, and being contrary to the British orders, certainly is not submission to them. And, on the other hand, the voluntary trade to Great Britain is not produced by the British orders, and is against the French decree; and equally clear it is, that our trade to India, Spain, Portugal, and many other places, might be carried on without the least imputation of submitting to the will of the belligerents. As to embargo, that, in my view, savors more strongly of submission; the nation, however, is weary of it, and I trust the wisdom of Congress will grant them seasonable relief from its pressure, without adopting the third alternative insisted on by the committee.

If the embargo is raised on the 4th of March, its full force will, by that time, be felt by the belligerents, and they may probably then be inclined to do us justice, and our trade be permitted to resume its natural channels. The British Government, moved by the impulse of its own interest, and taught, by our patriotic submission to embargo for fifteen months, to appreciate the value of our friendship and commerce, may yet listen to the voice of reason, and yield to an honorable adjustment of our differences; and of such a disposition, Mr. Canning's last letter gives a pledge. As we have forborne so long, and endured so much to preserve our young and growing nation from being drawn into the vortex of European wars, I hope we shall not close the door of negotiation at this moment, but leave the succeeding President at liberty to use such means as his wisdom and patriotism may suggest to secure the rights and honor of his country. The object is at least worth the experiment. Should he succeed in the attempt, his reward will be great—no less than the grateful applause of his fellow-citizens. I would, therefore, do no act which may tend to increase the difficulties with which the interesting subject of our foreign relations is already embarrassed. Sir, a very important consequence will, in any event, result from this course—for, if justice is denied us, the nation will be convinced that war is necessary. It will tend to harmonize the public sentiment, and unite all in the common cause. For my constituents I can answer with confidence, that whenever Congress shall declare that war is necessary to protect our rights, or vindicate our national honor, they will rally around the standard of the Government, and present their breasts as a bulwark for their country. The report of the committee to which I have referred, speaks of war with both the belligerents; this proposition has more of sound than substance; it deserves some attention, and a few remarks will show its fallacy. No man will say that we can come into contact with France, and perhaps that is for us a most fortunate circumstance. As it regards her, therefore, the declaration of war would be merely nominal. But with Great Britain we might have a real and a serious warfare. Mark the consequence. The Emperor, by his decrees, wishes to reduce Britain by cutting off her commerce. We declare war against Britain, and thus the object which he aimed at will be accomplished. Do you doubt, sir, after reading Mr. Champagny's letter, in which the Emperor not only tells us we ought to go to war with Great Britain, but even ventures to declare war for us, that such a state would be extremely gratifying to him? Sir, we know well that such is his wish, and it becomes us to act with caution and circumspection; but we may be taken in his toils. From every view, therefore, which I can take of the subject, my mind is fully convinced that we ought not, at this time, to adopt the second branch of the resolution.

When Mr. VAN DYKE had concluded—

Mr. DAWSON moved to postpone the farther consideration of the subject indefinitely. The House adjourned without coming to a decision on the motion.

THURSDAY, February 2.

On motion of Mr. BURWELL, the House proceeded to consider a resolution proposed by him, and ordered to lie on the table, on the first instant; and the same being amended on the several motions of Mr. MACON and Mr. MARION, to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be instructed to furnish the Librarian of Congress with two complete sets of the Journals and all Documents and Reports laid before Congress at each session:

A motion was made by Mr. DURELL, farther to amend the said resolution, by adding, to the end thereof, the words following: "and to transmit to the Secretary of each of the States in the Union, and of the Territories thereof, one such set for the use of said States and Territories, respectively."

And on the question that the House do agree to the said proposed amendment, it passed in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. STANFORD, that the said resolution, as amended, and herein before recited, be referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon to the House: and the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That Mr. BURWELL, Mr. STANFORD, and Mr. ELY, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening and extending to the river Mississippi the canal of Carondelet," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed a bill, entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation of religious societies in the District of Columbia;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Mr. BACON called for the consideration of the resolution offered by him on Monday, for appointing a joint committee to examine the subject of the petitions against the mode in which the late election of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, was conducted.

Mr. RANDOLPH wished the resolution to lie on the table, that the members of the House might have an opportunity to take it into their most serious consideration. He said it appeared to him that, under color of a redress of grievances, the resolution might go in a very alarming and dangerous manner to enlarge the sphere of action of the General Government, at the expense of the dearest rights of the States. In what manner, asked he, is the General Government constituted? We, as one of the branches of the Legislature, are unquestionably the judges of our own qualifications and returns. The Senate, the other branch of the Legislature, is in like manner the judge, without appeal, of the qualifications of its own members. But with respect to the appointment of President—on whom is that authority devolved in the first instance? On the Electors, who are to all intents and purposes, according to my apprehension, as much the judges of their own qualifications as we are of ours; and it appears to me as competent to the people of any part of this country, to prefer a petition to the Electoral College to set aside the returns of any members of Congress, as to prefer petitions to this House to set aside the qualifications of Electors. True it is, sir, that for the convenience of the thing, and also for the prevention of cabals and intrigue—such, however, was the intention of this provision; how far it has answered that purpose is another question—the Electors assemble in separate divisions in the respective States; but they are to be considered, to all intents and purposes, as a body of men equal in number to the Senate and House of Representatives, charged with the election of the President and Vice President of the United States, and judges in the last resort of their own qualifications and returns. If not, they are a mere nullity. Sir, when I rose I had no intention of saying thus much on the subject; I did not dream that it would be called up, and, to be candid, I did not know that the resolution was on the table. The manner of doing business in the House is so strange and anomalous, that it is impossible for any person to know what will be the subject of debate on any particular day. But it is perfectly in my recollection, and, sir, it must be in yours, the extreme sensation which was produced in this House and throughout the Union by a bill introduced into the other House by a member from Pennsylvania (Mr. Ross) touching the election of President and Vice President of the United States. This is a delicate subject; one which it is agreed on all hands there is no occasion to touch. The election is not only undisputed but indisputable. The Constitution has said that each State is entitled to a number of Electors equal to the number of its Senators and Representatives, who shall be appointed in such manner as the Legislatures shall prescribe; and if we attempt to put our hands on this power, we might as well, in my apprehension, arrogate to ourselves the appointment of President and Vice President. If we do away the decision of the Electoral body, which is as independent of us as we are of them, the Constitution is in my opinion verging to its dissolution.

Mr. BACON said he certainly should consent that the resolution should lie on the table. He said he was himself by no means certain that this House or both Houses had the power of acting on the subject; but he thought it an attention due to the memorials to give them a reference to a select committee. He did not wish to commit himself or the House on the subject, for, he repeated, he was by no means certain of the propriety of the proceeding.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

REPEAL OF THE EMBARGO.

The SPEAKER declared the motion pending (for indefinite postponement) when the House yesterday adjourned to be out of order.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on Mr. NICHOLAS's resolution for repealing the embargo, and issuing letters of marque and reprisal, on the — day of —. The question pending on filling the blank with the first day of June, the fourth day of March, or the fifteenth of February.

Mr. W. ALSTON said that for himself he would prefer the course which the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. TROUP) had pointed out; and, if the gentleman from Delaware had not declared that he wished the embargo to be removed, he should have inferred that also to be his idea, because he had set out with declaring that he had wished that the embargo laws should have a fair experiment. And Mr. A. asked the gentleman and the House whether they had received a fair experiment? Certainly not; for the violations had been such heretofore that the embargo had not by any means had that experiment which it ought to have had. No one could tell what would be its effects if it were permitted to have that trial which the honorable gentleman from Delaware wished it to have had. Mr. A. could not decide how to fill up the blank in the part of the resolution under consideration, until he knew what other measure was to be adopted in place of the embargo. If we were to have war, he cared not whether it was declared to-morrow, or
